OUR OPPORTUNITY IN A WORLD THAT LONGS FOR PEACE.

The great majority of the people of the United States are indicating, in no uncertain terms, their will for progressive disarmament, provided the policy is adopted in conjunction with other leading powers. They want peace with security. The security will depend upon the simultaneous action in the same direction of all the great nations of the world.

The crushing burden of the debt that was incurred during the last war is proving a convincing argument to large classes of citizens whom moral considerations have hitherto left cold. The terrors of the next war, as foretold by military men like General Tasker H. Bliss, and by war correspondents like Will Irwin in his recent book on that subject, constitute a sufficient reason in themselves for not permitting that war to come. Ruthless and brutal to a degree that would make the last war seem humane, it would be a life and death grapple of the nations of the world with victory as the only objective, and universal woe the only possible outcome.

While the economic motive, coupled with a well-grounded dread of letting the devil loose in the earth again, is uppermost in people's minds at the moment, it would be shallow to fail to realize that there is an undercurrent of spiritual idealism active in the movement. Men talk economy, when they are ashamed to give voice to their finer feelings. A host of returned soldiers know that war is wrong as well as foolish. They will avoid the church that glorifies it. Yet they will conceal in ordinary conversation the thoughts that used to fill their midnight hours in the trenches. Few men are left, in fact, who dare maintain in the face of public opinion the thesis that war is right, or that it is a biological necessity of the race. Secretary Weeks is one of the latest to confess his abhorrence of war.

The only ground on which its warmest advocates base their plea nowadays is that we must defend ourselves from the aggressor, that we must have security. This being assured, most men the world over want peace. Such half-way pacifism as this is unsatisfactory to the convinced Friend; nevertheless he must have patience, as God has, with the slow progress of the conscience of mankind on this point, being watchful lest self-righteousness on his part prove more offensive to the universal Father than the seeming blindness of his generation to the higher demands of Christianity.

There is something to be said for those who are not spiritually ready to risk all and disarm, trusting in the protection of the Almighty. The policy does not go far enough to be effective. The New Testament doctrine of non-resistance is unquestionably inseparable from the second great commandment. "Though I give my body to be burned, and have not love, it profiteth me nothing." An active foreign policy of service is the correlative of disarmament from the Christian point of view. A solid ground of friendship among the peoples of the world, such as our disinterested kindness to the children of Belgium, of France, of Germany, of Poland, of the Balkan States, has created, is our true security in foreign relations. As has been urged, I think, before now in the Friends' papers, one-tenth of the cost of our military measures against Mexico, if spent in the service of the people of Mexico, would have made our southern border permanently safe. A policy of good-will and understanding towards Japan is the Christian substitute for enlarging the Pacific fleet. From the Christian standpoint, and therefore from the practical standpoint, disarmament unaccompanied by good works and good-will is a dead thing and justly distrusted by thoughtful people. Until our nation is ready to go the whole way and be Christian in its dealings abroad, disarmament on the part of America alone as an isolated bit of idealism would probably prove unsatisfactory and might lead to a reaction.

Fortunately the rest of the civilized world shows evidences of wanting disarmament at least as much as we do. England can hardly wait for us to call the projected conference. Leaders in Japan are daily expressing their desire for such a conference. France, the most militaristic of the governments of the world to-day, defends her policy solely on the ground of security. Assured of security, her people, sick of war and its consequences, would no longer endure the burdens under which they now stagger. Germany is already disarmed. In Poland every class of citizens longs for peace, and their government, which is practically bankrupt, will follow the lead of France. When the great Powers move, the people of the little states will compel their governments to follow after. Where we have suffered from the war a little, Europe has suffered much. Millions of graves to our thousands are still green over there, and the laborers in factory and field are crushed almost to the earth by the weight of the armies that they carry upon their backs. Disarmament with security is, therefore, by no means impracticable for us. As a step towards universal peace it is a visible expression of one of the deepest hungers of the world.

In our own country the groups that are interested in this cause are many and influential. Labor at its recent conference has declared in favor of disarmament in no uncertain terms. The Grange and other farmers' organizations will support it. The women's organizations are showing that they stand solidly on this side of the question. The Socialists, as internationalists, are solidly with us. The churches of all denominations are not hesitating to urge general disarmament. A large percentage of the business world is taking this stand on economic grounds. Then there are the Peace Societies, the Peace Foundations, and the Mennonites, the Dunkards and the Friends. Possibly groups such as the German-Americans, who have been torn by the hard choice that they had to make in the recent war, have thought the question through until they, too, are genuinely international in their Americanism. For Americanism, at its best, is international in sympathy.

Many of these groups are represented in England, where some of them are better organized and more powerful than they are here. Labor, for example, is such a group. Some of us at the time of the All-Friends' Conference in London were witnesses of their unanimity and power in opposing another war. On the continent of Europe the same is true in varying measure in the different nations. Probably corresponding groups will be found on investigation to exist in Japan, even if they are not there so well organized nor so articulate.

When nine-tenths of the people of America and of the civilized world want disarmament as a step towards peace, why don't they get it? There can be but one reason; they are not organized. The federation of these groups, with agreement upon a joint progressive policy that will bring disarmament, in a short term of years, to a point where a great sudden war would be impossible, is the one practical step lacking to make their will effective. The movement would need to be international in scope, since simultaneous diminution of the means of war in all the great nations would be required to win for the movement general support.

Is not this situation a challenge to the Society of Friends? Some will answer that it does not go far enough. They long for the abolition of war through the knowledge of Jesus Christ. They say, justly, that only by the conversion of the hearts of men will universal peace be established in the earth.

The answer to this argument is two-fold. In the first place, Friends agree upon the policy of removing the causes of war, and armaments have proven that they are an active cause of war in the case of Germany. It was the threat implicit in the huge German military machine that kept Europe in anxiety until that machine had been destroyed. In the second place, the situation with regard to disarmament is the same situation Prohibitionists and, before them, Abolitionists, had to face. In closing the legalized saloon Prohibitionists did not set free the spirit of man; yet Friends have been strong Prohibitionists. In the abolition of legal slavery it was the body, not the spirit, of the Negro that was set free. That liberation has yet to be achieved. Yet John Woolman was a leader among Abolitionists. Just as Prohibitionists should not be content till they have brought about the spiritual completion of their task, just as Abolitionists should not be content until they have done likewise, so the men of peace must not be content, in this new struggle, until they shall have set up the kingdom of God on earth. Nevertheless, as in these earlier reforms, they must not neglect the present opportunity in their contemplation of the larger issue.

The weight of the moral and religious inheritance of the Society of Friends is needed in this fight. This is the day which the founders and heroes of the Society foresaw and for which they suffered. They not only yearned for the spread of love in the earth; they were opponents of war as an institution. Through them and the heirs of their traditions, God seems to have been preparing a special instrument for this task. While others urge disarmament on economic grounds, or from fear, it is for the Friends boldly to urge it, as their fathers did, because war is wrong and armaments are the means of war. In the rising chorus of voices from all classes of people urging sanity and righteousness in this matter, it would be sad, indeed, for the Society of Friends to remain silent. It is not for this generation to live in rapt admiration of the deeds of their forefathers while the opportunity to fulfil the work of those forefathers slips by unnoticed. Ten years from now it will be gone. "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation."

It remains to caution Friends, and particularly Young Friends who may be expected to enlist wholeheartedly in this cause, that they must not sacrifice, in their work for disarmament, one jot nor one tittle of their testimony as Friends. They will be co-operating with other bodies whose motives, as has been clearly stated above, will be mixed. Friends will work with them loyally and without taint of self-righteousness, it is hoped. Yet they cannot forget that, for them, disarmament is only a step towards the ultimate goal of peace. They will, therefore, continue, through service, to sow broadcast the seeds of international good-will as they have done in the best periods of their history. The efforts that are being made in our time to save the children of Europe with food and clothing are more important to future peace in the deepest sense than is generally realized. The Friends will never cease to foster such fundamental work. Their local groups will be living centres of information and inspiration for the disarmament movement, and at the same time will be living witnesses to the universal love of Christ.

FREDERICK J. LIBBY.

"Fellowship in the Holy Ghost means first the spirit of truth, of honesty, of fearless sincerity in all our relations one with another. There can be no fellowship of the Holy Ghost without that. When, through the coming down upon us of God, the Spirit from above, we come into fellowship with Christ, we want to be true as He is true. Truth, honesty, righteousness we need all through the life of the Church and the nation.

"Again, it means the spirit of good-will, brotherliness, of care and love one for another. It goes far beyond being just and fair to one another. We are not content to be just to our brothers and sisters. We want to do all in our power to give them happiness, to make life better and brighter for them. That is what fellowship in the Holy Ghost means. If we have this spirit we shall not want any unfair advantage or privilege over others. We shall want all to enjoy the blessings and opportunities as well as the duties of life, and shall do all in our power toward attaining this.

"Last, fellowship in the Holy Ghost means the spirit of faith. Faith makes human life noble and worth while. It lifts men off the earth and gives them the power that comes from heaven. It is the spirit of faith in Christ that gives us fellowship with our brethren."

LETTER FROM ELLA NEWLIN

STAVANGER, Norway, Sixth Month 10, 1921.

TO OUR DEAR FRIENDS IN AMERICA:—

We are still favored with health and strength to pursue our journey. After leaving Fritchley we attended London Yearly Meeting throughout. We were kindly received and feel that we owe a debt of gratitude to English Friends as well as to those of all other places where our lot has been cast since leaving home.

Owing to the troubles in Ireland and the coal strike in England and the strikes which stopped nearly all passenger and freight boats to Norway, it seemed at different times when looking ahead that our way would be closed up. We have, however, gone forward without delay, except the inconvenience of being crowded and less comfortable, which we do not complain about.

We came to Norway one week sooner than we had expected for fear we would not be able to get any boat if we delayed. We had to take a boat to Bergen first instead of to Stavanger, as we could have done in normal times. At Bergen we waited thirty-six hours for another boat to Stavanger, thus taking more time and causing more expense than otherwise would have been the case.

Alfred Kemp Brown of England came with us from Newcastle, England. He has a minute to attend this Yearly Meeting and expects to go to Sweden, Denmark and Germany.

We have a congenial home here at Stavanger at Thorstein Bryne's. We have been invited to different homes for short visits. The language is quite a barrier, but many speak English well and others can to a limited extent. Thorstein Bryne is a good interpreter, and as he has largely retired from business he can go with us and is most helpful. I have been able to speak through an interpreter better than I expected, yet feel how pitifully small is our best offering.

The Yearly Meeting begins to-morrow and they are expecting Friends from other parts to-day.

With much love to all,

ELLA NEWLIN.

CANADA YEARLY MEETING.

After the sessions of New England Yearly Meeting I was permitted to spend several days visiting N. Dartmouth, Centerville, Sharon, Boston and Lynn, and then took the night express to Buffalo, where the seventh Annual Conference of the Hebrew Christian Alliance was about to assemble.

I could write pages of my experiences in Buffalo, which covered the period of a week. I suppose this Conference was the largest number of Christians of Hebrew race ever assembled in one place in America, and amongst these were quite a number of young believers hardly a year old in the faith. I had to accept the burden of acting as Chairman of the meetings—no easy task, as Jews are a nervous and impulsive lot. But introducing the principle of "Silence unto God" into the meetings had a wonderful effect. The Divine blessing rested on our deliberations and the Kingdom of Christ in Israel was furthered.

From Buffalo I came direct to Norwich, Canada, to attend the Yearly Meeting of Friends there. There were a number of visitors from Ohio, New England, North Carolina and elsewhere. Amongst these were Ellwood Conrad, James Henderson, Horace and Mary C. Foster, with minutes from their respective meetings.

From the beginning we felt that this Yearly Meeting was going to be conducted by the unseen Guide into deep waters. The tide rose from session to session. The closing meeting was a taste of Pentecost. The glory of the Lord broke in upon the gathered Friends. There was deep tenderness and contrition. The young Friends testified to the Lord's power one after another; the aged were melted into tears, so that words were difficult. We had experienced a baptism of the Holy Spirit, and the heavenly fire touched lips never before opened in vocal prayer, witness and praise.

Long did this covering remain, even after the awe-struck meeting had broken up. It was not the result of any whipping up of the meeting into creaturely action, but the gentle breath of the invisible Christ standing in the midst, upon the waiting assembly. It seemed as if the times of the old Quakers had come back again to Canada.

I am persuaded if these beloved Friends, to whom Christ is so precious, set their faces to the sun-rising, they will find "the best is yet to be." Truly the time has fully come when Friends everywhere must buckle on their armor. "A new world-war is on—the good fight of faith"—and the King is looking for a people made "willing in the day of His power." Our golden age as a Society lies not in the past, but in the future, and "instead of the fathers shall be the children."

LONDON YEARLY MEETING

FOURTH-DAY EVENING.

Perhaps the largest company of the day, though less than in previous years, was the gathering on the first evening.

CONTINENTAL RELIEF.

Harrison Barrow, called upon to speak on the work of the Friends' Emergency and War Victims' Relief Committee, invited Friends to read the Committee's report. Last year the amount of money expended was £700,000, and with sundry contributions in kind, the sum total was upwards of £880,000. It had been suggested that we were undermining the morale of the Austrian people; but conditions were not yet ripe for any withdrawal from the work. In order to facilitate co-operation between English and American Friends, Commissioners had been appointed and had done valuable advisory service; at the moment this plan had been suspended, owing to shortness of funds. With regard to Russia, in Moscow there were 16,000 children who ought to have been receiving milk, but only 3,000 were receiving it. The Committee had now, however, by the aid of friends, been able to supply it to the whole of the children in Moscow. Forest schools had been established and had been helped by Friends, as well as sanatoria for the treatment of tuberculosis. All the hospitals were pathetically in need of medicine, though supplies had been distributed quite loyally by the Soviet authorities. With regard to the future, the Save the Children Fund would shortly be ceasing contributions, and financial difficulties were arising for the Committee, whose income was now about one-tenth of what it was last year. He trusted that the work would not be allowed to stop, but that the Society would fully recognize its responsibility. We had an entry to 'enemy' countries which no other body had, and with our international ideal we held a strong weapon for good. He desired that Friends who could go and earn their living in Central Europe would go and help in the work, and he hoped means would be found by which that could be done. At Woodbrooke Friends could study in relation to international service. He was afraid the Society was largely failing at home in support of the international work, but he did not think this should prevent us sending out missionaries to Europe who could also carry on their own everyday work.

Arthur Watts spoke on his experience in Russia, pointing out that Friends were the only English religious organization allowed to work in Soviet Russia. Might Friends recognize the truly international character of our work, the significance of which was not only material. Our complete freedom from any political object made our position much more easily maintained. In the opinion of Friends, religion and life are one, and this had much to do with the fact that we were enabled to take part in the distribution of necessities. Behind it was the spirit of service, and because of that, the Committee was anxious that Friends should maintain their work in Russia.

T. Edmund Harvey said that Friends must have repeatedly felt not only a sense of the immensity of the world's need, but also the call that came to all of us from the countries of Europe and Asia. When the real call came we had the promise that God would be with us. We had no special diplomatic service; our whole membership must be an ambassadorship of the Kingdom of God. If but for one day we could become a Society of Friends worthy of the name—friends because the spirit of Christ had made us friends, friends of all men—would not the Kingdom of God be realized here amongst us, responding to the present need? As we felt our own weakness might we seek in prayer the power and love and faith that it was our Father's will to give us.

BIRTHRIGHT MEMBERSHIP.

The Clerk announced that this subject would be now entered upon.

It will be remembered that the outcome of last year's discussion on the subject was its reference to the whole body of Friends, throughout the Monthly and Quarterly Meetings. A Committee was appointed having care of the matter, and that committee prepared for the use of the meetings the draft of a suggested Basis of Membership, and a questionnaire. The Meetings also received an historical statement on the subject prepared by W. C. Braithwaite and the paper read by Mary E. Pumphrey at the Yearly Meeting of 1920. The Committee now reported that 13 out of 17 Quarterly Meetings had sent short or full minutes, while 46 out of 65 Monthly Meetings had given separate answers to the questionnaire. The Meetings which had replied reported 361 resignations in the period 1908-13 and 475 in the years 1914-19; in the same period disassociations for non-attendance had numbered 158 and 197. Besides these there were but few disownments. Respecting 'nominal' members, the 23 Monthly Meetings which made an estimate of the number of these recorded 1,176, "a sufficiently serious figure if the proportion holds good for the whole Society, when the number would be between 2,500 and 3,000, or about 15 per cent. of our membership." As the outcome of consideration of the reports and minutes, the Committee put forward the following conclusions and recommendations:—

(1) There is no sufficiently general feeling of dissatisfaction with Birthright Membership to warrant its abolition.

(2) Monthly Meetings might be encouraged to devote, through their overseers or through special committees, more attention to the spiritual life and Quaker training of their children and young people.

(3) Those Monthly Meetings that desire it might be authorized to institute a system by which Birthright Members could apply to the Monthly Meeting to have their membership confirmed.

(4) It seems clear that the privilege of Birthright Membership should be given to children where only one parent is a Friend, if both parents express the wish for it and assert their intention to bring up the child in the Society.

(5) The existence of a large body of nominal members cannot fail to be a source of weakness; and though we do not recommend any sudden or drastic action, we think all our Monthly Meetings should be called on to face the situation, and, as way opens, correct their lists of members so as to correspond with Truth.

(6) We think the Yearly Meetings might well issue some concrete advice on the principles which should govern admission to membership, the information in the Book of Discipline being inadequate. We suggest that perhaps the Notes on the Basis of Membership, after careful revision, might form a useful part of such a document. It is clearly desirable that there should be a certain amount of uniformity in our practice of admission to membership.

(7) The practice, followed in some meetings, of submitting letters of application either to the overseers or to a special committee before they come to the Monthly Meeting is, in our opinion, highly to be commended; and we think it desirable that the same body should be encouraged to nominate to Monthly Meetings suitable Friends to visit the applicant. So long as the Monthly Meeting retains the right to reject or modify such nominations this course does, we think result in more suitable committees being appointed than where the selection is made in open meeting from those who chance to be present.

(8) In conclusion, we wish to state our belief that the real cure for the admittedly unsatisfactory state of our membership at present is a more general and whole-hearted following of our Lord Jesus Christ in every relation of life. The inevitable result of such a revival among us would be the attraction to our body of those spiritually like-minded, and the desire of the indifferent to be clear of a Society, the membership in which implied more than they were prepared to accept.

After liberal discussion the Clerk presented a draft minute accepting the conclusion of the Committee that no general desire existed to abolish birthright membership, and approving the suggestions in Clauses 3 and 4, the later clauses being referred to the Meeting for Suffrages to consider (5, 6 and 7), and to report to next Yearly Meeting upon them.

Ernest E. Unwin hoped Clause 3 would not be passed at all. He considered it a very dangerous piece of machinery.

Albert J. Crosfield reminded Friends that a religious Society could not be run by machinery.

Other Friends followed, speaking mainly against the establishment of any test and also somewhat against the proposals of Clause 3, and in favor of a broader basis of membership.

The Clerk said it seemed clear that the meeting was not prepared to endorse Clause 3.

The Clerk asked whether the meeting would be content to refer the two criticised clauses to the subordinate meetings for their consideration; and after further consideration of various points, in which several Friends joined vocally, it was finally decided, as a result of the morning's consideration, that Clauses 1 and 4 should be approved, Clauses 3, 5, 6 and 7, rejected, it being felt that it would be better to have the feeling of Yearly Meeting conveyed to the subordinate meetings by representatives rather than written directions being sent. Clause 2 was left for consideration at the afternoon sitting.

EDUCATION.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

Commencement occurred on the fifteenth, there being forty-seven in the graduating class. Essays were read by Helen Fe' Haworth of Banes, Cuba, Theodore S. Raiford of Ivor, Va., Rebecca E. Hallett of Hatboro, Pa., and Frances R. Tatnall of Wilmington, Delaware. The Valedictory was given by John C. Starbuck of Media. An unusually able and timely address was given by William W. Comfort, President of Haverford College.

The following honors were announced:—highest scholarship, boys' side, upper classes, Edward S. Wood; lower classes, Winslow N. Hallett; girls' side, upper classes, Edna E. Wetherald; lower classes, Rebecca L. Wills; greatest improvement in scholarship, boys' side, upper classes, Arthur W. Greene, lower classes, Horace C. Doan; girls' side, upper classes, M. Eileen Todd; lower classes, Mary V. Jarvis.

Of the forty-seven members of the graduating class, thirty-seven are planning to go on to college. Twenty-four boys and girls from the three upper classes remained at the school for the College Board examinations.

E. Dean Stanton, James and Alice Walker, E. Grant Spicer and James Jameson recently took a motor trip to State College to attend the Farmers' Week being held there.

Samuel H. Brown is in New York, having been appointed a reader of History papers under the College Entrance Examination Board.

FACULTY CHANGES FOR NEXT YEAR.

There will be a few faculty changes another year, but fortunately not many. James F. Walker has already assumed the headship of the Agriculture Department, in place of J. Clifford Otis, who has taken up a position as manager of a large farm in Northern Vermont.

Parvin M. Russell, who has been with us two years, is returning to business. Ida L. DeLong has a year's leave of absence for advanced study at Columbia. Caroline L. Nicholson returns after two years' work in Germany under the Friends' Service Committee; Amy L. Post, who has taken her place in the meantime, will be an assistant librarian at Haverford College. Orpha L. Cox and Esther Thomas, who have had the major portion of the work in the Elementary School, are both leaving, the latter having been married on the fourteenth of Sixth Month to Vernon Overman, of Amboy, Indiana.

New appointments have been made as follows:—Albert L. Baily, Jr., a graduate of Haverford College, in business with the Joshua L. Baily Company, will leave business and come to Westtown as a teacher, being especially interested in Botany and Nature Study. Eugene R. Raiford, Westtown '14, Earlham '20, comes as Physical Director of the boys with some teaching in Mathematics. Esther J. Nichols will have the Elementary School at the Stone House. She graduated from the Gorham Normal School in Maine in 1912 and since then has been teaching in New England schools, coming to us from Attleboro, Mass.

Nine of our teachers are planning for work in Summer Schools during the coming vacation. Helen P. South, E. Grant Spicer, James F. Walker, Lewis A. Taylor and Esther J. Nichols expect to be at Columbia. Elizabeth Thomas at Harvard; Albert L. Baily, Jr., at Northwestern; Eugene R. Raiford at Springfield, and Jessie A. Wood at Chautauqua.

SIXTH MONTH 23, 1921.

OLD WESTTOWN.

J. RUSSELL HAYES.

Unworldly, simple, dignified, serene,
Dear with ancestral charm, and beautiful
With green old landscapes and dim leafy aisles
Of antique groves, with blossomy orchard boughs
And grassy hills, and that old avenue
Of stately trees,—has it not held our love
And friendly veneration through the years!
What recollections haunt its shadowy lanes,
What memories enshrine its peaceful halls
That dream with patience of the Long Ago
When faces smiled and young hearts beat with joy,— Faces and hearts that now have journeyed far Beyond our days, but are remembered still
With deep affection!

Gentleness and peace
And tender human sympathy and love
Had here their home for generations long;
And many a family, many a neighborhood
Can trace its sweet and gracious atmosphere
To Westtown's noble influence, can name
Some old-time Friend whose kindness of soul
Still lives in children's children to our day,—
Inherited from far-off lessons learned
In the well-loved meeting-room from saintly speakers
And in the quiet drill of daily tasks
At this old Quaker school beside the banks
Of pleasant Chester Creek.

Worthy all honor,
The men of vision whose high hearts were set
On this "new Ackworth" of the western world,—
John Woolman, Owen Biddle, Dickinson
Our Quaker Governor, Israel Pemberton,
Churchman and Zane and Ferris, and the Friends

Of Western Quarter: these and many more,
Weighty and solid Friends of that old day,
Felt deeply the concern for strongly founding
A school wherein our precious youth might know
And follow the pure precepts of our faith,
"Preserved in innocence" and sober truth,
And trained in piety.

How wondrous quaint

And far away they seem, those early days
Of simple homeliness, when students came
Flooding along rough country roads in gogs
With hair-cloth trunks behind, and found themselves
Here in a rustic world secluded far
From noise of cities, deep amid the hush
Of sylvan solitudes! I see them now,
In fancy's eye,—blithe boys with ruddy cheeks,
Sturdy of frame, loving their outdoor hours
And entering with joy upon their work
In busy school-room, and their wholesome fun
In cutting woodland lanes and building forts
Among the forest trees;—and gentle girls,
Their pure sweet faces framed in dainty caps,
Demure and comely, doing sampler-work
And sauntering in sunny garden walks
Or rambling far adown green forest aisles
To gather flowers and hear the wild birds pour
Their summer songs across the fragrant air:—

A little world of youth, whose characters
Were moulded in the ways of courtesy,
Of Christian virtue and of loving-kindness,
By teachers cheerful-hearted, wise, humane,
Of sober carriage, men and women of worth,
Whose names are like a bead-roll of pure strength
And solid virtues. If I name John Comly
And Enoch Lewis and Benjamin Halliwell,
And Davis Reece, Rebecca Kite, Ann Thomas,
And Eliza Pickering; with Superintendents
And their dear motherly helpmates,—Sharplesses, Whittals, the kindly Priests, Passmores, Snowdons,
It is but to suggest the long full line
Of sterling men and women who have shaped
The destinies of Westtown through the years
That ever found her true unto the hopes
And visions of her founders.

Now in peace

They sleep, those honored ones, so well beloved,
So warmly cherished, and the sweet will rose
Flings down her petals on their quiet graves
In many a lone God's-acre where their names
Are writ on lowly marble, while the pines
And weeping willows ehant soft requiems
Are made immortal by the work they wrought
At olden Westtown, where they nourished souls
That grew up mindful of their great Creator,
Teaching things lovely and of good report,
By precept and by practice they portrayed
The beauty and the dignity of service,
The gracious charm of simple, peaceful ways,
Life's sweet sincerity.

O ancient School,

So rich in antique worth, so venerable,
So blest with noble memories,—thy halls
Thy pine trees shadowing the emerald turf,
Thy tranquil gardens and thy woodland glades,
And all thy nameless and abiding beauty,
Are outward symbols of the precious spirit
That lives within thee, making more beloved
Thy name with every season as it flows
Adown the tides of God's eternal years.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE GIRL WHO DID AND THE BOY WHO DIDN'T.—First, I will tell you about "the boy who didn't." It was this way,—he had a step-mother who had children of her own, and a father who was always busy, and no one took very much interest in the boy, and yet he was one who craved sympathy more than most boys do. And so he got to spending the nights out in a friend's home, without telling his family about it. And one day he found his friend's postal-saving cash-book, and thought how much he had always wanted a kodak, but could not get the money. And so he took twenty yen from the friend who trusted him, and bought his kodak. But I think he never got much pleasure from it. Now it happened that the boy had gone to First-day school at one time, and his First-day school teacher heard about the twenty yen and the kodak, and she was wishing that there was some way to help that boy. And surprisingly enough, a way came. He came to her door that night and allowed himself to be brought in. Yes, he confessed it all, and he cried, and felt wretchedly unhappy, but most of all he feared that his father would hear. That he should go home and tell his father all about it, and get the whole miserable secret out of his system, and begin over again,—that was the message he heard that night, and he went home at ten o'clock promising to do so; but he failed—he never told—he was too weak, after all. Will he ever regain the moral ground he lost then? He may, but it is going to be very hard.

And now for "the girl who did." She is just about the same age as the boy and is going to the first year of High School. One night the matron of her dormitory—the same teacher, by the way, as the one who talked to "the boy who didn't"—heard her crying in her room, and called her to her. What was the matter? No, nothing was the matter. Well, then, if the teacher must know, it was something she had done herself—she had been bad. What was it? Well, in to-day's geography examination, she had opened her book, and found the answer to one of the questions. And the thing that surprised her about it most, was, that now she should be crying about it. She had never cared before very much, when she did wrong,—never enough to cry. Again came the same message from her teacher,—she must go back to school and tell all about it. And she was "the girl who did," so you know what happened. She was a hero in a way for it took lots of courage, and she lost her good grade, but never mind, she got something much better.

You see that Japanese boys and girls have very much the same problems to meet that American boys and girls have, only I think that those who come from non-Christian homes, have less home guidance to start them right. We want more Christian homes, and we want more boys and girls who do.

BUYING A SPOOL OF THREAD IN JAPAN.—Nearly all the streets in the villages and cities of Japan are lined with little shops. The fronts of these open on to the street like stalls during the day and the articles for sale are displayed in gorgeous array. Only the more modern stores in the larger places have "show window" or a "Look Window," as one sign in English reads. At night the things are all moved back and the wooden shutters which close the shops make the streets look like rows of little sheds dark and cheerless. Back of the shop are other rooms which with the up-stairs, if there is an up-stairs, are the home for the family. This is very convenient, for then the whole family can help tend shop and no one need wait for dinner for they can keep a careful eye on the street during a meal. If the shop is one for cloth or similarly clean articles, the floor is usually elevated from the street about two feet, and the regular Japanese straw mats cover it. At the front, on the ground level, the floor may be of cement or just dirt, so they can come under roof and leave their wooden street clogs. A forerunner usually sits on the edge of the mat, leaving the feet on the ground while he waits, and wait he must, as the following story will show.

The other day I went with a newcomer to Japan into a little shop where only thread and things made of thread are sold. We told the man we wanted brown silk thread. He brought a number of skeins as large as our wrists and let us choose size and color. We then told the amount we wanted by weight, in Japanese terms. He brought out a tiny little balance scale like old-fashioned steelyards, only this one was made of wood and string. From a drawer he took a spool and weighed it. Then the skein of thread was put on a little reel, and the spool on a little wheel. Both reel and wheel are much like those our grandmother used long ago, only they are very low to permit the user to sit on the mat. Then he turned the wheel and wound off the thread. Some times the thread would tangle and he would stop for a time to untangle the snarl, then turn merrily again. When he thought he had wound off nearly enough, he weighed it again. It was not quite enough so whirr went the little wheel and the spindle whirled too. At last it was right. He broke the thread, wrapped the spool in soft paper, and tied it with a paper string. We gave him twenty sen, took the thread, exchanged bows and departed. The lady with me thought it was a tedious process, but I told her she might be thankful he wound the thread on a spool instead of a piece of paper, for had he done that, as often they do, she would have had to wind it all by hand before she could use it on the sewing machine.—EDITH NEWLIN.

WILLIAM JAMES.*

First of all, I must make a protest against the outrageous price charged for these two volumes of letters. They cost ten dollars. They are, of course, a beautiful piece of book-making. But it would be well if some one could persuade the Atlantic Monthly to take up the problem of disseminating good, cheap literature. It publishes for rich patrons and much of the cost goes into unnecessarily expensive workmanship and materials. I have no doubt that there are adequate reasons in high wages, the cost of paper, and the necessity of a twelve per cent. return on capital, that would be urged in return. But not so long ago one purchased for five dollars Morley's two-volume "Life of Gladstone," that contains more than three times the amount of material and must have taken fifty times the amount of research and editing. Or, to take another comparison: Well's "Outline of History" has more than twice as much actual material, and think what an immense amount of reading and labor was expended upon that book. Yet it costs but little more than these two volumes of James's letters.

The high price of this book is particularly unfortunate because the very class of persons who will be most interested in it are those who are least able to afford to buy it. Thousands of school teachers in this country and doubtless in England are under obligation to William James. Not only have they studied his Psychology; they have read his "Talks to Teachers," and probably many of them have made further explorations into his stimulating essays and philosophical books. The very fact that a mere teacher could have so wide an influence was in itself good for the profession.

Friends should have a special interest in William James on account of his "Varieties of Religious Experience." These studies in mystical exaltations and vagaries are an almost indispensable background to a full appreciation of the type of religious feeling that has come down to us from our predecessors. James's father, Henry, was, in religious matters, a free lance, engaged most of the time in combats a outrance against orthodox religion and elaborating his own interpretation of Swedenborgian doctrine. But he was very religious, and although his son William threw off all conventional religious trappings, as became a Harvard professor of philosophy, his own nature was essentially a religious nature and this fact determined his attitude towards many philosophical questions.

* "The Letters of William James," edited by his son, Henry James. Atlantic Monthly Press.

In a number of the letters he observes that he had had no religious experience himself, but he did not for a moment question the validity of the experience of others. He was one of the first Americans to pay any attention to the proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research. Most of his colleagues at Harvard and elsewhere were contemptuous of the whole question of thought transference and the problems of the subliminal self. James patiently examined mediums, and took evidence in cases of mind reading, all in the spirit of an impartial scientist who withholds judgment until complete evidence is in. Some of the letters are on this aspect of his work, of which he became very tired in his later years.

One of James's closest friends and most cheerfully belabored philosophic enemies was Josiah Royce. If all scholars could learn to attack each other with the good-natured severity that these two employed in their many years of loving each other and despising each other's philosophy, there would be less jealousy and bitterness in the world of scholarship. In conversation, in letters, and in their books, they attacked each other, hammer and tongs. They were of fundamentally different temperaments. Royce was the modern incarnation of the older theologians whose chief interest was to establish the glory and majesty of God; James's philosophy was the first fruits of modern democracy with its insistence upon the value of the individual. It seems to be true that theories reflect to some extent political conditions. Most of the theological thought even of to-day finds its inspiration in systems that were worked out in the days when every one accepted as a matter of course the fitness of some man or government to claim absolute power, in whose sight subjects were negligible units, existing to serve and magnify their king. The conception of God was very similar. Man existed chiefly for the glory of God and in himself was a despicable, sinful creature of the dust. Royce belonged to that school of philosophers who logically work out the necessity for a complete, omniscient, pervading spirit, for whom time and space do not exist; a completed circle; in philosophic terms, the Absolute. This Spirit is God as usually thought of.

A classical example of this attitude towards God and man is found in the first book of "Paradise Lost." Milton has just been describing Satan as he lay in the sea of fire:

"So stretched out huge in length the Arch-Fiend lay, Chained on the burning lake; nor ever thence
Had risen, or heaved his head, but that the will
And high permission of all-ruling Heaven
Left him at large to his own dark designs,
That with reiterated crimes he might
Heap on himself damnation, while he sought
Evil to others, and enraged might see
How all his malice served but to bring forth
Infinite goodness, grace and mercy shewn
On Man by him seduced, but on himself
Treble confusion, wrath, and vengeance poured."

That is to say, Satan was let go in order that, when he had seduced mankind, God might have the glory of forgiving men their sins. It is not a cheerful thought.

But Royce felt the difficulties of the absolute system, for it reduces the individual man to a hollow shell. He felt that no one in these days is much impressed by the thought of living for the glory of God; that this seemed to many persons an unworthy conception of God. No good man wants others to live for his glory and a God who wants this seems less than a good man. Consequently Royce spent a large part of his time trying to do a very difficult thing: to reconcile the idea that God is absolutely complete in every way with the idea that any individual can have any real significance.

Now James started from exactly the other side of the problem. He began with the individual. He insisted that the individual was significant first and then he worked out his idea of God from what is compatible with that assumption. He is then a typical philosopher of a democratic age with its insistence on the individual and its lessened respect for authority and majesty and Divine right of kings or governments.

It is this insistence that a man has the making or the marring of his life in his own keeping that makes James's books so stimulating. He is in philosophy what Browning is among poets. Indeed, he more than once in these letters expresses his delight in Browning's poetry, and the two men had much in common. I need not try to trace out here the results to which James's speculation carried him. He met with a good deal of contemptuous opposition from all classes of philosophers, partly because he wrote his books so that they could be understood by ordinary readers; partly because his ideas were so flatly opposed to the prevailing philosophical thought, which was almost wholly a re-hashing of the ideas of the great German thinker, Emanuel Kant, and were largely devoted to the elaborating of theories of the Absolute. This contempt or indifference James met with good humor, prophesying that his opponents were engaging in the futile swan songs of a dying system of thought. Some support he had both in this country and in Europe. He hailed with vociferous joy Bergson's "Creative Evolution," which indeed is a deeper and more complete working out of the ideas for which James had been battling for many years.

The following anecdote which James tells to a correspondent in England will perhaps bring home clearly his attitude towards the problem of current philosophical thought in the early nineties. A child asked his mother if God made the world in six days. "Yes." "The whole of it?" "Yes." "Then it is all finished, all done?" "Yes." "Then in what business is God now?"

Of course, the individualism that results from a too literal application of the supreme value of the human unit is often either dangerous or absurd. Its absurdity was very well illustrated in an exhibition of recent art that was held lately at the Academy of Fine Arts in Philadelphia. Most of the painters were a law unto themselves; consequently they are the only ones who could interpret their own pictures, which to the casual eye were meaningless daubs. Some of the recent poetry gives another expression of rampant individualism, where again, writers follow no set rules and fall into unintelligible self-expression. What seems to many persons an objectionable freedom in manners and dress that characterizes the rising generation is still another expression of the theory that the individual is a law unto himself. And yet most persons in this country would consider conscientious objection to military service a still more fantastic application of this philosophy. To tell the truth, it is very difficult to draw a happy medium between servile obedience to law and custom, and the lawless vagaries of untrammelled freedom.

So much for James as a philosopher. Turning to the letters themselves, readers of Stevenson's letters will note a similarity between the two epistolary styles. Both are ejaculatory, familiar, conversational, intimate; there is much current slang, intentional bad grammar, old and tried family jokes, and even in the midst of a serious discourse on the nature of the universe an irrepressible broadside of humor. And with it all constant assurances of love for a very great variety of persons.

The letters fall into several categories. There are affectionate, gossip, playful letters to his wife and children; letters to his brother, Henry, urging him to change his literary style, admiring its perfection if one must write that way at all, defending America amidst some impatience at her way of eating eggs and talking in a high-pitched voice; many letters on philosophical subjects written to friends who were writing books; letters describing his adventures in the Adirondacks, where he went for a great many of his vacations. As is natural, the variety of topics is great; books old and new and of all sorts and languages are often discussed and vigorously characterized; there is a good deal of comment on current politics; there are spicy accounts of his many travels; accounts of the new psychology department at Harvard and the additions to the teaching force, and the many problems connected with the expansion of what became America's greatest school of philosophical thought, make up another large part of the letters. He touched, first or last, on nearly every topic of common or uncommon interest, and, as was said of Goldsmith, nullum inquit quod non ornavit.

Some of the most interesting passages are his comments on public affairs and persons of note. He was studying in Germany at the time of the Franco-Prussian war. A victory for Germany he strongly felt would be a victory for progress and he was intensely disgusted with France. Cleveland's Venezuela message in 1895 "horried him." He was bitterly disappointed at the American conquest of the Philippines. McKinley and Roosevelt he despised, as incarnations of militant imperialism. The smug ranting and hypocrisy of Kipling's poetry, with its varnish of "manifest destiny" and call of God to civilize the world, filled him with rage. For H. G. Wells he had great admiration. In his letters are many comparisons of national as well as individual temperaments. On the whole, he reacted as the average Anglo-Saxon does to the French, although he greatly admired many individual Frenchmen; at the Germans he pokes a good deal of fun, but he had the greatest admiration for their thoroughness and patient effort. Unlike his brother, Henry, he was a staunch American. (It may help some readers to keep this family straight, to point out that the generations were as follows: Henry James, Senior, the Swedenborgian; his sons, Henry James, the novelist, and William; William's son, Henry, the editor of these letters.) In spite of numerous visits to Europe and a wide knowledge of European literature and art and a variety of friendships in England, France and Germany, he always insisted that, under the crudeness of America, there was genuine worth, and a great future ahead. In this he was at one with Royce, whose lecture on America, "The Glory of the Imperfect," is a sane and inspiring expression of patriotism.

A few quotations will allow readers to feel the quality of the letters for themselves.

James was at Nauheim, Germany, for the sake of his health, in the summer of 1900. From there he writes to Royce:—

"BELOVED ROYCE:—Great was my, was our pleasure in receiving your long and delightful letter last night. Like the lioness in Æsop's fable, you give birth to one young one only in the year, but that one is a lion. I give birth mainly to guinea-pigs in the shape of post-cards; but despite such diversities of epistolary expression, the heart of each of us is in the right place. I need not say, my dear old boy, how touched I am at your expression of affection, or how it pleases me to hear that you have missed me. I, too, miss you profoundly. I do not find in the hotel waiters, chambermaids and bath attendants with whom my lot is chiefly cast, that unique mixture of erudition, originality, profundity and vastness, and human wit and leisureliness, by accustoming me to which you have spoiled me for inferior kinds of intercourse. You are still the centre of my gaze, the pole of my mental magnet. When I write, 'tis with one eye on the page, and one on you. When I compose my Gifford lectures mentally, 'tis with the design exclusively of overthrowing your system, and ruining your peace. I lead a parasitic life upon you, for my highest flight of ambitious idealism is to become your conqueror and to go down into history as such, you and I rolled in one another's arms and silent (or rather loquacious still) in the last death grapple of an embrace. How then, O my dear Royce, can I forget you, or be contented out of your close neighborhood?"

To his brother Henry, about Henry's "American Scene":—

You know how opposed your whole 'third manner' of execution is to the literary ideals which animate my crude and Orson-like brain, mine being to say a thing in one sentence at straight and explicit as it can be made, and then to drop it forever, your being to avoid naming it straight, but by dint of breathing, and sighing all round and round it, to arouse in the reader who may have had a similar perception already ("Heaven help him if he hasn't"), the illusion of a solid object, made (like the ghost at the Polytechnic) wholly out of impalpable materials, air, and the prismatic interferences of light, ingeniously focused by mirrors upon empty space. But you do it, that's the queerest!"

James was lecturing at Leland Stanford University at the time of the earthquake. He writes of the University:—

"There couldn't be imagined a better environment for an intellectual man to teach and work in, for eight or nine months of the year, if he were then free to spend three or four months in the crowded centres of civilization—for the social insipidity is great here, and the historic vacuum and silence appalling, and one ought to be free to change. Unfortunately the authorities of the University seem not to be gifted with imagination enough to see its proper role. . . . They ought to aim at unique quality all through. . . . Instead of which, they pay small sums to young men who chafe at not being able to travel, and whose wives get worn out with domestic drudgery."

Writing in 1890, he says:—

"I should 'admire' to see the Kiplings again, but it is no go. Now that it is the mightiest force in the formation of the 'Anglo-Saxon character,' I wish he would harken more to his deeper human self and a bit less to his shallower jingo self. If the Anglo-Saxon race would drop its sniveling cant it would have a good deal less of a 'burden' to carry. We're the most loathsomely canting crew that God ever made. Kipling knows perfectly well that our camps in the tropics are not college settlements or our armies bands of philanthropists, slumming it; and I think it a shame that he should represent us to ourselves in that light."

THE TOWN OF THE FRIENDS.

The following appreciation of the beliefs and work of the Friends and practical suggestions for further service appeared in a recent issue of Vienna's leading newspaper from the pen of a prominent authoress of that city:—

From England and America came men and women to Austria in her sore need. They brought food to the hungry, clothes to the needy, and hope to the broken in spirit. They do not spare themselves in their work in the hospitals, children's homes, their own offices and warehouses. Their faces are illumined from within with the knowledge of a better world than the one they see around them. One cannot quarrel in their midst or quite despair. Many of their men during the war refused to kill, and faced imprisonment and death for themselves rather than give up their convictions.

These people preach love of one's neighbor, not only by word of mouth, but in deed, through sacrifice and danger, giving their services and their possessions. They believe that the power of good is stronger than the power of weapons, and must prevail in the end. If the world is to be changed, it is through people like these that the change must come.

During the war, the Friends built up with their own hands in the devastated regions of France houses for the homeless inhabitants. One of these colonies has been named "The Town of the Friends" by the French authorities. Should not such a town be raised in every country which has been disturbed by war, for everywhere the war has made men homeless?

In the city on which the effects of war have fallen most heavily, that is, on Vienna, where the people are nearest to despair, the beginning should be made. Five hundred dollars would build a dwelling house. A colony of several hundred of such houses planned as a town and named "The Town of the Friends" might be made a meeting place of men who have the rebuilding of the world at heart. Each one of the individual houses might be owned by a Friend in England or America who had contributed the money. In the midst of the town could stand an International Home for foreign guests who would come for days, weeks or months, to exchange ideas. What an opportunity this would provide for international co-operation!

Do Friends who read these words feel self-condemned? Are our "faces illumined from within." Is it true that "one cannot quarrel in our midst?" We have reason to be glad that our foreign representatives have not taken with them the differences that mar our life at home. Let us not require of them that they publish abroad our shortcomings, but rather let us try to live up to what the world thinks we are.

HELENE SCHEU, in Vienna's Neue Freie Presse.

THE EYES OF THE CHILDREN OF EUROPE.

What I shall never forget about the children of Europe is the expression in their eyes. They have little thin grey faces,—these children. Their thin little bodies lack the surplus energy which makes our boys romp and "cut shins." They are apathetic children, unchildlike children. They remind me of the speech of the physician in Macbeth: "I fear she hath known what she should not!"

These little ones have known what they should not. They have known mothers who were not strong enough to endow them with healthy bodies at birth. They have known mothers who could not give them nourishment enough to grow on. They have known only a world in which one was always hungry, a world where everybody shivers in winter. They have known anxiety; the Lord's prayer for daily bread they have offered time and again without visible response. Their little thin faces, their starveling bodies haunt me,—but most of all their unchildlike eyes.

CAROLINE G. NORMENT.

THE MISERY IN MY COUNTRY.

(The following narrative was written quite independently by a fourteen-year-old pupil of the public schools of Sohl, Germany.)

If I think of it, I could cry how my mother had to worry and torment herself in order to provide for us eight children. Many a sheet had to be sacrificed in order to become a shirt. Even some quilt-covers were dyed and worked into dresses. When these dresses were torn, my mother had no patches and thread for mending them. She would have liked best to stick the patches on with glue. What should she do now? She had to undo the beautiful crochet-work and use it for mending. When she did not know any more what to do, she went to search in the rag-bag and found a few pieces which were just right. She also found an old skirt and a coat. The skirt was so bad that in former times you would have left it in the rag-bag or even thrown it into the quarry. The only good that was left in it was the lining. This my mother used for making us aprons. There were many thin places in it. Then she took several good pieces from the old coat, patched them together, and made us each the most beautiful aprons of it. She undid old knitted stockings and darned others with them. The wool from the old stockings was very crinkly, so she wet the wool and wound it on a board and dried it. When it was dry it looked just like new wool.

We were not much better off as to shoes. Of some shoes the top leather was still good, but the soles could not be used any more. Then my father bought some chips of leather from the shoemaker and soled the shoes himself. In winter, we made straw shoes. We borrowed a last from the shoemaker. The soaked straw was plaited and formed according to the last.

When we wanted to wash in the morning, we had no soap. As we could not remain dirty, we simply had to wash ourselves with clay. Also kerosene oil was very expensive and there was even none to be had. When my father wanted to dress in the morning, he had to leave the door of the stove open in order to have a little light.

The most important thing we were lacking was the food.

Instead of bread in the morning we had to eat turnips without any potatoes, flour or fat. For dinner we had the same. In the evening we had to go to bed hungry. This was the same every day. The turnips were very much frozen. My mother had to chop them off with a pointed hoe in the village cellar. Then we put them under the stove to thaw. We cut them into slices, boiled them in salt water and ate with joy, because we didn't know anything but turnips.

This was only the description of our meals in winter, for in summer it was still worse because there were no more turnips. Then we only had turnip sour-crust. We only got three pounds of bread a week which lasted from Saturday to Monday. For the rest of the week we had no bread at all. Then we had to look for cabbage and eat it. Also my father took great pains to find something to eat. Every day he brought a bag full of nettles.

Now I want to tell you about a few old people in my native village named Zollfrank. Two sisters live in one room, but one suffers more from need than the other one. The elder has stolen a jacket from her sister. She even stole her last chemise. Now, what shall a woman like that do? She has to lie on her straw-bed day and night. She cannot go begging any more, only when the people bring it to her. When she wants to eat, she has no plate, no spoon, no fork and no knife. She has no basin, so she simply has to take her hand.

KLARA POLEY.

FOUR MONTHS OF NEW LIFE FOR A DOLLAR.

In the semi-darkness of late evening, I was strolling through a side street of Warsaw when I caught sight of a tiny child sitting a few yards away on a large stone by the gutter. She was probably five years old, but like most of the little ones in this unhappy land, was as small as the average child of three. Her little dress was dirty and unkempt hair half covered her face. When she at last felt sufficient interest to look up at me with bloodless cheeks and lifeless eyes, she seemed more like an unhappy little whisper than like a human child. She went on holding her head in one hand as if she were too tired to play and almost too tired to live.

I am writing this to you Americans yonder who read this, to ask you for just one dollar, because your Polish Unit can for a dollar give this child or any child in the cities of Poland a pint of fresh milk every day for four months. Your dollar will transform this unhappy little whisper into a glad little song.

AN AUSTRIAN CHILD'S HYMN OF GRATITUDE.

What can I do?
What shall I say?
All I can give you
Is thanks to-day.
Possessions I have none,
Except a little heart
To love and to thank you
Before you depart.

WILBUR K. THOMAS AND RUFUS M. JONES RETURN THIS WEEK.

Letters and cablegrams that have come from the Executive Secretary and Chairman of our Committee indicate that their visit to the fields is proving valuable. In London they held a conference with the English Friends at which various causes of misunderstanding and confusion were removed. They proceeded then to Germany, where the number of children being fed is now at its maximum of slightly over 1,000,000. From Germany they went on to Poland, and from Poland to Vienna. They will sail for home Seventh Month 2nd, arriving in New York probably Seventh Month 9th.

SHIPMENTS received during week ending Sixth Month 25, 1921—63 packages and boxes received; 3 for German relief; 1 anonymous package.

Contributions for week ending Sixth Month 27, 1921—$43,938.65.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

L. HOLLINGSWORTH Wood has a lively article in The American Friend of Sixth Month 16th, with the caption "Invigorating Sessions of New York Yearly Meeting." One session was held at the Oakwood School and it is recited that when the report stated the need of a gymnasium, Dikran Donehian quietly rose and said: "I should like to give a gymnasium to the school." The following are the closing paragraphs of L. H. W.'s article:—

On the whole, the Yearly Meeting was thought by many Friends to be the strongest, most hopeful, and most affectionate that had been held in New York Yearly Meeting for years.

The Meeting expressed its warm appreciation of the long service of James Wood who had again served as Clerk.

Our friend William W. Henaoek furnishes this item:—
Editor Brooklyn Daily Eagle:—

At the Quarterly Meeting of the Society of Friends, held in the Twentieth Street Meeting House, Manhattan, an interesting statement was made by the treasurer. On the iron fence outside there is a letter box and for some time past the janitor has taken at irregular intervals a letter simply inscribed, "To the Friends," and inclosing a sum of money, generally a $2 bill—nothing else.

The last letter was recently received and in addition to the $2.10 inclosed was a beautiful piece of hand-made lace, fully three yards long and about two inches wide, with a note, "Last, but not least." The Friends were much interested in the anonymous gifts, but have no clue as to the giver, evidently some poor woman.

At the close of the meeting the lace was auctioned off and by the phrase, "last, but not least," it is inferred the donor has left the city.

This year's London Yearly Meeting Epistle appears to have been mentioned and in many cases quoted at some length in a great variety of papers. It has been noted in the Manchester Guardian, Daily News, Daily Chronicle, Star, National News, The People, South Wales Daily News, Birmingham Dispatch, Birmingham Gazette, Northern Echo, Sheffield Independent, Nottingham Journal, Norwich Eastern Daily News, Bath Herald, York Telegraph, Christian World, Birmingham Town Crier, and allied Labor papers. The Church Times, the "High Church" organ, remarks that there is usually something singularly edifying about the annual epistle circulated by the Society of Friends.

HUBERT W. PEET.

Under the heading "A Practical Mystie," an interview with Rufus M. Jones appears in The Christian World (London). The interviewer opens with the remark that:—

"'Practical Mystie' is really a description which is a confession of disappointed ideals. There should be no such implied paradox if we who confess and call ourselves Christian all fitted into Coventry Patmore's definition of a saint as 'some one who does everything that any other decent person does, only somewhat better and with a totally different motive.' However, Dr. Rufus M. Jones, Professor of Philosophy at Haverford College, near Philadelphia, and the well-known writer on mystical religion, is a man who merits both appellations."

At the close of the article the writer says:—"However, I was able to relate a story which greatly pleased the author of several of the staid, standard Quaker history volumes (the last two of which are appearing immediately) of how, when asked the other day to inspect and report on a London Sunday School teachers' library, I discovered his "Double Search" check by jowl with Boocaccio's 'Deceameron,' an unlikely juxtaposition, albeit the latter was in an expurgated edition."—Forwarded by H. W. Peet.

NOTICES.

At Gwynedd Monthly Meeting of Friends, held in Joint Session at Norristown, Sixth Month 26, 1921, it was announced by Joseph Cosand that the First-day School would close on Sixth Month 26th for the summer. It was decided by the Monthly Meeting that the meetings for worship should be held during Seventh, Eighth and Ninth Months at 10.30 A. M., and the Clerk was asked to notify William B. Harvey and also THE FRIEND of the change in time.

Taken from the Minutes,

EMMA D. ROBERTS, Clerk.

ANY of our members who contemplate attending Yearly Meetings of Friends, either Conservative or the "Five Year" group, to be held during the summer or autumn, will confer a favor if they will kindly advise the Yearly Meeting Extension Committee of their intentions.

Special $58,000.00 Fund for Japan.

We again thank those who have responded to our appeal for the Japanese work.

The Amount Now Pledged is $33,905.54.

The Committee thinks it is wise to take a recess during the Summer and to discontinue their effort to raise the balance of the amount needed until the early Autumn, when they hope the full sum necessary may be realized.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

During the war propagandists dinned into our ears that this was a war to save civilization. Not many of us could have told what we meant by civilization, but, nevertheless, it seemed worth saving even to the extent of an unlimited expenditure of what public speakers refer to concisely as "blood and treasure." Now, after the lapse of a few years, we are still of that belief, but unfortunately, the war, instead of saving civilization, has brought it to the point of death. And this is not rhetoric. It states a fear which is beginning to take hold of the minds of common men. And the burden of the message of every man who reflects upon our present calamities is that a supreme effort of thought and will is needed if our few hard won achievements are not to go under in common catastrophe. We have done, thank God! with the parrot cry of reconstruction. Physicians do not talk of reconstructing a patient when he is at his last gasp. And our unofficial advisers are beginning to urge upon us heroic remedies. What we need is Disarmament, is a League of Peoples, is Communism, is a New Morality, is Education, is a Revival of Religion. Perhaps one ought not to disparage any man who has enough alertness and energy to propose a solution, but one sometimes wishes that the conflicting diagnoses and the conflicting remedies did not come upon us quite so fast.—Professor Charles A. Bennett, of Yale University, on "Back to Methuselah."

I had always known that civilization needs a religion, as a matter of life or death.—G. Bernard Shaw.

"INDUSTRY FOR PUBLIC SERVICE AND NOT FOR PROFIT."

Expressions like the above are increasingly frequent in current religious and social writing and discussion. Several of our Yearly Meetings, a great variety of Church Councils, as well as socialistic organizations, are making pronouncements with this import. Sometimes the expression is made more caustic. Out of the report of London Yearly Meeting we get, "Service substituted for servitude." When put in this radical way opposition is stirred and crimination and recrimination is passed about. Servitude? Who believes in servitude? Must the leaders of industry plead guilty to such a charge? Indeed, many of them feel that service has been the keynote of their interests; they have been held to exacting toil, to tormenting responsibilities, for others; certainly not for themselves.

In considering such new phases of thought nothing is more important than to articulate them to past thinking and performance. When progress is made we must pass from the known to the unknown, unless we are born revolutionists. Such seem to believe in destruction first, and reconstruction afterwards. The educational process as pointed out from recent commencement platforms in more than one place, involves this progress from the known to the unknown,—a conscious use of the resources of the past. So let us ask frankly what professions, what industries, have had service as a dominant note in the past? We may thus establish for ourselves a first step of understanding of the new social and industrial philosophy. Four professions, the law, medicine, the ministry and teaching, have been classed as "service professions." The law has hardly maintained this character; even medicine in many cases has become standardized as to fees and too often, it is to be feared, ready to victimize the helpless in exorbitant charges; the ministry and teaching have rarely got away from the sway of service as the dominant motive holding men and women to them. Apart from such exceptions as here noted, these four professions do furnish an opportunity to isolate the "service germ," if we may borrow a term from the laboratory, and study its processes. Do we get any very encouraging result? The U. S. Department of Education has been giving some startling figures in regard to this subject. In our whole territory there are hundreds of closed schools from lack of teachers. The service motive in this field frankly seems to be worn out. The general effort now is to substitute for it "adequate compensation." This motive and the service motive, we say, are not incompatible. But when is compensation adequate? Certainly the profession of teaching cannot survive if its rewards in money are to be brought into competition with the large returns of business enterprises. The conflict between service and profit in this field opens up chapters of profound depth in the spiritual world. There, and there only, can the case be determined.

Various religious organizations, the Churchman Afield and our religious weeklies have been stressing the crisis in the "profession of the ministry." The young men are not in training, are not going into training, for the pulpit. Even a Society like ours which cherishes the principle of an unprofessional prophetic ministry is not without serious reflexes of this situation. Naturally we ask what is the matter with public service as a motive to action? Has the competition of materialism honeycombed even the spiritual foundations of Society?

It may not be unprofitable to ask questions in another direction. What are the evils to be corrected by substituting service for profit? What is the inherent evil in profit? Does the motive of service actually eliminate the desire of profit? Is it profit that is objected to, or the accumulation of profit called wealth that is evil? At once these questions are asked, we realize how hopeless it is, in the present stage of society and industry, to formulate answers that will satisfy any large circle even of our friends. The late Carlton Parker in his brief but meteoric career was constantly emphasizing behavioristic psychology as furnishing keys to industrial and social problems. His success as a pacificator was due to his ability to use these keys. Service of course was one of them—a sort of master key, but even profit (the word has such different meanings) seemed in his discussions to play a natural and important part.

Let us welcome the efforts to Christianize the social order, let us be outspoken against greed and tyranny of every form, but do not let us delude ourselves into thinking that human nature in the twentieth century is other than complex. There is magic in such slogans as "industry for service not profit," there are manifest changes possible to bring to pass by new organization and by law many desirable ends. Some of these may seem very radical because we see only the reverse side. Any progress that is made because capital and labor have become more Christian is permanent gain. That does open a field for us all. We may be puzzled by the new theories and by the aims of some of our ardent reformers. We must in some measure, all of us, have dealings with our fellows. We can do that, even under the weight of present conditions, so as to advance the Kingdom of God. In the final analysis service is spirit and not form. Under the dreadful system of human slavery, as we knew it in the South, there were numberless instances of a devoted service on the part of our Negro brethren that can hardly be paralleled in history. A bad system yielded a wonderful fruit of service. Can we guarantee that a right system that we have in mind will always do so? Of course we want the right system, but let us not expect the impossible from it. The right system must be matched with a human nature that has been made right by the love of God. Selfishness defeats service whether the system is right or wrong. When we can convince men that selfishness is itself the ultimate failure we have made a great forward step. And in this field also we can each find a work to do. Under a glaring light of self-examination we may find that what we have called our service savors of selfishness.

TRENTON AND STONY BROOK MEETINGS.

FIFTH MONTH 29, 1921.

The appointed meeting at Stony Brook, near Princeton, N. J., held Fifth Month 29, claimed the interest of four persons in the station of minister, besides a number of other Friends; two of the former feeling drawn to attend the morning meeting at Trenton, began the day with a delightful morning ride of twenty-five miles by auto in order to reach their objective.

Trenton meeting is well worthy the attention of visiting Friends. Situated in a retired part of the city, the well-kept premises present an inviting appearance. The house itself is delightfully cozy and comfortable in all its appointments; so that one would have to look far in order to find a Friends' place of worship more inviting or conducive to its high purpose. Among the seats some years since left vacant here, is the one of that saintly woman, Elizabeth C. Dunn, whose inspiring messages in Gospel love used here to flow forth to her companions in worship.

We, as "strangers within the gates" that morning, were partakers of the striking contrast here afforded between our way of worship and that of a neighboring congregation assembled at the same hour. The one, with mute lips, amid a reign of silence, ask God to enter in and possess our souls for such service as fits His will; the other, with trained choral voice and deep-toned organ strains approach the Majesty on High with hymn of adoration and of praise.

This meeting was to us a time of renewed spiritual strength, and with the addition of refreshment to our physical being, afforded at the restful home of two of its members, the journey was resumed towards the main objective of the day. In this, as in the morning ride, one could scarcely fail of being struck with the abounding outward signs of plenty and prosperity. Fields of waving grain and sweet-scented clover; meadows dotted with herds, leisurely grazing or reposing amid plentiful green pasture, and seemingly contented with their life's vicissitudes. Fine mansions are passed in rapid succession, with lawns sloping to the roadside, and tastefully set with trees and shrubbery which "half reveal and half conceal the privacy within," until, at length, in the far distance, looming far above the tree tops, is seen the inspiring Gothic tower of the Princeton Graduate School. The famed Lawrenceville Boys' Preparatory School with its inviting campus, along with a glimpse of the cosy cottage of the headmaster, compels uplifting thought.

It is on the verge of this Presbyterian realm of education and culture, even so early as two hundred years ago, that a settlement was made by Friends. Soon we cross a bridge a stream that engages our attention with its beauty and purling freshness. A moment later, and we have reached the grounds of Stony Brook meeting-house. How wide the contrast! Close by, in years past, once rolled the din of battle. This afternoon the environment is all suggestive of peace and loveliness. Flowers bloom, birds sing, while the air breathes forth the odor of vernal wood and fragrant grass. Friends greet Friends with quiet and neighborly accents. Even the two trusty Italian keepers of the premises are not to be outdone as they warmly welcome the Quaker to his own.

"Whose arch of stone Is rounded in the stream—"

Stony Brook meeting dates from 1709. The present house from 1760. The property includes a considerable space of ground, tillable and woodland, with commodious dwelling, for the support of the whilom schoolmaster, his horse and cow. The little school house has long since disappeared. Thus we see how well the minute of the Yearly Meeting of 1778 was carried into effect: "That, in the compass of each meeting where the settlement of a school is necessary, a lot of ground be provided sufficient for a garden, orchard, grass for a cow, etc., and that a suitable house, stable, etc., be erected thereon." The graveyard is of large extent, is surrounded by a stone wall with wooden coping, all being ideally kept up through the use of an ample maintenance fund. Within the enclosure have been interred many who worshipped here, and a considerable number who by ancestral connection with Friends, though not members, have here found their last resting-place. Among the latter are two persons, at least, of distinction, a signer of the Declaration of Independence (Richard Stockton), and a governor of the State (Charles S. Olden).*

Such is the environment and historic setting of Stony Brook Meeting, almost shut out from the world, and yet so close to one of the world's greatest seats of learning. From 1878 to 1914 the house was not opened for worship, but since that time almost every year one or more meetings have been held. And so this beautiful First-day afternoon for which we speak once again the quaint old structure awoke to living service. Upon the rude forms upwards of a hundred persons from near and far were seated as the meeting gathered into stillness before God,—a stillness that seemed only to gather force and meaning from the bird songs that floated in at the open door and windows. This silent waiting ere long became vocal through a prayer that seemed in an unusual degree to draw the assembly into oneness of access to that Being in whose name it had come together. Worship, to be effective, means infinitely more than a mere passive state of receptivity. With all the mind, body, soul and spirit must man enter the sanctuary if he would experience to the full that living power which brings under review all the good and all that is worst in his nature.

"Let not him that seeks ease until he find.

When he finds he shall wonder;

When he wonders, he shall reign;

And when he reigns, he shall rest."

How fitting, then, was the primary word of exhortation which, early in the meeting, went forth from the Friend through whose concern it had been appointed: "And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."

WALTER L. MOORE.

THE LONDON EPISTLE.

[We are indebted to our friend Mary Newhall for the following.—Eds.]

In The Church Times (English) is the following comment on the annual Epistle issued by the Society of Friends after their Yearly Meeting. It speaks of the custom, unbroken since 1605, then says: "This year the Epistle addressed to Friends everywhere takes the form of a call to a willingness, where truth and justice are concerned, to risk our comfortable lives and follow the way of Christ in its power of a creative and recreative love, which is the only answer to the way of chaos. The message, treating of the aftermath of war, speaks of the peace that is not yet peace; 'the partial disarmament that has taken place is upon no sure basis of good-will.' The message speaks of a vision of a new Society where men are united together by the sense of the life of one loving spirit in all. The ground for the Friends' faith in the practical reality of this vision lies in their Quaker experiment of practicing the presence of God in their fellow-men." There follows an extract from the Epistle.—(Summary The Church Times, Sixth Month 3, 1921).

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

Arthur Rowntree hoped we should go down far deeper than a superficial search respecting the studies to which we introduced our young people. In our own schools, as well as other public schools, there was an inadequacy in religious instruction. There was a large number of middle-class boys and girls who were more or less satisfied with things as they are. At one end of the scale, however, there was immense dissatisfaction with existing things, and an anxiety to get into touch with a God not too far above us, who could share our lives with us. That was a widely prevalent feeling among the boys and girls of England. At the other end were those who confessed they could not see, as a result of their study, any evidence of any God at all. There was hardly anything boys were not thinking about, and it would not do for Friends to stick to their own sectional beliefs. He would suggest three or four things that might help; in the first place, Bible teaching should be reasonable and constructive, and the Bible could be so taught. As a boy had recently said of one of his teachers, "He teaches the Bible so interestingly that you don't know it is the Bible." Friends needed clear thinking over these things. From their earliest years we ought to familiarize the children with the idea of the indwelling Spirit. We must also remember all the time that it is a way of life of which we are thinking. But all our preparations would be useless unless they were held together by the general teaching and atmosphere of the school.

The Clerk framed a minute . . . asking the Central Education Committee to consider the subject in all its bearings and report to the Yearly Meeting of 1922.

OUR DISTINCTIVE MESSAGE (AT HOME).

A. Neave Brayshaw, introducing the first item, urged that we should not be satisfied with rendering the help which only extended to food, but seek to give that which led to the healing of wounded souls and a vision of God, the evil mind being transformed into the right mind. It was the business of the Christian Church to supply the need of the world outside, not merely its physical need, to bring people to that life of God which Jesus Christ had shown. In seeking to attain that object there were things that had to be done on the way, not in substitution for the great spiritual end, but as assistant means thereto. There was a danger in separating the religious and the secular. We needed to draw together into the spiritual place, the place of God, where we should get the inspiration for our work. Would it be true to say that we had allowed philanthropy to overshadow other more important things? The spiritual tie was the only thing that would really hold us together, that fellowship in the life of the Spirit, that wonderful bond which united Friends in the earlier days. Circumstances might make us consider what could be done without money, and in that respect we might qualify ourselves to deliver a spiritual message to the world. Let us faithfully fulfil individual responsibility, becoming missionaries, whether it were in the East or in our own homes. The people who were going to build a new world were, said he, the people who had a hold on God, who already had received a vision of God.

AN AMERICAN CONCERN.

Rachel B. Braithwaite said that Abner and Ella Newlin had brought before some Friends their sense of concern to meet with the Yearly Meeting in some quiet opportunity, having at present failed to find such in the stress of business. They and their friends concluded that the lengthened meeting for worship on the following Third-day morning would afford a good opportunity for expression of the concern.

The arrangement was assented to.

THE STATE OF THE SOCIETY.

The Norfolk Appeal.—At the request of W. C. Braithwaite, the Quarterly Meeting minute was read. One paragraph follows:—

"While recognizing that much good work is being done in many ways by Friends, we feel that it is largely the result of enthusiasm on the part of the few rather than the work of the Society as a whole. In too many of our meetings for worship up and down the country, the silence, we fear, has grown into a ritual, and is not a sacramental feast. A silence which is dead is driving away many both of our young people and of those who were attracted to the Society because of its testimony to a 'True Way of Life,' expressed by its advocacy of Peace and reconstruction of national life."

Joseph Burt-Davy said in part: "Did we not need a fresh realization of the meaning of the word 'worship'? Worship involved confession and absolution. Before we could worship God we must realize our sins and seek His forgiveness. Then we were free to serve Him. Worship meant communion and praise, and the sacrifice of self on the altar of service. Let Friends consider the preparations that members of other Churches made for coming fittingly to worship. We were not all called upon to preach, but we should all pray, silently or vocally. All of us could at least hold up the hands of those who did take an active part. Our meetings required enlightened ministers, and to make more of the offices of elder and overseer. Another important point was the offering of a welcome to strangers who attended. He had known of a meeting attended by American visitors where not a single member of the meeting offered them a word of greeting. If this concern took hold of the Yearly Meeting what were we going to do about it? The mention of the subject in the General Epistle was not enough. We had our own individual responsibility. Friends must continue the visitation of the meetings, some of them very small, and consisting in the main of two or three families. Those for whom he spoke felt there was a great need of the interchange of ministry in London Yearly Meeting.

John Henry Barlow said that personality was one of the secrets of spiritual work, and he invited every individual present prayerfully to consider whether his own personality should not be devoted to his particular meeting for worship. Were we prepared to devote personality and power to the revival of our meetings, we could all do something. With the wonderful message of the Society, how could it be that any of our meetings were, as was said, dull or dead? God was seeking that we should place ourselves at His disposal, that He might use our lips for His great evangel.

THE BOOK OF DISCIPLINE, PART I.

The lines on which the new book proceeded were, in the forefront, a series of vital personal experiences of all stages of the life of the Society, then one or two general statements concerning the whole field of Christian faith, then a section relating to God and Christ, with, further, one on the general Way of Life, on which last the new book contained much material. The volume now before the Meeting, the Committee felt, would give expression to the vital truth committed to our Society. It was the vitality, as well as other points of the book, which commended it to Friends. The Committee felt that in the task committed to them, as they said in the words of the extract narrating the voyage of the Woodhouse, "We went forth and gathered sticks and kindled a fire and left it burning."

Edward Grubb thought the way in which the matter had come before us had been a signal proof of the abundance of spiritual guidance open to us if the Society sought for it. In the earlier stages he had been warned about entering upon the proposed revision, and even that it might result in separation; but instead of that, it had helped to unite the Society in a way that it had not been for some time past. Though not thinking alike, Friends found substantial unity in life and thought as expressed in this book. Two small additions might be useful if on the back of the title page there could be a third extract from letters of the early Friends; one, that is, from William Penn, referring to that conformity of mind and practice to the Divine will which denotes a person truly as a child of God. He thought the paragraphs on the Cross of Christ were hardly sufficient. The book would be helped by an addition expressing what George Fox was constantly preaching,—"the Cross is the power of God;" something which would show that the Cross went to the root of our lives and reconciled us to God and to each other.

Eventually a minute was arrived at expressing the thankfulness of the Yearly Meeting for the labors of the Conference and Committees, and approving the volume substantially.

THE MENNONITES.

The Council for International Service, referring to a minute of the Meeting for Sufferings on the subject of the Mennonites, asked that representatives of the Yearly Meeting might be appointed to attend the forthcoming annual meeting of the Mennonites, in Holland, as requested by the Chairman of that body.

Frederick Merttens recalled the great service rendered by American Mennonites in relief work in Europe during the war. They felt very much drawn to Friends and they were now face to face again with conscription. Each church stood very much alone, and they wanted the assistance of Friends to organize themselves and to strengthen their resistance to all war and appeals to violence.

John Morland thought if the Mennonites called to us to go over and help them we could not do otherwise. Perhaps we were more closely allied in spirit with the Mennonites than with any other religious body.

WEEK-END CONFERENCE AT WESTTOWN SCHOOL.

On First-day, Fifth Month 22nd, a conference was held at Westtown School under the auspices of the Young Friends' Committee in order to give all the scholars, and the Seniors especially, some definite ideas of what it means to be a Quaker. The conference comprised three talks—the first one given by Agnes L. Tierney during the usual Scripture time, entitled "The Great Decision and its Effects on Personal Outlook and Church Government;" one by Clarence L. Pickett on "The Great Experience and its Effects on Active Life," and in evening collection J. Henry Scattergood took as his subject, "The Great Adventure and the Doing Away with War."

A great majority of the Senior, First and Second classes gathered in the library at nine-twenty First-day morning to listen to Agnes Tierney, who opened her talk with a sketch of George Fox, the great founder of the Society of Friends. As everyone knows, George Fox wandered around a long time interviewing scholars and ministers in search of the Truth, which he finally found in his own heart. He believed that everybody had a little of the Divine fire within them and that they would be given more light as they were able to bear it. That is one of the fundamental beliefs of the Friends today, and another that is always coupled with it is the belief that God speaks directly to the human heart and gives His messages to those whom He deems worthy to bear them. Agnes Tierney also spoke of many other sects that started a long time before the Quakers were recognized. Those of the Renaissance especially, which, at the time of their foundation, had as their leaders good, pure and purposeful men, but which, as time went on, became corrupt, filled with meaningless ritual and presided over by unscrupulous ministers. Coming back to modern times, she mentioned the fact that the characteristic plain dress of the Quakers was becoming obsolete and that it seemed best to let it become so, although in former times it marked its wearers as people to be trusted and strangers came to them for help. Besides the disappearance of the plain dress, the plain speech is much less in use. However, it is to be hoped that its use will not be dropped in the immediate families of Friends.

During "quiet hour" in the afternoon, Clarence L. Pickett met with a large group on the south lawn under the pine trees. The audience made themselves comfortable against tree trunks and on steamer rugs, and the beauty of the afternoon was a fitting background for his subject: "The Great Experience and its Effect in Active Life." After one has made the great decision then the great experience comes and out of that experience one must help others. One of the best things is to carry it into everyday life. Perhaps you think it is easy to be democratic, but there are very few people who are in the habit of traveling first-class who will involuntarily make an ocean crossing in the steerage. Clarence Pickett and some of his friends undertook this experiment, and he told about a steward that waited on them. This steward did everything in his power to make them comfortable, and as the voyage drew to a close these men wanted to give him some money, but not in the form of a tip. So they collected a certain sum and gave it to the boy with a letter which they all signed, telling him that they hoped he could use their present to improve his mind or some other equal advantage. From then, until the end of the trip, the boy treated them in a man to man fashion and not as if he were serving them in the capacity of a slave. They had shown him to be worthy of respect and he had appreciated their thought very much. This all goes to show that the custom of tipping as it now stands is not democratic because it is really an insult to offer money to a person for a service because it shows that you consider him inferior to yourself.

At seven-thirty the whole school gathered in the meeting-room to be addressed by J. Henry Scattergood on "The Great Adventure and the Doing Away with War." His main theme was disarmament, and he explained very clearly and explicitly the great crisis that the world faces today in international affairs. One wonders what the government at Washington is thinking of in demanding such huge sums for army and navy appropriations when there is no nation, except Japan, that has enough men or money to carry on another war, especially against us, the most powerful nation on the earth to-day. If there should be another war, it would not be just a question of fighting in the trenches, for men, women and children would be wiped out by the city fall because scientists, and American scientists among others, have developed terrible invisible gases that cannot be escaped. It is, therefore, up to the American people and to the Friends as peaceful members of the nation, to see that the United States does not instigate or aid another great war. It has been said by a famous American general that the responsibility for the next war will be upon the heads of the people that call themselves Christians.

After the evening meeting, the girls met Agnes Tierney in the Senior parlor and the boys had a talk with Henry Scattergood on their Senior porch.

Although this conference was shorter and rather more intangible than the one held in the winter, still it has been of great interest and benefit to those who have attended. It did a great deal in the way of opening up to us what our duties are and what will be expected of us as Friends.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

[The future peace of the world is very much involved in our present-day education. Friends will be pleased to see the result of the Peace Committee's efforts in our Schools. The following essays are selected as examples of the response to a general competition in which it is understood all the smaller Yearly Meeting Schools took part.—Eds.]

Were half the power that kills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth bestowed on camp and courts,
Given to redeem the human mind from error
There were no need of arsenals and forts.

The above lines, written by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, express the opinions of millions of people in this world, although many fear to utter them. It is a great question before the peace-loving people, how to secure peace permanently so that it could never be broken. "Peace," which means so much to civilization, to every man, woman and child in this world, "Peace," which will prevent brutality, bloodshed, starvation and devastation, and will, permit a true brotherhood of man.

In times of peace men are horrified, if there is a shipwreck, disaster or any destruction of life on land or sea, but in times of war, men purposely mutilate and destroy human beings, and think they are justified.

Ever since the World War, men, women and children have been starving in Europe. Little children who would become future citizens are often only half developed, and are sufferers from lack of sufficient nourishment. Desperate efforts are now being made to help these little people, and we hope through the friendly hand extended to them to save not only their lives but also their better moral instincts.

The devastation that follows in the wake is horrifying. Great areas of land have been totally destroyed, beautiful cathedrals have been wrecked, and many fine statues have had to be cut into parts to be buried, so the enemy shells and bombs would not destroy them, too.

First, let us consider the tremendous cost of armaments that are prepared for war. The cost of one battleship, which is about $6,000,000, would give thousands of citizens a thorough education. Had one month of the war's cost been given to constructive work, it would have used $1,500,000 in creating thousands of churches, public libraries, hospitals, farms and schools in warring lands. Wars, past and future, take ninety-three per cent. of every dollar given to the Government, while public works and civil departments receive six per cent, and education receives less than one per cent. Is that fair? No! of course not. If the ninety-three per cent, for war was reduced to about ten per cent., the country would reach such an intellectual, brother-loving level that in a few years there would be hardly any need of an army, and a small navy would police the seas. Europe exploded because Europe was loaded. Is the United States going to be loaded with implements of warfare, and then explode?

The cost of war in dollars is nothing compared to the cost of war in human lives. Poets, musicians, artists and men with wonderful, enlightening, scientific thoughts in their minds, have been killed. This is no little setback to a higher plane of intelligence in the world.

War, to say the least, retards progress in every sense of the word, the two principal ones being agriculture and civilization. Hundreds of acres of cultivated land were trampled under foot by soldiers going to the front, as if it were a thing of no consequence whatever, when in truth it was the life of a nation.

Is there any good in war? No! War in itself is bad. Nations suffer horribly even if the enemy never sets its foot within their borders. There has been no destruction of cities or property in America, but all the American citizens are suffering very keenly from the past war. General Von Moltke once said, "Every war, even for the nation that conquers, is nothing less than a misfortune."

Is war necessary? No! and it never was. If two countries have differences of opinion they should appoint some one who is fair-minded, and whom they both trust, to decide the question for them, then his decision should be accepted by both parties. In a game of base-ball the judge is called the "umpire." The Latin word for "umpire" is "arbitrator." So when nations or individuals use this method to settle their disputes it is called "arbitration."

Every nation is not honest, and if it wants something which it has no right to have, and knows the Board of Arbitration will not grant it, it usually invents some excuse about the honor of the country, and immediately dishonors it by declaring war for that "something."

Since John Jay was buried in effigy in Boston for putting an arbitration clause into our treaty with England in 1794, there have been over six hundred international disputes settled by arbitration or by special commission; and since 1890 one hundred and seventy-five arbitration treaties, some of them still unratified, have been signed between signatory powers. Forty-six nations of two hemispheres have now no excuse for war with each other.

Peace is inevitable. The path of man is ever upward and onward, so just as he abolished cannibalism, and no longer eats his fellow-man, tortures, burns nor slays his prisoners, and since he has abolished duelling in English-speaking lands, so the killing of man by man is as certain to follow as the sun is to shine. Peace is humane, and is also the highest plane of civilization. There is a slogan that, "Peace is Prosperity," and it is very true.

The greatest reason for "Peace" is that, "Christ, the Prince of Peace," once said, "Peace on Earth, good-will toward men." War is against all Christian principles.

We that are young should work toward everlasting "Peace."

"O, Beautiful our country, round thee in love we draw;
Thine is the grace of freedom, the majesty of law.
Be righteousness thy sceptre, justice thy diadem,
And in thy shining forehead be peace the crowning gem."

MARY W. FLORIDA, Eighth Grade, Atlantic City Friends' School.

FRIENDLINESS AMONG THE NATIONS.

Many children love to say "my father is a soldier." But they would not say it so boldly if there happened to be war. If nations could only learn to love peace instead of war, they would not hear any one saying "my father is at war!"

The nations should be brotherly and settle quarrels by arbitration. For we really are a large family, living in different places and talking different languages. In our own families, we do not buy bricks and hammers to throw at each other. Why then do we do it in our large family of the world?

Is it any wonder that we sometimes have differences of opinion? But why, when we do have different opinions, should we go to war and fight? Fighting does nothing to settle quarrels—it only shows which side is the stronger and which can build the most battleships and drill the most soldiers.

We all wish we could hear the sweet notes of peace ringing its wonderful message over all the earth forever. Peace on earth, good-will to men—for it was God's will.

JANE KNIGHT, Sixth Grade, Lansdowne Friends' School.

PEACE.

A peaceable nation is a happy nation, so why not be a peaceable nation? The people say how much the world has improved lately. But don't men fight just as terribly and savagely as ever? O! and the horror of it all. We think it terrible if a man gets his arm cut in an accident. People faint, others scream, but in war hundreds of just such cases are going on all the time, hundreds of dead and dying are all around. A man comes back from the war and kills himself or goes mad or dies all from the awful sights. One man's hair turned grey in one hour from the awful sights of war.

Then think of the good that could be obtained by the money spent on war. The loss of lives and the suffering is untold; ninety-three per cent. of our money is spent for battleships, guns, pensions, ammunition and other things. If it were spent for better schools, better roads, and better buildings, how much better the United States would be.

The real helpers or heroes of a country are the people that save and protect the lives of their fellow-citizens. For example, the fireman. He saves hundreds of lives every year at the risk of his own life, and the miners, they struggle deep under the ground for others' comfort. The doctors give up their lives to work in the laboratories trying to help cure diseases. They are real helpers of their country.

The real hero is the man who does what he thinks is right even if his father and mother, friends and countrymen don't think he is right. Who will die or go to prison for what he thinks will help his country here, in my mind, is a real hero.

DAVID STERN, Fifth Grade, Haddonfield Friends' School.

PEACE.

We should not fight because it causes death and sorrow and many other sad things, like starvation and shattered homes.

War causes commerce to stop and it uses a great deal of money.

God put us in the world to be friendly and not to fight.

Every one loves peace.

All the money that was used in the war would have saved 3,500,000 starving children in Europe whom war has made to suffer.

War every one hates, and they love peace, therefore there should be peace forever and ever.

War ruins the world and its people.

The way to keep peace is for one nation not to be angry with another.

CANNELL DAVIS, Fourth Grade, Atlantic City Friends' School.

DISARMAMENT.

Major General F. B. Maurice said, "I went into the British Army believing that if you want peace you must prepare for war. I believe now that if you prepare for war you get war."

Major General Maurice has expressed the feeling of the majority of the American people. Before the war everyone talked about "preparedness."

If we prepare for war we will have war. Our armies are like George Washington's hatchet. Because he had it he wanted to use it, so if we have nothing to fight with we cannot fight.

People now want peace, and disarmament is one of the best ways to get it.

Take, for example, the United States and Canada; there are no fights between the two nations and no wars. We had several troubles with Canada, too, but they have been peaceably settled. It is the same way with Argentina and Chile.

We must also consider the cost of our arms; one shot from a twelve-inch gun costs five hundred dollars, a battleship twelve million dollars. Think if we pay all this money to government how much have we left for slums, poor cripples, and other charitable things? Surely not as much as we would have otherwise. This money goes for arms that kill our fellow-men.

England wants to know why we want the largest navy in the world; she thinks we want to fight with her.

Suppose you were shipwrecked and only yourself and one other person were saved. One day when passing him you saw that he was making a tomahawk. You asked him what he was doing that for and he answered, "Oh, to protect myself with," and you think, "Why, I must protect myself, too."

It is the same way with countries, if one country sees another nation getting a large army or navy she thinks she needs one, too, and in that way a war starts to try them out.

Some people say, "well they fought and used arms in Bible times, why should not we now?" That was in the Old Testament times before Christ came upon earth and taught us the better way.

We cannot be a Christian nation and disobey the Bible, too.

We are sending missionaries to the heathen teaching them not to fight like beasts. We will soon need missionaries from them if we have another war like the last one.

Did you ever hear of the story of the Quaker farmer?

It was during the Revolutionary war when all houses were plundered. This farmer did not believe in arms although his wife was very much afraid to live without them. One day Hessian soldiers walked into the house and demanded the right to search it. The farmer's wife and children ran screaming out of the back door. The soldiers found, to their astonishment, no arms in the house. One of them picked up a book and seeing the name of Jesus Christ pointed to it and put his hand upon his heart. The farmer at once understood and called his wife and children. The soldiers showed that they were hungry and the farmer brought them eggs, milk, etc. His house was never disturbed after that.

But what, you ask, can we do when another country threatens us? We can go back to the old adage, "It takes two to make a quarrel."

When we use arms in war we ruin trade. Take Germany, for instance—she is poor because she has no trade, and how we miss dyes from Germany!

Think how Germany was such a wealthy country with her beautiful luxuriant cities and her great army over which she had worked so hard. It could not save her—but rather brought on her downfall, and also crippled France by destroying her homes and killing men, women and children.

"We are putting on the military cloak which Germany took off"—and must we be crushed like Germany?

DOES THE WORLD TODAY NEED MID-WEEK RELIGIOUS SERVICES? HOW ABOUT FRIENDS?

[NOTE: This essay was read before the Practical Farmers Club of Whittier, Iowa, and is printed in THE FRIEND in response to the desire of the Club.—EDS.]

This question seems to me to be a part of a subject taking in a good deal more scope than I imagine I was expected to cover in this essay, and entirely beyond my ability to handle adequately; yet I can hardly refrain from over-reaching the limits of my question a little, into the larger subject, of the tendency of the professed Christian people of to-day, or the church of to-day, to drift away from the principles and practices of their earlier history.

They tell us that the times have changed, that the world is progressing, that the churches must keep abreast of the times. They must meet these changed conditions. Pardon me for asking right here, How much of the change that we boast of is real progress toward the great object and end of human existence?

One writer has said, "The great war demonstrated that man has traveled a shorter distance from barbarism than had been supposed."

It is stated by good authority that there is more crime in proportion to population in this country to-day than there was a generation or two ago.

Are we really progressing in best things?

The world to-day is full of unrest. The people are constantly looking for new and more thrilling entertainment, and this desire for excitement is being met on every hand in many and various ways: and it has the effect to draw the minds of the people away from the more serious side of life, away from the real essential Christian services.

In an editorial in the Christian Herald recently appeared this statement: "While the people of all countries stagger under war debts that will require three generations to pay, 800,000,000 persons crowd the theatres annually in this country, and churches of 1,000 membership count less than 100 regular attendants once a week at a prayer meeting."

I do not take it that this means that the mid-week religious service is not needed to-day.

The people are seeking for more time to spend in sports and amusements. The laboring people are asking for shorter working days. The business men in the cities are asking to have the clocks turned ahead one hour so they can have more time for golf and other forms of recreation.

The church people have partaken of the spirit of the times. They feel that the rules and requirements of their organizations in the past are too arduous for the present times.

They are relaxing a little in their zeal for the religion that was so dear to our forefathers. In some places they have considered whether it would not be better to raise the ban on dancing and other forms of diversion, that have been prohibited in the past, and finally we come to the question. Does the world to-day need a mid-week religious service?

If I should answer this question directly I would say, yes, the world to-day needs mid-week religious service. I do not find it in my heart to lightly esteem the religious customs and practices of those early Christians, who saw the light, and heard the call, "Come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you, and will be to you a God, and you shall be my sons and daughters."

"Will a man rob God?" Will the people to-day take the time set apart by the early Christians to worship Him, and appropriate it to their business interests, or to the pursuit of pleasure? True, we are living under changed conditions, but these conditions do not make less the necessity for religious services, but rather increase our responsibility.

Pure and undefiled religion does not change. "God is the same yesterday, to-day and forever." With Him there is neither variableness nor shadow of turning. What the world needs to-day is for the churches to turn to their first love, rather than to abandon any of the means whereby they may be strengthened, bound together and built up in the most holy faith.

How about Friends? Friends are a part of the world, and perhaps they have fallen short of their high calling in about the same proportion as others.

What the world needs to-day, Friends need, and what Friends need, the world needs.

There is one God, one faith, one baptism. There is one door to the sheep-fold, one straight and narrow way that leads to the Celestial City. The world to-day, and Friends in particular, need a mid-week religious service, and more, they need an everyday individual religious service.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE EMPEROR AT THE FORGE.—Boys often resent being called upon to do a piece of work which they think beneath them, especially if it is a task which properly belongs to some one else. But everyone should cultivate an obliging disposition, and be able to help in any emergency to the extent of his ability.

The Emperor Joseph set a good example in this respect when traveling one day in Italy. A wheel of his carriage broke down, and he repaired to the shop of a blacksmith in a little village and desired him to mend it without delay.

"I would," said the smith, "but this being a holiday, all my men are away at church; even the boy who blows the bellows is away."

"Now I have an excellent chance to warm myself," said the unknown emperor. So, taking his place at the bellows, instead of calling an attendant to do so, he followed the smith's directions, and worked as if for wages. The work was finished, and, instead of the little sum he was charged, the sovereign handed out six gold ducats.

"You have made a mistake," said the astonished blacksmith, "and given me six gold pieces, which nobody in this village can change."

"Change them when you can," said the laughing emperor as he entered his carriage, "an emperor should pay for such a pleasure as blowing the bellows."

I have known some shop boys who would have waited long, and sent far for help, before they would "come down" to blowing a blacksmith's bellows. It is not boys with the best sense who thus stand upon their dignity. A readiness to oblige, and to take hold of unaccustomed work when necessary, has often been excellent business capital for a young man; while the opposite spirit never wins friends.—Youth's World.

FEARLESS AND HONEST.—A Scotch lad landed at Castle Garden, the brightest, yet the loneliest, passenger of an emigrant ship. He was barely fourteen, and had not a friend in America, and only a sovereign in his pocket.

"Well, Sandy," said a fellow passenger who had befriended him during the voyage from Glasgow, "don't you wish that you were safe now with your mother in the old country?"

"No," said the boy, "I promised her when I left that I would be fearless and honest. I have her fortune to make as well as my own, and I must have good courage."

"Well, laddie, what can you do?" asked a voice behind him.

"I can be loyal and true to anybody who will give me something to do," was the quick response.

A well-known lawyer, whose experience with applicants for clerkships in his office had been unfavorable, had taken a stroll down Broadway to ascertain whether he could find a boy to his liking. A canny Scotchman himself, he had noticed the arrival of the Glasgow steamer, and had fancied that he might be able to get a trustworthy clerk from his own country.

Sandy's fearless face caught his eye. The honest, manly ring in Sandy's voice touched his faithful Scotch heart.

"Tell your story," he said kindly.

It was soon told that Sandy's mother had been left a widow with little money and a child to bring up. She had worked for him as long as she could, but when her health failed she had bought his passage to America, and given to him what little money she could spare.

"Go and make your fortune," she had said. "Be fearless and honest, and don't forget your mother, who cannot work for you any longer."

Sandy's patron engaged him as an office boy. "I'll give you a chance," he said, "to show what there is in you. Write to your mother today that you have found a friend who will stand by you as long as you are fearless and honest."

Sandy became a favorite at once in the office. Clients seldom left the office without pausing to have a word with him. He attended night school and became an expert penman and accountant. He was rapidly promoted until he was his patron's confidential clerk. After sharing his earnings with his mother, he went to Scotland and brought her back with him. "You have made my fortune," he said, "and I cannot have luck without you." He was right. When he had studied law and began to practice at the bar, his fearlessness commanded respect and his honesty inspired confidence. Juries liked to hear him speak. They instinctively trusted him. His mother had impressed her high courage and sincerity upon him. His success was mainly her work.—The Household.

THE STORY OF A TOLSTOYAN COLONY.

[This article is reprinted from The Friend (London). It will remind some of our readers of the Brook Farm in which Emerson and some of his colleagues participated. Near Eagles Mere, Pa., there are also the remains of an experiment not unlike this at Whiteway.—Eds.]

There came times to most of us when we feel impressed with the hopelessness of efforts to direct the world as we see it towards our ideals, or even of seriously attempting therein to order our individual lives as we should wish. It is at such times that enthusiastic idealists (generally young in years) have from time to time felt impelled to seek, or to found some other society, either organized more nearly according to their principles, or offering a more congenial mode of life. The histories of the numerous "colonies" formed in this way are often amusing, as often pathetic, and in nearly all cases very interesting and instructive to those interested in economics, politics or social ethics.

A little over twenty years ago one such colony was started at Whiteway, in the Gotsdold Hills, by a party of optimistic pioneers, composed for the most part of Tolstoyans. Economically the venture was launched under more hopeful auspices than has been the case with many similar undertakings. The colonists, by pooling their resources, were enabled to buy a considerable plot of agricultural land, situated on a high plateau, as far removed from towns as could well be hoped for in this country. In addition they possessed a little working capital to carry them over until the time when the colony should become self-supporting. Having acquired the land by purchase, they promptly made a bonfire of the title-deeds! Like the early Christians they held all things in common, and whosoever wished might come and share such wealth as they possessed, rendering such return (or no return) as he felt disposed. In revolt against a society in which force was a dominating factor, the colonists sought to establish one from which it should be entirely eliminated.

The consequences have been as interesting as were to be expected. One of the original colonists remarked to the writer that those first days of emancipation and freedom provided a spiritual experience which, in spite of all the physical hardships which later attended the venture, she would never wish to have foregone. The thoughts of them will live as a cherished memory, in the minds of those early enthusiasts, to the end of their days.

The physical hardships, however, were quite serious enough. People arrived from nearly all parts of the world in considerable numbers, particularly in the summer months, when the colony naturally offered the most residential attractions. Many of these were excellent people indeed, but a grave disadvantage arising from their presence was the fact that the necessity in this world for hard physical work (and more particularly, as must inevitably be the case, when people are grouped in economically small communities) did not enter largely into their philosophy. The result was that the little society soon consisted, even more than the big world outside, of a section of hard worker, and another, all too large, of people who were economic parasites.

The repudiation of force was so thorough that all authority was rejected, and with it nearly all organization, in much of the work which was performed. There is an amusing story of how, upon a piece of ground on which one worker had sown potatoes one day, another would sow turnips the next, and still another parsnips on the day after that, whilst adjacent ground would receive no seed at all. The inadequate supplies of both capital and labor were thus wasted.

The refusal to pay tithes the first year caused the authorities to levy execution upon the only piano on the colony—a loss naturally very much felt. But when the following year a similar refusal led to the loss of a large sack of potatoes which had been accumulated for the winter's food, much more serious inconvenience was caused. After this, the colonists so far compromised with their principles as to compound with the authorities for the tithe. All these things, together with the virtual secession of a section, taking with them half the capital, so impoverished the colonists that in the second winter they were reduced to life upon potatoes and parsnips and—their faith.

It was only to be expected that the advent in a country district of a body of people known to have such unusual ideas, whose dress, however rational and healthy, was a defiance of all the conventions, and whose attitude in regard to force caused them to deny the law any part in the regulation of sexual as of all other relationships, would cause some misunderstanding and unpleasantness with the folks of the countryside. It is surprising, however, with what comparatively little difficulty the exercise of the colonists' principle of goodwill appears to have overcome their prejudices.

But if effective with the local people, this principle was less so in the case of a quasi-colonist who, having himself lived on the colony, subsequently occupied a neighboring farm. He persisted in sending his cattle to graze amongst the colonists' growing produce, with results which may be imagined. Appeals were made to his sense of justice and decency, but these qualities, in this individual, appear to have been unusually inaccessible. The appeals were laughed to scorn; the cows still came. After a long time of suffering by this persecution, a burly colonist one day administered a sound thrashing, and drove the cattle away. This fellow colonist was deeply grieved at this lapse, as they considered it, but—the cows came no more! Against the background of a world of strife and war, how ineffably sweet, sweet as the gentle rain from heaven upon the place beneath, appears the act of mercy, or of sincere good-will towards men! It makes a unique appeal to something within us which makes us recognize it as of the highest. Yet, on the other hand, the erection to a dogma of the negation of force, the endeavor to apply rigidly the doctrine that force is always wrong led, in this instance at any rate, to results which, it must be admitted, were ludicrous. The effects of a little force, applied after a long period of forbearance, were salutary. A few days later, the beaten one met the colonist who had thrashed him; extending his hand he said, "Shake." The colonist shook, and the men remained friends.

After about three years, the pressure of circumstances, chiefly I think the fact that work upon a communistic basis was not sufficiently productive, led to the practical abandonment of communism. The land was divided amongst the colonists upon the basis of small holdings.

Though, however, the attempted application has led to the modification of some of the early ideals, many are still followed. The colony still persists, and, contrasted with the essentially rational mode of life there, its simplicity and wholesomeness, what madness seems all our toiling and struggling, chiefly for things which are not worthy,—our labored and wasteful production of things which have neither true use nor beauty! Returning to London after a holiday with the colonists, the writer felt that the latter had very much to teach this bewildered world of ours, if only it would listen.

SMALL INVESTMENTS IN POLAND YIELD BIG RETURNS.

It is surprising to see how much good a little money will do now in the devastated area of Poland. The rate of exchange which makes a dollar equivalent to a thousand Polish marks (before the war a dollar was four marks) makes possible great returns for small investments. A striking instance is that of a man in Terebin who had his lumber already sawn at the mill, but could not pay the freight on it to his village. By our providing him with seventy-five cents, his house will be finished.

A house was begun last year by the head of a family who was dying of tuberculosis. He was making a desperate struggle to leave a shelter for his family, but his struggle was in vain. The house remains unoccupied for lack of a roof. By our agreeing to hire a man to thatch this house it will be made habitable and this poor man's dying wish will be fulfilled.

Two sisters are living at Terebin, both of them widows, who are attempting to build a new house with the money that comes from the labor of one sister on her sewing-machine. At present they are occupying a dugout, which is remarkably clean and tidy, to be sure, but a dugout nevertheless. We have promised to furnish doors, windows and roof, and by so doing we shall make it possible for this house to be finished before cold weather.

Similar cases are all around us. The newly returned refugees are in worse plight than the people who have been here a little while. They arrive worn out with the privations of their long journey from the interior of Russia, and they lack money and practically everything. Next winter they will crowd into the homes of the people already established, and health conditions will be as bad as ever unless we can add largely to the house available.

NOTE—The Public Ledger of Seventh Month 5th reported that the Polish mark has dropped until now a dollar will buy two thousand five hundred marks. It is a good time to make contributions to Poland.

ARTHUR GAMBLE.

THE NEW POOR.

Instances of the greatest misery are now met with in Vienna among people who once were well-to-do. High state officials, civil engineers, university professors, baronesses, field marshals constitute "the new poor" of Central and Eastern Europe. The following incidents are from the latest report of Friendly visitors to our Vienna Mission.

A professor's wife, whose income, good enough before the war, is now a mere pittance, has made herself a dress out of an old sheet, having dyed it first. When I called, she had an old sack tied round her while she cleaned her little flat. She was wearing the sack in order to save her one dress for street-wear.

The wife of a high state official showed me the last shirts that her husband and son possessed. They were wonderfully patched; in fact, they were nothing but a patch which in its turn had worn out and the wife was about to cut up a threadbare sheet to repatch the patch. It was pathetic to hear her explain how she was going to try to lengthen the lives of those two last shirts.

Field Marshal Z. lived in a house which showed signs of former wealth and luxury. He had applied to us in desperation for clothes for himself and wife. A year ago he lost a young daughter of consumption, due to starvation. His monthly income was $6, and he was selling piecemeal the beautiful old furniture. He was in great need of a pair of shoes and showed me the only ones he had which in ordinary times would have been deemed fit only for the ash pile.

Finally—one could fill volumes with cases like these—there was dear, old Baroness V. Her income, poor soul, was hardly enough to keep her in bread alone. She has sold all her silver, the old family heirlooms and the beautiful old furniture and pictures. The carpets and curtains are gone, too, and finally she had to come to us for help. Her dress was threadbare and her boots were tied to her feet with paper string. They were down at the heel and the soles were worn through.

Do you who read these words realize that these old people of Vienna were once in comfortable circumstances like yourselves? That they have the same natural pride with regard to begging that you feel? And that it is only because the struggle has proven too much for them that at last they have had to come to us? They are a deserving part of the great host in whose behalf we are asking you to search your closets in the hope that you will find serviceable garments which you will send us. We believe that if you have clothes which you might possibly wear another season you may decide they will do more good to such people as these in Europe than they will do you. Be generous!

THE POVERTY OF THE CARPATHIAN VILLAGES.

We entered a hut and at first saw no children. The mother and father were there, the latter just returned from fetching firewood out of the forest. The atmosphere was stifling and hot, every crevice being stopped up. On looking round to the back of the big Russian mud stove, we dimly discerned some naked children huddled together. We called to them to come down. The biggest, a girl of about ten, reached across to the wooden cradle hung from the ceiling, in which the baby lay, and took out a linen shirt into which she hurriedly scrambled. The baby, thus deprived of its covering, began to cry.

The other children, boys of five and seven, quite naked, squatted on the first ledge of the stove and gazed at us with scared eyes. They were filthy; their hair was matted; and they were thin, with crooked little legs and enormous distended stomachs. Suddenly one of them took fright and fled to his mother's skirts for shelter.

We had come to tell the mother that she should take the children three miles down the valley to Ivan Gryga's house to be examined by a nurse for the child-festing.

"But how can I?" she exclaimed; "You see that they are naked, they would die of the cold."

"They have no clothes at all?" we asked.

"Yes, they have these two linen shirts, but what is a linen shirt on a day like this?" In the end the father took off his sheepskin and shoes and stockings and the older son lent his coat and peasant shoes. The shoes were filled with wrappings of rags since they were many times too big. Thus equipped, they set off with their mother, the two small boys on a little sled and the girl shuffling in their wake.

Now that the summer is here, the children are all at the kitchens. Many of them come in nothing but a festoon of rags. Big boys wear ragged shirts and no trousers. Sometimes a boy gets hold of a discarded piece of sacking and makes trousers of it. But when winter comes again, these children must climb back onto the stoves and crouch there through the winter, never able to go for a healthy run on a frosty day, never able to enjoy a snowball fight, never able to attend school. We must help them.

MAVIS D. HAY.

A LITTLE LAD AND A BAG OF BUNS.

He was standing outside a delicatessen shop, his great round eyes fastened on the good things inside. He could not have been more than seven years old, and he was very thin. His black school-apron partially concealed faded and patched clothes.

"Are you a Quaker Kind?" the lady asked.

"Yes, I am," he said, "but I don't get fed to-day. To-day is a holiday."

"Is there something in the window that you would like? Do you like buns?"

Startled, unbelieving, he could not speak. He looked at the lady, at her purse, at the window, and fairly panted with excitement. Then he nodded, his eyes wider than before.

"Could you wait here a minute?"

Oh, yes, he could wait as long as the lady wished, but he could only express his willingness by smiles and vigorous nods, while one thin grubby little fist screwed nervously in the palm of the other hand. The lady went into the shop, watched by a pair of hungry round eyes that were glued to the window while a small body trembled with expectancy. She bought a little bag of buns—they cost less than three cents in our money—and going out slipped them into two eager little hands.

What did the lad do? Did he open the bag and devour the buns? No, they never do that,—these hungry little children. They have learned to share their joys at home. He closed the bag more tightly and with a polite "Danke schoen!" that was full of suppressed excitement, he hurried away.

CAROLINE G. NORMANT.

FEEDING CHILDREN IMPROVES THEIR MINDS AND MORALS.

The last reports that have been made by physicians, teachers and welfare-workers of Germany concerning the effects of child-feeding, are more interesting than the usual run of such reports, inasmuch as they deal not only with statistics of physical gain, but with other forms of improvement as well.

It is pleasant to read of gains in weight of from two to ten pounds and of progress out of the class of dangerously undernourished children into classes higher up in the scale of nourishment. Thus in one school where 183 children of the dangerously undernourished class were being fed, 42 improved to the point of promotion into the class of seriously undernourished and 19 gained sufficiently to be classified thenceforth as only slightly subnormal. But the other marks of betterment reported are still more interesting.

"The nervous children are quieter. Children who were often absent now come to school regularly. The still and dreamy children are now almost too lively at lesson time. All take a more zealous interest in the instruction." These observations come from the teacher of a class of girls in Aachen.

A kindergartner writes: "The children are lively and ready to play and amuse themselves, while formerly they were too tired to do anything but sit listlessly about." Two young girls in the Kaiserwerth seminary who had gotten very much behind in school now belong once more to the good pupils. A school-girl in Sterkrade who was a decidedly bad scholar, has now been put into a higher class and takes an active part in the lessons.

The words of a Crefeld teacher have been particularly encouraging to our workers: "Children of whose heedless behavior one had continually to complain formerly, have become the good examples of the class. Their moral behavior, both towards their teachers and towards their fellow-pupils, has been considerably improved."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

THE London Meeting for Sufferings includes 212 names. Of these 38 are new members this year.

ABOUT thirty-five persons were present at the appointed meeting at Barnegat on the afternoon of the 3d inst. The fourteen resident Friends appreciate this monthly appointment during the summer. They regret that more of the Friends sojourning at Beach Haven do not join in this public testimony. Fifty years ago the town had a fair proportion of Friends in its population and there is a strong sentiment of respect for the Society in the town.

YEARLY MEETING EXTENSION COMMITTEE (LITERATURE).—Two sub-committees have been active in examining existing literature, which in brief form presents Christian fundamentals as we see them; some original work has also been done in this direction.

Suggestive leaflets intended as aids for special reading are also in preparation.

"Some Aspects of the Quaker Faith," by R. Barelay Moon, which appeared in the last Young Friends' Number of THE FRIEND has been revised by the Extension Committee; the second edition being five thousand copies.

"An Invitation to Friends' Meeting," by Richard C. Brown, has just been issued by the Committee; this leaflet is intended for general distribution, and is in no way intended to compete with the "Invitation" written by Alfred C. Garrett, and which has been in circulation for a number of years.

"Enthusiasm for Jesus," by M. I. Reich, appeared in THE FRIEND some time ago; it has been revised and shortened; it is planned to include this in the list of publications as well as some essays by Rufus M. Jones.

These leaflets are intended primarily for Conferences held under the auspices of the Extension Committee, but it is earnestly hoped that Friends generally will interest themselves in their distribution.

"THE INNUMERABLE COMPANY."

Richard Roberts, in "The Untried Door," observes that the "springs" of the apocalyptic "are in universal human nature." In other words, we do all see visions and have dreams, whether we are carried away in the spirit to Patmos or not. But are we not all carried away to a Patmos as we enter into that experience of communion which we call worship? Is not worship a spiritual Patmos, after all, in which windows of vision are opened and seals of mystery broken? Might we not, many of us, after our quiet Friends' Meeting, record an apocalypse of our own, in which the past is put in glorious array and the future becomes real with presences of fire? We settle down into the quiet of an ancient meeting-house. We have come together from various occupations and environments. A weight of earthly care envelops our spirits. Our encounters with self have been losing encounters. Even our good has been misinterpreted, and misunderstandings have made the atmosphere heavy and unpromising, where we believe all should be sunshine and cheer. The ancient record that describes this state is forced upon us by memory. We, too, are like "a sparrow on the house top." The desolation of aloneness appals us. But how soon, as we make a determined effort to realize contact with the Highest, the scene changes. The almost empty meeting-house is thronged with presences of the past. Our forbears for three or four generations are there. Simple, devoted, godly folk they are. Like the righteous described in the Scriptures, "they held on their way," and now after a century of time, the timelessness of their virtues is as a sweet perfume about us. Their good was not "interred with them in the grave." And so the spirit of apocalypse possesses our spirits. We have made but a first step; others follow with much suddenness. That is the order of apocalypse!

The singing of worshippers assembled nearby is audible through the open windows. It doubtless is homely singing, but bears the spirit of devotion. We go out to this group and to many more like it. Our kindred purpose under varying methods brings us into one great assembly of harmonious intention. We follow, in feeling, the unnumbered groups, like this as they encircle the earth and rest for a moment in a sense of wonder (did we not take the Way of Wonder?) at the reality of "the unity of the children of God." Our little Friends' meeting (there were but six present) has broadened into a great concourse. Past and present, near and far, blend into a blessed oneness. Some seals are thus broken, but not all!

A moment and the vision is forward. "One generation shall declare thy works to another and show forth thy wondrous acts." Generations yet unborn transmit the inheritance. The continuity of God's purposes is in no slight degree evidence of their reality. "Children's children shall praise him." The spring of hope is in this forward look. The bloom of eternal youth is upon the apocalyptic assembly of God. And thus is the circle of his family complete. Past, present and future: near and far, join at the table of his communion.

But is the circle complete? Is the satisfaction of such a united assembly a final satisfaction? Hardly is the question breathed till new seals are broken. A splendor of apocalypse not known before is directly upon us. The ends of the earth are once more disclosed. Multitudes of those who have not known God, the heathen of every land, the outcasts near and far, are all at once within the circle of our quickened interest and love. A brooding Presence speaks above the multitude and we hear the gracious words, "One is your Father, and all ye are brethren." In some such form as this we do all realize some measure of the expansiveness of worship. To the extremely practical type of mind it may not take the mystical form; this type is suspicious of mysticism. But practical type and mystic alike must be measured by a common test. Let us quote Evelyn Underhill: "What fruit dost thou bring back from this thy mission?" is the final question which Jacopone da Todi addresses to the mystic's soul. And the answer is: "An ordered life in every state." Whether therefore our worship brings us into the "innumerable company" of the "communion of the saints," or whether in plain prose our worship is only "as dew to the dried grass," the issue is the same. Do we go from it to "an ordered life" in the environment in which we find ourselves? This ordered life is the most far-reaching testimony. In attaining it we may not see and feel the "innumerable company," but if we do attain it we become of that company and shall be satisfied "when we awake in His image."

J. H. B.

"GATHER us in, Thou Love that fillest all!"

Gather our rival faiths within Thy fold!

Render each man's temple-veil and bid it fall,

That we may know that Thou hast been of old;

Gather us in.

"Gather us in: we worship only Thee;

In varied names we stretch a common hand;

In diverse forms a common soul we see;

In many shapes we seek one spirit-land;

MAURICE HEWLETT ON FRIENDS.

Last spring, Maurice Hewlett, at his suggestion, had a short tour to Quarterly Meetings and other gatherings of Friends to which he spoke on a League of Peoples rather than a League of Nations. His impressions form the subject of a most interesting article that appeared in the London Nation. In view of his high opinion of the Society, we thank him for his action in not informing the public of the fact that it has been the Quakers among whom he sojourned.

He says: "I can certainly say that I was uplifted; and again that I was restored to hopes which the last few years had done their wicked best to atrophy. . . . I found myself, then, in the end to have been the guest and, as far as might be, the intimate of a people in possession of some secret store of knowledge which made them not only serene and quietly happy, but even indifferent to the rubs of the world so far as they experienced them. . . . They did not ask to be shown any good, because they could see it for themselves, and never had their eyes off it for long together. It became clear to me that this something good was a thing which every one of them carried about within himself, and sometimes I was apt to think them backward in disclosing it. But on reflection I convinced myself of one or another fact: either the good thing, whatever it was, could not be imparted and must be individually sought and found; or it was impossible of disclosure to anybody not prepared to receive it. . . . Everywhere I had the same simple geniality of reception, the same candid intercourse, found the same innocence of heart, quiet gaiety, fine temper; and in all cases an ease, a leisure of address which made of life a comfortable, prosperous thing instead of what I had been finding it of late, a journey in bare feet and corns upon a French pave. . . . They used no titles of difference. Men and women alike are known by their names. Sex is marked, but by the first names alone. Age is not outwardly differentiated, nor quality. The ease which this gives to intercourse, to the commerce of every day, can hardly be described; but that, of course, is by no means the whole of the matter. The implications of it, not immediately apparent, go deeply into the relations of men and women, and the greatest of those, I suspect, is a fundamental temperance—so fundamental, indeed, as to be almost an affair of instinct—which makes such delicate commerce as that of the sexes of little difficulty to them—while to us, how full of pitfalls and quicksands!"

And his concluding paragraph begins: "It is exceedingly difficult to say what comfort resides in life modelled upon the Sermon on the Mount, to put it no higher; yet since comfort is a thing we all want if it is to be had, it is well worth finding out. Personally, I have always believed poverty to be the secret of earthly happiness; and it is only another way of putting it, perhaps, to say that riches may be it. It is the riches of my recent hosts which allow them their sincerity, their equality, their liberty to love, their serene indifference to the hammerings of circumstance."

LONDON. HUBERT W. PEET.

CORPORATE SILENCE.

[A subscriber has sent us a copy of St. Andrew's Cross, the organ of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. Our readers will understand why he has marked this portion of an article on "Some Lay Thoughts on Christian Unity," by W. H. Jefferys, M. D.—Eds.]

Some past experiences in the fellowship of worship with Christian groups, other than those of our own Communion, have been among the happiest and most privileged hours of my life. The limits of this paper will not permit more than one illustration and this very briefly stated. Although a Philadelphian, it was my joy this autumn, for the first time, to be invited to worship with the Society of Friends. It was Sunday morning; there were three drunken men brawling on the pavement outside; but within the compound there was the utmost peace and rest. I went in and sat down, several perfect strangers giving me a quiet nod of welcome. The hour was eleven; until eleven-twenty-five no word was spoken; there was a fellowship of complete silence. Then a woman spoke for about ten minutes, simply but thoughtfully, using David and Goliath for her text; there was a short period of quiet again, and then a young man spoke, for perhaps eight minutes, on the duties and opportunities of the Society of Friends in the field of Christian service. There was then a period of quiet until noon, when someone announced that the meeting was closed. There was no singing; there was no formal prayer; there was the utmost simplicity throughout. I do not think that I ever spent a more restful hour in my life. I felt perfectly at home, as if I belonged; I knew that I belonged; I knew that I was with Christians. I realized the power of silence in fellowship; I knew God was near; I felt the corporate communion.

It would be easy to point out much that was lacking, but that is not the purpose here. What there was is positive, of unquestioned and high value. It made me think regretfully of the lack of quiet and thought, and of the perpetual chatter of many services in other places. The Society of Friends has kept a lamp burning; but why it should be necessary to keep that lamp burning without the Catholic Church, I cannot conceive, so much would that light of mystical communion, of the apprehension of reality add to the whole Body of Christ, if the Society of Friends were in communion with the Catholic Church. Why withhold the light, since it is only partial and needs the whole? The Society of Friends, added bodily to the Catholic Church, would be an immense addition to it, not in numbers, but in mystical apprehension; and, I need not say, would itself be enriched an hundredfold.

"THE WORD IS VERY NIGH UNTO THEE."

How painfully have men sought to find God and delayed or missed the great discovery, because they sought Him afar! They looked to far-off places or to times of the remote past or the distant future, while God waited with infinite patience to be discovered in the things near and familiar. How true to modern experience are the ancient Scriptures! However long the years, there is no spiritual gap between ourselves and the writer of the great lines:

For this commandment which I command thee this day, it is not hidden from thee, neither is it far off.

It is not in heaven, that thou shouldest say,

Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it?

Neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say,

Who shall go over the sea for us, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it?

But the word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it.

Whether God be sought or unsought, whether clearly seen or obscure, he is ever at hand, desiring to enter into the heart of man, that there he may make his dwelling place.

He is the reality within every truth that the mind of man discovers; he is the stability of every fact with which we deal; he is the foundation upon which all things rest. All affection which binds human hearts together comes of the Divine affection: every ideal that impels to better living derives its force from Him; every life which draws breath is an expression of His life; for "in Him we live and move and have our being."—The Churchman Affid.

Most modern Christians are made captive by religious organization. We admit, of course, that organization is necessary, but Divine results do not depend upon elaborate human apparatus. Indeed, the grace of God shows a curious preference for methods that are simple and channels that are unexpected. When costly aqueducts crumble and run dry, behold! in the wilderness waters break forth and streams in the desert.—Ed. British W. rekly.

*Our author uses Catholic in the sense that is customary in the Episcopal communion.

EDUCATION.

GERMANTOWN FRIENDS' SCHOOL NOTES.

The Commencement exercises of the Germantown Friends' School were held on the afternoon of Sixth Month 8th, when a class of thirty-four was graduated. The address to the class was delivered by John Erskine, Professor of English in Columbia University. Of the class an unusually large proportion are expecting to enter college this coming autumn,—all the eleven boys, and all but four of the twenty-three girls.

The school year just closing has been an interesting and successful one. The academic work of the School has been maintained in a creditable way, and the various student activities conducted by the pupils themselves have shown unusual powers of organization and intelligent direction. More and more it is the policy of the School to throw responsibility on the students so far as they are able to bear it, and so far as it is best and legitimate in the school work. The Student Council continues to be a decided strength and help. In addition to the work already assumed by the Council, near the end of the school year they took the responsibility for the conduct of study periods in the High School Department without a teacher present. The Junior Student Council, to be effective in the Intermediate Department, was also organized at the end of the school year, and will definitely start its work next autumn. In addition to these agencies, the boys' and girls' Athletic Councils have large responsibilities in connection with the sports of the School, both the color contests between the different sides chosen in the School itself, and games with outside schools. The boys again won the inter-academic soccer championship for the fourth successive year, and the girls were hockey champions of the Private School League of the city.

A special collection was made early in the year to help the work of Mary McLeod Bethune in her school for Negro children at Daytona, Florida, and several other minor collections made in response to special appeals. Throughout the school year the various classes have continued to support children recommended to us by the Germantown Branch of the Society for Organizing Charity. Thirteen boys and girls have been taken care of in this way, and the total collections by the various class Treasurers, mostly in weekly payments of from five to ten cents per person, have amounted to more than $650.00.

The Beta Sigma, the Christian Association of the girls, has had a particularly active year. The leadership has been earnest and efficient, and the standards set for the older girls in their work have been above the average.

We were fortunate at the beginning of last school year to have few changes in the teaching force, and there will be still fewer the coming year. Elizabeth K. Brown, Jr., after eleven years of unusually efficient service in the Primary Department, has resigned to be married this summer. Her place will be filled in the autumn by Anne E. Maxfield, for many years connected with the Moorestown Friends' School.

Katharine E. Dobson has been granted a year's leave of absence, and her place is filled by the appointment of Eleanor Shane, a graduate of Goucher College, who taught last academic year at Friends' Select School.

Jane S. Jones will be given leave of absence for part of next school year, and her work will be assumed by Sarah B. Kohler, an experienced teacher who has long been connected with the Germantown Friends' School as a substitute and special tutor.

Helen Victoria Brown, the Assistant Instructor of Physical Education, has resigned to take a position in California, and her place is filled by the appointment of Frances Perkins, a graduate of the Germantown Friends' School, who has just completed her course at the Boston School of Physical Education.

Throughout the school year several of our teachers have visited some of the leading schools in New York and in other nearby cities. This has helped our school work, and the teachers have brought back much inspiration and helpful suggestion. Elizabeth T. Roberts, the head of the Primary Department, was granted a leave of absence for six weeks and made a fairly extended tour through the middle west in visiting a number of interesting experimental and other well-established schools.

Jane S. Jones, Helen M. Zebley, and Joseph H. Price were appointed readers, respectively in Mathematics, Latin and History, under the College Entrance Examination Board.

The teachers will be represented at various summer schools, by D. Lawrence Burgess and Dorothy Brooke at Columbia, Hadassah J. Moore at Johns Hopkins, Eleanor Shane at the University of Pennsylvania, and Elizabeth E. Todd at a special training school for hand-work held at Greenwich, Connecticut.

Irvin C. Coley is traveling in Europe, chiefly in France and Italy, and Edith H. Knight, Hildegard B. Shumway and Jules M. Wilmart, all of the French Department, are spending the summer in Paris.

H. A. Dominovich and Alfred A. Smith are conducting Flying Moose Lodge Camp for boys, East Orland, Maine, assisted by Joseph H. Price and Herman P. Breininger of our teaching force.

Two announcements of great interest from the material point of view were made at the end of the school year. The individual Friends who started Ivy Lodge a few years ago as a home for the teachers, have presented their equity in this fine old estate to the School, which will from now on own and direct it. This represents a very generous gift, amounting to about $9,000 on the part of a few Friends, and gives as a permanent possession of the School a home which makes possible delightful living conditions for ten or more teachers. Already Ivy Lodge has become a centre of hospitality and pleasant social influence in the life of the School, and it is expected that this change will still further promote the object of the original donors and founders of the enterprise.

The large additional Athletic Field, which was acquired by the School a year ago, largely by the generous gift of one of the owners, Agnes Brown Leach, is this year being fully graded and equipped. It is hoped that by the spring of 1922 the new field, to be known as Wistar Brown Field, will be used by the boys, and the girls will use the present field, Clark Field, which has been the boys' Athletic Field for a number of years. This change will give the girls a fine hockey field and track, together with six tennis courts in addition to the three they already have at the school. The Wistar Brown Field will have two full sized Athletic Fields for the boys, which can be used for rugby, soccer and baseball, ten tennis courts and a standard running track, jumping pits, etc. This development completes the athletic equipment of the School for outdoor sports, and makes the Germantown Friends' School, so far as we know, the only private day school in Philadelphia that owns an Athletic Field for its girls.

Minor improvements in the buildings will be taken care of in the summer.

The enrollment for next school year is already complete, and it exceeds by a small number the enrollment of last school year.

One of the most encouraging features of the year's work to the Committee and the teachers has been the increased interest taken in the work and development of the School, not only by an Alumni body which is constantly growing in power and influence, but by the Monthly Meeting and the individual members of Germantown Meeting. A special Tea Meeting to consider the life and needs of the School was held this spring, at which various features of the school work and plans for future building extensions and development were presented by members of the Committee and the teachers. Papers were read by Marion H. Enlen and Elizabeth A. Lueders, representing the Committee and former teachers, and by Jane S. Jones, H. A. Dominovich, Alfred A. Smith, Dorothy Brooke and Stanley R. Varnall. Morris E. Leeds, the Clerk of the Committee, presided and summed up the achievement and needs of the School admirably in his opening and closing remarks.

Altogether, the results of this school year have been a source of satisfaction to the Committee and the teachers, and the prospect is good that the friends of the School will respond in a material way to further the educational service of the School, and to supply its needs to do this work more efficiently in certain departments which are now cramped for room.

“THE WISDOM OF THE WISE.”

Commencement oratory was for so long a time in the hands of new graduates that the habit of jeering at it seems pretty well fixed in American life, if newspaper pleasantries can be assumed to reflect this life. As a matter of fact, however, of recent time our leading colleges, and in some cases our schools, make a point of including in commencement programs some of the most distinguished speakers available. Thus we do have utterances of great moment representing the flood-tide of thought upon momentous subjects. It is a great pleasure to submit some selections for our readers.—[Eds.]

President Lowell of Harvard is reported as follows:—

“The world is in confusion—the natural result of the turmoil of thought, the ebullition of feeling that accompany and follow a great war. Men's minds are like the sea after a storm, where, although the wind has gone down, the billows still roll and break irresistibly in their huge mass, and threaten to founder even the ship that has ridden out the gale. Conditions have not yet returned to a normal state; nor has the world adjusted itself to them. In such a state of bewilderment, of misunderstandings, of cross purposes, what is needed? The answer is, clear thinking.

“In this matter of patriotism, it is the duty of every man to think clearly what, if any, are its moral limitations and what duties and responsibilities it involves. It is his duty to try to discover, when and where and how moral obligations limit those that he owes to his country, and how far his country is limited in its moral freedom of action by the duties it owes to other portions of mankind. Future wars, future calamities, future miseries incalculable; or, on the other hand, future prosperity, future intellectual and spiritual advance, may depend upon solving these questions aright. And by the solution of these questions I mean their solution by the balance of the opinions of all individual men.”

As is well known, President Arthur Hadley has just retired from Yale. This excerpt probably represents his highest thought as to the functioning of college life in service:—

“We have spent these last years together in a place where for more than two centuries men have consecrated their lives to the service of others; where teachers have worked hard for small worldly rewards; where they have been more concerned to follow out the truths of science and philosophy than to gain ease and comfort by so doing; above all, where men of distinguished talents and eminence among their fellows have been making an honest effort to follow the teachings of our Lord Jesus Christ according to the measure of their understanding.

“Out of their self-sacrifice has grown a spirit of self-sacrifice. By their example even more than by anything that they taught in the class-room men have been prepared to render public service in Church and civil State.”

President Hibben of Princeton “sounded forth” a welcome note of patriotism and put the realization of a new world splendidly:—

“There is a cry to-day which is heard throughout our land, ‘America First.’ If this signifies, as I am afraid it is so often regarded, a self-centered policy and program for our international life, I resent it with all my being. I believe, however, most profoundly in the idea of America first if we interpret this national slogan as America first in the service of the world; first in its ready response to the world's needs and its wise and generous leading of the nations of the earth into the larger life of mutual understanding and concerted action in obtaining the liberty, equality and fraternity which form the reward and the glory of all human endeavor; first to use its great power and influence to realize the desire of all peoples of the earth, the disarmament of the nations and the permanent peace of the world.

“Although the beginnings of this century record the most terrible and disastrous war of all history, it may yet be known as the century of peace, if you and the men of your generation so will it. Although the first years of this century are characterized by materialistic doubt and materialistic drift, it may yet be known distinctively as the century of moral and spiritual progress, if you so will it. Although a pagan philosophy of life may seem unduly to prevail in many minds at this time, nevertheless this may still prove to be the age of reviving faith in God and this century the consummation of the promise and the potency of our Christian civilization. The dream may come true—if you so will it.”

At our own University of Pennsylvania President Ernest M. Hopkins of Dartmouth was on the program. His utterances are of special value for ardent liberals as well as for reactionaries. He hardly has the potency of phrase that we might wish, but his thinking is clear and to the point.

“We have not done well in our institutions of higher learning so largely to forget the religious impulses which led to our foundations and so completely to shrink from responsibility for the soul's nourishment while we have so zealously tried to feed the intellect. Yet we need not discuss these functions separately, for the best education must accept the principles of the best religion, and the inspiration of both is ‘Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.’

“Furthermore, making all due allowance for the aggressiveness necessary for those who in attacking fallacies of the existent order would avoid futurity, it still remains a fact that liberal thought suffers and is handicapped in accomplishment by the bigotry of liberals, men who in revolt against the intolerance of conservatism swing to position of the other extreme and there implant themselves with an intolerance as great as that of the group against which they strive.

“And as for false emphasis, the spirit of propaganda has never, of course, been absent from the world. Yet the explanation of its prevalence at the present time seems to me to lie largely in the artificiality and extraneousness of the habit of war and its customs, recently imposed of necessity upon every detail of human life.

“However unsavory the odor of the reflection now, apart from the exigencies of the struggle, the fact remains that breeding of morale in the people for war involved, in the censorship, the suppression of truth as well as of falsehood; and in the policy of propaganda involved the enthronement of part truths and emotional appeals above complete truth and the dictates of reason. But now that war is passed the spirit of propaganda still remains in the reluctance with which there is returned to an impatient people the ancient right of access to knowledge of the truth, the right of free assembly and the right of freedom of speech. Meanwhile the hesitancy with which these are returned breeds in large groups vague suspicion and acrimonious distrust of that which is published as truth, and which actually is true, so that on all sides we hear the query whether we are being indulged with that which is considered good for us or with that which constitutes the facts. Thus we impair validity of the truth and open the door and give opportunity for authority which is not justly theirs to be ascribed to falsehood and deceit.”

Dartmouth was this year celebrating its centennial. This occasioned numerous valuable addresses, but one quotation must suffice. It is from Professor J. M. Tyler.

“We must train a great many more ministers and teachers, for they—not our lawyers, business men and economists—are the real and immediate teachers and leaders of the people. They are the rock against which barbarism breaks and falls back, and against which the gates of Hell shall not prevail.

“You business men control most of the material wealth of this country and, as a rule, use it wisely and generously. Every year you absorb in your offices two-thirds of all our graduates, many of whom are exactly the men whom we have selected to mold and train our youth as heads and leaders of our schools, colleges, universities and other institutions of power. We cannot compete with you in attracting and securing their services. Yet to-day leaders and graduates are of far greater vital importance and value to this country than the most rapid and successful exploitation of its resources or accumulation of its wealth. Is it not your duty to inspire your children and the young people of your acquaintance to become men and women of leisure in Aristotle's sense of the word, the hardest working-men in the world?"

At Ann Arbor, Michigan, Sir Auckland Geddes, British Ambassador, was the principal orator. His words were heard with interest on both sides of the Atlantic. We quote from the Ledger report:—

"Even the most prosaic of thinkers to-day 'dream of an age in which war shall be no more,' Sir Auckland Geddes, British Ambassador, said, in an address to the graduating class of the University of Michigan. 'But only the most optimistic,' he added, 'dream that that age is at its dawn.'"

"The optimists are probably wrong in the detail of time," the speaker said, "but they are indubitably right. The age will come when war will be no more, when peace will reign all round this spinning globe, for the choice which lies before humanity is between a peace of reason and the peace of death."

On the "young recruits of the army of university men and women" such as those he addressed, Sir Auckland said, rests the great responsibility of aiding the less educated to grasp the great conception of peace "as the spiritual thing which it is." The university-trained mind, he declared, was "international" because it combined the thoughts of great men of all countries.

The Boston Transcript with the caption, "Over-Uniformity in Education," has this editorial note. It puts the plea of President Lowell for new foundations on the spiritual basis. In a way this is the dominant note in all the addresses quoted, and in many more quite as worthy of serious notice.

A vigorous plea for fostering the spiritual side of education was contained in former Governor McCall's recent address at New Hampton. "Our educational institutions," he said, "have become such enormous affairs that much of the personal touch is being lost, and the product is becoming more and more standardized. . . . A practical efficiency is doubtless promoted but with a corresponding loss in the vigor of those spiritual forces necessary to resist the overshadowing materialism of the times. Our growth in the practical has not been balanced by an equal growth in those moral forces which should always control the races." And he prophesied that the "mighty instrumentalities which modern science has uncovered will make short shift of civilization, and even of the race, unless we shall sternly assert the dominance of the spiritual forces."

Guilelma Crosfield quoted the saying that "God never sends a vision to any man but it leads straight to a task. Refuse the task and the vision fades; we see no meaning in it; it is only an empty dream." She felt that everything depended on whether we had a vision or not. She hoped we should rise to our visions in the fullest sense for the world's good.

Rachel B. Braithwaite urged devotion to the need of the poorest and weakest as well as of the purest and the most elevated. Did not service lie much in the things around us?

Ernest E. Unwin desired to carry the thought of Yearly Meeting to the vision we had had in that meeting-house, particularly that morning, similar to the vision, he devoutly believed, of the upper room at Pentecost, as we had seen something of what was meant by the continuity of the Spirit of God. We had been gathering up something of the life of Friends of the older days as well as being on the threshold of new discoveries. He had wondered if we could take the next step after seeing the vision and becoming conscious of the Holy Spirit coming upon us and linking us with the great spirits of the past in a life of devoted service. For that service there must be full dedication of life. The failure of Christianity and of Quakerism had been that our Christianity had only been partial instead of infusing the whole of our life. "As we went forward to dedication he believed we should be conscious of the Divine power helping us."

John William Graham remarked that when the war broke out Friends were called to a testimony and a service which we had not expected, and it might be that the turmoil of home affairs might be bringing us to a more serious testimony still. It was not the place of the Yearly Meeting to decide for or against the various plans for the reconstruction of society, but it was our duty to attain such a spirit as would lead us to a right attitude of mind. If we were to be able to take our proper place in the affairs of the nation, we must sit loose to our own possessions in the name of humanity. He did not mean that we should give up all these things, but that the higher love must cast out the lower loves, and that the love of God would be such that we should not mind the loss of these other things. For where our treasure was there would our hearts be also. If we could do this in any measure, Friends would experience a wonderful liberation of spirit and become what our Father would have us to be.

William Noble believed we wanted the spirit of the early Friends, who realized that when God wanted anything done, He sent a man or a woman and not a committee to do it.

Arthur Dann had had the privilege of preaching the gospel for forty years; but he had never realized its power until the last few years, for unless the preacher spent more time upon his knees than on his feet, his preaching would be ineffective. To younger Friends, he would say, "Don't burden yourselves by trying to understand all the mysteries in life or even in the Bible, but give all your faith and love to the Lord, offering Him the sacrifice of a contrite heart, dedicating yourselves, soul and body, to His service."

Alexander S. Fryer thought if we were going to reach the men and women around us we must be prepared to make common fellowship with them. Men and women were longing for an understanding, without any touch of superiority. We must learn to do away with class distinctions, and he believed that such distinctions would be found to fall away in the process of work. But he believed the grace of God was needed to lift us above these considerations, which could not perhaps be abolished, but must not be allowed to hamper us in our service.

LITERATURE.

Anna L. Littleboy hoped the Clerk would allow her also to speak to the report of the Central Literature Council, which was an allied subject, and that Friends would realize the essential importance of these matters to the Society. For one person who listened to the spoken word there were hundreds who took note of the printed word. If Friends would look into it, they would be surprised at the enormous trouble taken from the beginning of the Society, over the printing and distribution of literature. There had indeed been a brief period during which that work declined; but it had been again revived, on the appointment of the Central Literature Council, which was the centre of all Friends' literary agencies in this country. One of the activities of the Council represented an attempt to inform Friends respecting existing literature. Lists had been drawn up and visits had been paid with the view of informing Friends on that head. She thought Friends would probably greatly miss the book-stall at the Yearly Meeting, now well established. This work should not only be carried on centrally, but in the various meetings. The fresh interest which the Council had been able to excite was, she believed, leading to good results in increasing the means of circulation of Friends' books and pamphlets and the keeping of existing libraries in better order. Our secretary's touch with journalism had enabled him to get into the daily papers various interesting particulars of useful Friends' work which would otherwise have escaped attention. In these days we had great difficulty in meeting the expenses of new work, but she hoped that the Council would be rather continued as old and beneficial work. The Committee had spent £850 this year, £200 of which had been separately subscribed by Friends and by other means. With regard to the current year, at least £120 had been promised, and we might expect some more, possibly £50, and these sums had to be set against the total cost falling upon the Yearly Meeting Fund. The printed word was largely taking the place of the pupil and the platform, so that it was the more important to do our utmost for our literature. The press was too often applied to base ends. All the more need therefore that we should attempt to raise it to a higher plane.

FRIENDS' BOOKSHOP.

The report of the Friends' Bookshop was next taken. Details from the report have already been given; but the following statement with regard to the character of the sales will be of interest. "Of the more particularly Quaker books, perhaps the best sellers were the two Swarthmore Lectures, and J. W. Graham's Faith of a Quaker. There was a good demand for such books as Glover's Jesus of History and Jesus in the Experience of Men, Micklem's The Galilean and the works of Fosdick. By an Unknown Disciple and Moffatt's New Testament have had a steady and continuous sale. Books on social questions, such as Tawney's Sickness of an Acquisitive Society, have found many purchasers, and there has been the usual demand for pamphlets, handbooks, etc., more than 1,000 copies of the Adult School Handbook for 1920 having been sold."

Friends could scarcely expect a large profit on the shop, or even to pay expenses, even if the turnover went on increasing. The work of the Bookshop was essentially propaganda work, and as such Friends must be content to regard it. The practical way to assist the Shop was to purchase from its stock.

FRIENDS' TRACT ASSOCIATION.

The report of the above, showing an increase in the number of tracts and pamphlets sent out during the year, to 61,925, was next taken.

Ernest E. Taylor introduced the report, believing with increased intensity in the importance of this work as part of the literary expression of the Society. He mentioned also the happy literary co-operation between Friends on both sides of the Atlantic, due to the All Friends' Conference.

RELIGIOUS SERVICE ABROAD.

The report of the Meeting for Sufferings on the liberation of Friends for Religious Service abroad was presented.

Robert A. Penney reminded Friends that the Society had at the present moment eight Friends who were in different parts of the world holding credentials for foreign service, apart from many other Friends serving abroad in connection with other committees. F. F. M. A., Council of International Service, etc. With regard to the service of Henry T. and Elizabeth J. Hodgkin in China it was wonderful what openings they were finding with the Chinese and the missionaries of different denominations there. It was interesting to hear from him that though he had been away from China for ten years, he was able to hold a good deal of conversation and to do a certain amount of preaching in Chinese, though some of his addresses were delivered through an interpreter. He felt that it was a great thing indeed that we had at the present time in China so powerful an advocate for Peace as Henry Hodgkin. It might have a real influence in the prevention of war, not only as between China and Japan, but also in the whole world.

SEVENTHS.

The Summary of the Tabular Statement was presented, showing a total, including the foreign membership of the Council for International Service besides members in America, Australasia, etc., of 10,604 (10,180 males, 10,805 females), a decrease of 20 on that of the previous year. Habitual attenders totalled 5,853, a decrease of 250; Associates 720, a decrease of 83. Convincements, etc., were 382, against 185 resignations, etc., births 103 against 292 deaths, and removals out of the Yearly Meeting 22 against 10 removals in. The number of Recorded Ministers has declined a further 14— to 251, a decrease of 143 in the last fifteen years. The number of members married was 207, compared with 204 in 1919 and 150 in 1918.

"A SERVICE OF LOVE IN WAR TIME."

DR. JOHN VAN SCHAICK, JR.

[This article is kindly forwarded to THE FRIEND by Lillie F. Rhoads. It appeared in the Universalist Leader. In addition to the valuable appreciation of "A Service of Love in War Time," it gives Friends another opportunity (the war has afforded many) to see themselves through other eyes. Without accepting Dr. Schaick's argument in regard to pacifism we can see that it is an argument we need to be prepared to answer.—Eds.]

The Congressional Library in Washington acquired last year over 7000 volumes in the German language alone which dealt with "The Great War." At the same time there came into the library other thousands of volumes also dealing with the war and written in Italian, French and various other languages. As for books in English, there are many stacks filled with histories, biographies, adventures, letters, memoirs of commanders, memoirs of second lieutenants, and accounts of all kinds of special services—women in war, dogs in war, homing pigeons, spies, aviators, St. Mark's School and almost every other school, and the "27th Division" and all the other divisions.

Into the midst of this mass of great books and trashy books there comes a book which is unique among them all: "A Service of Love in War Time," by Rufus M. Jones, professor at Haverford College and head of the American Friends' Service Committee. It is the account of what the United Quakers of the United States did during the war, principally in France, but also in Russia and Siberia, and since the armistice in Germany and Austria.

I have met Rufus M. Jones a number of times, and I have heard him speak in Quaker meeting. He is an Orthodox Friend, so called, but he might as well be called Hicksite or Universalist. I was genuinely impressed by the breadth, beauty and deep religious feeling of his utterance.

Those are the qualities which characterize this new book. It is a trustworthy account, but it is also an interpretation. Here were people who labored in war time at vital tasks and who glorified their service.

The book tells, for example, about sawing boards, or putting in window sashes, or hanging doors for destitute peasants in destroyed villages along the Marne and in the Somme, but the Quaker boy who nails and hammers writes:

"Oh, patient master workman of the world,

Shaper of all this home of human kind!

Teach me the truer trade of making doors and windows for men's souls:

Windows for letting in love's widening dawn,

Doors swinging outward freely on Truth's pleasant ways."

In France the work was divided into six departments: medical, building, works, manufacturing, agriculture, relief. Three other services had to be added: transport, maintenance, equipment. The work they did was high grade. No organization in Europe surpassed the Quakers in quick adaptability and hard common sense. They did the thing needed and did it with unusual intelligence. And they all fell to with their hands as well as their heads.

It is of the Quaker spirit, however, that I write. Prof. Jones reveals it in every page of his book, and that is why the book will feed the fires of devotion.

Here were men who felt that they could not engage in war, but who felt just as emphatically that "they could not meet the issue passively and do nothing to manifest their courage and their positive faith in the power of love." They had to go to war, face the dangers of war and by their lives testify to love in the midst of war.

When the first fifty-four Quakers reached Paris in 1917, J. Henry Scattergood, who had crossed with our Red Cross Commission, met them and said: "We are here because we feel that we must do something, not expecting an easier life than the millions who are following their light in other ways, and we are ready to do the hardest and the lowliest kind of work. It is not that our blood is any less red or our patriotism any less real. It is that we are conscious that we are the servants of a King who is above all nations—the King of Love, and we must live out His Gospel of Love."

General Forwood, of the British Army, said to me of the English Quakers: "We don't accept their principles, but they have kept their word, played the game, and showed real courage."

I personally knew many instances where Quaker boys in relief work displayed very conspicuous courage under shell fire, in the gas, or in bombed towns—at the work of "seeking and saving that which was lost." Several were decorated by French, Belgian and British authorities.

Though he tells the story with true Quaker kindness, it is hard to realize what happened to some of the Quakers, drafted and sent to camp, who refused to perform military duties. Only a few camp commanders failed to live up to the spirit of the exemption law, but these few apparently made it very hot for the conscientious objectors. The patience of the boys under the contempt, buffeting, and actual gouging makes one think of Calvary.

Quakers keeping out of war, however, is an impossibility. There is nobility but no logic in conscientious objection. In war time whoever raises wheat or corn or cotton makes war, and that in no Pickwickian sense.

We won the last war not simply because Foch and Pershing and Sir Douglas were better generals than Ludendorff and the old Marshal Hindenburg, but because we had more iron, wheat flour, cloth and hog fat.

Whoever keeps society going in war time helps keep the army going. If it's wrong to drive an ammunition wagon, it is wrong to drive an ambulance and wrong even to drive the mail truck or farm wagon back home.

The Quakers were gloriously illogical. These American Quakers in France and their backers here at home helped defeat Germany by keeping up the morale of civilians in France. Strong, tender Quaker hands helped carry our wounded boys coming back from Château Thierry and Soissons. It was magnificent, but it was war.

But, logical or illogical, they draw the line at killing and even at hating. They say, we will do any hard, dangerous, dirty, necessary job no one else wants to do, we will work patiently where no one sees us, no one praises us, we will stand hatred and injustice even, but we won't violate our consciences by standing up and killing our fellow-men.

We bloody militarists who want more war had better let these Quakers go their own gait. We had better see to it that the laws exempting them are carried out "next time." We will need all of them to pick us up, and it will be a stupid waste to shut any of them in prison when they might be at work.

If that "next time" comes the front line trench will be in every dooryard, and a man will need his gas mask in Kansas as well as Flanders.

Better still would it be if we Universalists would join the Quakers now in time of peace in their testimony against war and keep our madmen from hamstringing civilization.

The service of love in war time was this: They went into the Jura mountains, felled trees, sawed lumber, manufactured portable houses, rebuilt burned villages, evacuated refugees, operated maternity hospitals, cared for the tubercular, fought contagion, picked up the wounded, helped in schools for the mutiles, worked at making artificial limbs, conducted children's colonies, ran tractors, plows, reapers, etc., to help peasants get in their crops, and did it so as to make the French love them. The typical French peasants didn't understand them for a long time—and maybe never—but were devoted to them.

Now these same Quakers are feeding Germans and Austrians, who are without question in terrible condition. "Mad, quite mad, my lords and gentlemen." Where are all the sound doctrines of sound theology?

But our Universalist Commission on the Public Welfare will be much interested in this:

"The Service Committee is calling upon young Friends throughout the country to look toward volunteering for at least one year of service for others before entering upon their life career in business vocations. Many types of community service are being proposed for their consideration, while the Service Committee stands ready to open the door for each specific line of activity and to provide financial assistance for the experiment. It is hoped, of course, that many qualified persons will thus be turned permanently into avenues of public and community service."

SPECIAL BOOK BULLETIN.

[These books may be ordered through Friends' Book Store, Eds.]

Special attention should be paid to Neave Brayshaw's admirable little book—"The Quakers: Their Story and Message," which fully justifies the high hopes entertained regarding it. Perhaps of special value is the notice he gives to failures and half successes, and their lessons for us.

Dr. E. Vipont Brown's "Quaker Aspects of Truth," in the popular easy style of his addresses, presents the message of Quakerism in a form easily "understood of the people," and meets a very definite need.

"The Long Pilgrimage," by T. Edmund Harvey (late M. P. and so well known to all Relief workers) was the Swarthmore Lecture for 1921. Its scope is indicated by the sub-title—"Human Progress in the Light of the Christian Hope."

The Student Christian Movement (Associated Press, New York, in most cases) again have helpful books to their credit. Chief is Dr. Glover's "Jesus in the Experience of Men," "The Universality of Christ," by the Bishop of Manchester, "A First Century Letter," and "Towards the Brotherhood of Nations," the latter a good book from the League of Nations standpoint. Our friend Inazo Nitobe has also written a pamphlet on the latter subject entitled, "What the League of Nations Has Done, and Is Doing."

No title has yet been fixed on for Maurice Rowntree's book on the social principles of Jesus and their relation to our life to-day. It is hoped that it will be ready in time for the study circles for the autumn.

There are constant inquiries for Rufus Jones's "Social Law in the Spiritual World," and "A Boy's Religion from Memory," but the demand is not quite strong enough yet to encourage the publisher to consider another and almost certainly a revised edition. An indication from your side as to what support reprints of these books would get, would be of great assistance.

At the Woolman Bi-centenary last year the different editions of Woolman's Journal were practically exhausted. Some unbound sheets of the Chalfont Edition with a Whittier preface have now been discovered.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

Rufus Jones's "Later Periods of Quakerism" is promised for next month. It will be published in America by the Macmillan Co., New York.

A pamphlet on "The Sacraments" by A. Kemp Brown is shortly expected (York 1005 Committee.)

A Digest of the "Standard Quaker Histories," by Rufus M. Jones and William Charles Braithwaite, is being prepared by Elizabeth B. Emmott, sister of the latter and of Anna B. Thomas of Baltimore, and author of "The Story of Quakerism." This looks like being a bulky volume itself and no date can yet be given for publication.

"The Life of George Lloyd Hodgkin," by L. Violet Hodgkin, will be ready almost immediately. It will be privately published but copies will be available at the Friends' Bookshop, London.

FOR CHILDREN.

"Paths of Peace" (Part I, Part II)—peace pioneer biographies are going well, and we welcome the Philadelphia Friends' "The Children's Story Garden," for the sale of which permission has just been granted in England. A Friend, Olaf Baker, has written a good animal story book, "Shasta of the Wolves." The stories in "The Invisible Sword" volume will be found suggestive for Children's Meetings. The surplus stock of "Four International Patriots," lessons on Elizabeth Fry, Froebel, Booker Washington and Kropotkin, is obtainable.

Frank Pollard's "Education and Progress" (from the Friends' Quarterly Examiner) is reprinted as a pamphlet. "The New Era in Education" contains a series of valuable articles on juvenile educational experiments of all sorts.

Sir George Newman's essay on "John Keats: Apothecary and Poet," which appeared in The Friends' Quarterly Examiner, has been reprinted in an attractive form.

OUR GREATEST NEED.

Spirit of God, who in time's early morning
Moved o'er the darkened and chaotic deep,
Into our sinful, storm-tossed world we pray Thee
Come, and our race from utter ruin keep.

Creative Word, Thou Son of God, most holy,
Thou who art still the Life, the Truth, the Way,
Through Thy atonement and redemptive mercy
Rescue our world from sin's destructive sway.

O Thou whose mighty love to man was focussed
In Thy great Gift, Thy loved and only Son,
We crave the blessing, compassing all blessings,
Thy kingdom come, Thy holy will be done.

—SARAH J. TROTTEL.

TEACHING HISTORY.

"A new scheme of work," states the International Review of Education, published for the German League of Nations Society by Dr. Elisabeth Rotten and others, "has been introduced into Swedish schools this year. The following is an extract from the 'instructions' for the teaching of history.

"The teaching of history must be planned and carried out in such a manner as to make the development of peaceful culture and of a political system of government throughout the centuries its chief object. The real purpose of history is to present a true picture of past times, so accounts of wars cannot be omitted. But at the same time it should be impressed upon the student of history that the greater the progress of culture the more has war been looked upon as an evil, and attention should be drawn to the misery that war always brings in its train, though at the same time the difference between defensive wars in order to protect the independence and rights of a nation and aggressive wars for the mere sake of conquest should be emphasized.

"The teacher must take pains not to foster hatred and enmity towards other nations and should impress upon his pupils that peace and a good understanding between all nations is the chief condition upon which the common progress of humanity depends. Children must be made to feel strongly that heroes in the work of peace exist and that through their courage and self-sacrifice their countries have been well served, so that they richly deserve gratitude and admiration."

H. W. PREL.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

BE CAREFUL HOW YOU JUDGE.—When Florence Nightingale was a girl, her playmates used to smile at her and think her singular. This was because, even as a child, Florence Nightingale's thoughts were turned toward human suffering. Her child sympathy for the sick about her father's estate was marked. She thought of them, and went to see them. She was never happier than when carrying food, clothing or some other gift from her parents to these needy ones, who, of course, loved her in return.

Not only toward sick persons, but toward all helpless, living things, Florence Nightingale was tender far beyond the wont of a child. Yet Florence Nightingale, born of wealthy parents, attractive in personal appearance, gifted with winning social qualities and with quick, natural intelligence, and possessed of all benefits which education could give, was the woman who became the "angel of the Crimea."

Is there anyone among your companions who sometimes seems to you a little queer? Be careful how you smile at her. For perhaps what you call queeriness in her is the result of a bigger brain or a bigger heart than God has given to most of us, and which is to fit her to fill a great and needed part in this world.—Selected.

READY TO SERVE.—Mother Porter took down from her pantry closet shelf a large box of prepared breakfast food. Across it was printed in big letters:

"Ready to Serve."

"These ready-to-serve things are certainly handy to have for the children's breakfast," she said as she opened the package and arranged several dishes of the food on the table. "They tire of the hot, mushy porridges, and like these lighter things for a change. I suppose they are good for them, too."

"No doubt," returned her visiting sister. Then, without apparent cause, she laughed suddenly.

"I was just thinking of Sally Brown, at home," she explained quickly. "Somebody told her once that she was like that breakfast food, always ready to serve. It fits, too. Sally doesn't have to fix and fuss and make long preparations, when she's asked to do anything for anybody. She's ready right on the spot, whether it's a neighbor's sick baby, or somebody out of work, or a stray cat or dog that needs a friend. It's a real pleasure to have Sally do anything for you, because she is always ready and willing and eager to do what she can for anyone who needs help."

Mother Porter looked smilingly over the array of ready-to-serve dishes of food that had been so easily set forth for breakfast.

"I suppose we all ought to try to be like that," she said thoughtfully. "Our Lord was so. When the call came to Him, day or night, from rich or poor, from near at hand or far away, when He was fresh and rested or when He was worn and weary He was always ready to serve those who needed Him; ready to help and comfort them all. It's a good thing to remember, Emily."—CORA S. DAY (Selected.)

THE CLOTHING CAMPAIGN LOOKS HOPEFUL.

The united drive that is being made by the American Friends' Service Committee and the American Red Cross is beginning to take on an importance commensurate with the need abroad. The publication of our joint appeal in the Literary Digest of Seventh Month 2nd, the Saturday Evening Post of Seventh Month 6th, and in other important publications is giving it the nation-wide currency that it must have in order to be effective. Still more important, perhaps, is the appeal that has gone out from the National Red Cross Headquarters through the division heads to every Red Cross chapter in the United States to give all possible aid to the effort by local publicity and personal endeavor. Thus it is hoped to reach not only the cities but the remote towns and villages, and to enlist the services of a host of volunteers whose hearts are touched by the distress of their brethren across the seas.

The importance of this campaign as a constructive peace movement, supplementing the present movement towards disarmament, cannot fail to be appreciated by every thoughtful Friend. Professor William I. Hull in a recent article discussing disarmament wisely pointed out the importance of emphasizing the deeper and more fundamental aspects of the problem at a time when the economic motive is so prominent in the press. While others talk of the burden of taxation, it is for Friends to continue to maintain, as they have done for two hundred and fifty years, the moral and religious motive for the abandonment of war. At the same time they need to go still further, if they are to be true to the spirit of Christianity, and build tirelessly the structure of world peace upon the enduring foundation of Jesus Christ. Love is the watchword and service of the distressed is its expression.

Many Friends who would gladly participate in this great outpouring of love, will find that earlier generosity has left them with no clothes to give away. We hope that such Friends will contribute money specifically earmarked for the purchase or shipment of clothes. It is not at all improbable, indeed it is likely, and greatly to be desired, that we shall soon have in our warehouse, or as our share of the stores in the Red Cross warehouse in Brooklyn, a quantity of clothes which will need money to transport across the ocean. Money contributed, therefore, to pay freight charges on clothes will perform a service to the destitute that will be far beyond its intrinsic value. Some gifts of money have already been sent in. Will you who read these words consider whether you, too, are in a position, by the grace of God, to do a little more than you have ever before done, perhaps, in participating in this holy crusade, not against human beings, but against unspeakable misery and in behalf of abiding peace?

SILESIAN CHILDREN BAREFOOT IN THE SNOW.

"Seventy per cent. of the children of Upper Silesia went through the whole of last winter without shoes or stockings," says Howard H. Brinton, of West Chester, who arrived home last week from Silesia and Berlin. Howard Brinton spent most of a year in Upper Silesia, which now is the storm centre between Poland and Germany. He was engaged in feeding the undernourished children as a member of our relief mission.

He states that the majority of the school-children came barefooted to our feeding stations through slush and snow. Sometimes a so-called sandal was worn, consisting of a piece of board shaped to the foot and tied on with string. No stockings were worn.

The suffering and disease occasioned by these conditions cannot be measured. German children are no harder than American children. They are less able to resist cold because of their depleted physical condition. No effort should be spared to prevent the repetition of this unhappy situation the coming winter.

BERLIN ENTERTAINS OUR REPRESENTATIVES.

We are indebted to the Philadelphia Public Ledger of Seventh Month 12th for the account of a dinner which the city government of Berlin recently gave to Alfred G. Scattergood, Chairman of our German Relief Mission, William Eves, Vice-Chairman, and other members of the organization. The coming of the summer holidays and of the first harvests will rapidly reduce the feeding operations from the million mark, recently required by the food situation, to a relatively small number, and many of the workers will come home. Alfred Scattergood and William Eves were each presented with the Berlin medal of honor and a collection of souvenirs made by the grateful children.

The ministerial counselor, in the name of the Government, and the German Central Relief Committee, conveyed through Alfred Scattergood deep and sincere thanks to the Americans who have sympathized with the plight of the European children. He expressed the gratitude of the German people for the great achievement of supplying more than 150,000,000 meals during the past year and a half at a cost of $7,000,000 of American money.

Alfred Scattergood, in reply, said that the Quaker Mission had acted chiefly as the medium for the transmission of gifts from all America. He paid a tribute to the co-operation received from the German authorities, who now were bearing the large share of the expenses of the children's relief work. A delegation of children present as guests entertained the departing Friends with songs and recitations.

VIENNA TO-DAY.

Queues of weary people lining up for hours on end for the sake of a can of cocoa, some soap, or a petticoat or shirt at one of the relief missions; school-children on the streets carrying not toys nor satchels but cans or pails to hold their one daily meal at school; ex-soldiers waiting about on crutches with nothing but rags hanging upon them; tiny babies wailing all day long because of hunger, or wrapped in newspapers even in the hospitals because there are no clothes to put them into—this is Vienna to-day. Even the animals are better off than many of these human beings, for they at least have their fur to cover them.

I came into one house and asked why the children stayed indoors in good weather. "They have no clothes to put on," answered the weary mother.

Three university students came to our rooms and kept their coats resolutely closed, though we asked them to unbutton them in order to take their measurement. Why? They had no underclothes on underneath their coats. At a recent meeting of professors a census of shirts was taken. Not one in ten was found to have a shirt on!

All classes are suffering together. Baronesses sleep on straw; old women of seventy are dependent on foreign food for their very lives. Nine-tenths of the children are rickety or tubercular.

One other day there sat beside me in the street-car a young man and woman sitting with arm locked in arm. They were white, trembling; they could hardly talk. They stared miserably into space. Obviously they had had nothing to eat for days. The young man's cheeks were hollow, his eyes sunken; his belt was tightened over his thin, wasted frame. When the tram stopped he got up unsteadily, helped the girl to her feet, and holding on to each other apparently for sheer physical support, they wormed their way to the door. On reaching it the boy took off his hat and wiped the sweat from his brow, which was dripping with the exertion.

The children who are sent abroad for a few months gain rapidly. They have been known to gain sixteen pounds in six weeks. They come back hopeful and happy, too nearly normal to be admitted to the jealously administered foreign relief kitchen. In a few months they lose the color and the weight they have gained and, apathetic and listless, they become once more candidates for the American Relief Administration meal.

One little tired-out mother said to me: "Things are not so bad now as they were last year. I had six children then to feed and clothe, but now I have only three."

Practically no Viennese of the working or middle classes have been able to buy any clothes since 1913. What they have left now, that is not worn out or threadbare, has to go to the pawnbrokers, where most of the furniture and bed-linen have long since gone, in order to get food and perhaps a little fuel. The weekly ration of coal last winter was seven pounds, which was enough to cook only one hot meal a week,—no more!

Garments received by Viennese mothers for their children to-day mean perhaps more joy and hopefulness than can be brought by one person to another by any other single deed. These people feel deserted by the world, dying in despair and loneliness. A little frock that you may send for a child means more than it seems to; it is a sign that there are people abroad who sympathize with their lot, that they are not entirely forgotten by man and God.

FROM THE CENTENARY OF THE PEACE SOCIETY IN LONDON DURING THE SIXTH MONTH.

Lord Parmoor in his presidential address said in part:—

"We have to ask ourselves quite directly and without leaving loopholes for compromise, whether we are prepared to substitute the idea of brotherhood for the idea of dominance, and the duty of charity to others in place of the assertion of right for ourselves. The whole future of humanity depends on the answer. Unless the answer is in the affirmative I see no prospect of settling the sectional disputes which discount national solidarity or the racial disputes which threaten the permanency of international peace."

"The reality of the perils which beset progressive civilization at the present time needs no emphasis. The war is over, but peace lingers on the lap of outrage and violence. There are danger spots in many places, and it cannot be said that racial animosities have become less acute. In this field as in many other directions there is an urgent need to spread the teaching of the Peace Society to use every effort to bring about a state of world tranquility and world restoration."

Dr. Orchard sent the following message:—

"It is my belief that Peace will never be secured for the world until men and nations are willing to take the same risks for it as they are in having recourse to the arbitrament of war. I believe that the delusion of war will never be broken until some nation is willing to disarm and face all the consequences; there is no telling what those consequences would be, but even if it meant the entire destruction of that nation, I still hold that its action would in time help to emancipate the world from the terror of war. This seems to me to be the application of the Spirit of the Cross in International Affairs, and I do not think that any other methods will give us the same assurance, though I am in favor of everything else being tried."

[AFTER A QUARTERLY MEETING.]—"A number of offerings in the forepart of the meeting; not perhaps without their special savour, yet it is possible the secret bearing of some of these burdens might have profited the meeting as much as the expression of them. Ministers have indeed need of a single eye and of great watchfulness in these large meetings, and those especially who have been newly called to the work are much to be felt for, but I often wish there were amongst us more ability to appreciate the value of a secret travail of spirit for the body's sake."—MARIA FOX.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

THIS item in regard to two of our English boarding schools affords some interesting points for comparison:

Two school reports have reached us, from our two largest boarding schools. Ackworth (average number 336) and Select (160 at the end of the year). The percentage of Friend pupils or those closely connected with the Society was respectively about 50 and about 70. The respective deficits on the year were £4,634 and £2,151. The average cost per child was, at Ackworth, £28.66, and at Select £13.28-10d. The fees for non-members have therefore been raised respectively to £110 and £126 and the minimum for members to £90 and £102 (subject to bursaries). Ackworth notes the "momentous change" in the headship, from Frederick Andrews to Gerald K. Hibbert, and remarks that it "has been made smoothly through the loyal co-operation of all concerned." The belief is expressed that "the past traditions of the School will be worthily maintained, and that further progress will be made."

PARIS QUAKER EMBASSY.—Two very valuable contributions have been made to French Quaker literature during the last few weeks. The first is an excellent adaptation of "The International Situation" (the statement issued by the Special Meeting for Sufferings last spring), made by Henri Van Etten and distributed throughout the Protestant world of France. Its appeal for a great act of healing and reconciliation between nations should prove of great use on the Continent at this time. The second publication is a French translation, by Matilda Melford, of the London Yearly Meeting Epistle (1921). It was read at a meeting of the France Allowed Monthly Meeting held the nineteenth of Sixth Month and was much appreciated. A limited number of copies are available of both these leaflets.—From Mark H. C. Hayler, "Les Amis" (Quakers), 20 Avenue Victoria, Paris (1er Arrt.).

THE summer Quarterly Meetings will begin with Philadelphia on Eighth Month 1st and 2nd. The Meeting of Ministers and Elders Second-day, Eighth Month 1st, at 2.30 P. M. The general session is on Third-day, the 2nd, at 10.30 A. M.

Abington occurs during the same week, viz.: Fifth-day, the 4th, at 3.30 P. M.

THOMAS P. COPE writes to THE FRIEND from Berkeley, California, under date of the 4th: "It may be of interest to know that the Friends' Meeting in Oakland, which the late Edward A. Wright was active in organizing, is still held every First-day morning, at 11 A. M., in the Young Women's Christian Association Building, Fifteenth and Webster Streets, Oakland. A cordial welcome will be extended to any from the East, who are either stopping in Oakland or Berkeley or who may be passing through."

MARY MENDESHALL HOBBS has a large number of friends in the circle of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. These will recognize the appropriateness of the honor just conferred on her by the University of North Carolina. She was given the degree of Doctor of Literature. She has had the scholarly instinct all her life, and has always made good use of her scholarship as a loyal Friend. The Raleigh Times recognizes this in a caption as follows: "Friend Mary Hobbs, Doctor of Literature."

WE are indebted to Sarah B. Leeds for an important correction. General Bliss has been widely quoted by Friends as having said "if there is another war the Christian people will be to blame." In the General's actual statement it appears that Christian people is qualified by the significant adjective "professing."

MESSAGE TO THE PRESIDENT, UNDER DATE OF SEVENTH MONTH 11th.

"To Warren Gamaliel Harding,
President of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

"The Society of Friends of Philadelphia publicly expresses to President Harding their satisfaction that he has taken initial steps to call an international conference on disarmament. We believe that such a conference is the heartfelt wish of the citizens of the United States, and that they and the peoples of all other civilized nations await the outcome with the most earnest desire and hope that a new world order may take the place of government based on force and fear.

"The scope of the proposed program as outlined in the report of the press of Seventh Month 11, 1921, indicates that the conference may be one of the most influential in history not only to nations, but to the lives of individuals.

"In the spirit that recognizes the solemn responsibility and fundamental import of this conference, we urge upon the President that no acts of his Administration will be more momentous to mankind, or more far-reaching in results than the careful preparation for this council of nations, and the choice as delegates to represent the United States of statesmen of the highest type who will regard the peoples of the world not as members of hostile races but as parts of a common humanity.

"We extend to the president our sympathy in this great duty and responsibility that our country has placed upon him, and our hope that in the hand of God he may be used to lead the nations toward true brotherhood.

"Signed by authority and on behalf of the Representative Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

Clerk.

"WILLIAM B. HARVEY,
Secretary."

TO THE CLIMBERS OF MT. EVEREST.

Those far, thin heights we know they will attain—
Earth's last, defiant, unsealed mountain peak,
They left the easy low-grounds for those bleak
Mysterious altitudes, long sought in vain,
Where the wild storms sweep many a vasty plain
Of sliding ice, where frost and darkness wreak
Swift vengeance on the timid and the weak.
Where man must either conquer or be slain.

The spirit hath her pinnacles more steep

Than Everest, and happy vision views

Her stern, unconquered, gleaming summits where

World peace and brotherhood dark secrets keep,

But if that high attempt we dare to choose,

Our feet some day will find the pathway there.

—LESLIE PINKNEY HILL, in the Public Ledger.

DEPRECIATION OF MORAL VALUES.

Depreciation has come to be one of the most common words in the vocabulary of daily experience. A great many people look upon it in the light of a contagion. Like the ordinary round of children's diseases they expect it to pass, and to be speedily followed by what our president calls "normalcy." Such are too apt to ignore the fact that multiplied millions of value have been destroyed. What must it mean in dollars and cents (or in francs) to have the producing population of France reduced by 10,000,000! Does it seem sacrilege to mention such a loss in dollars and cents? And is such sensitiveness other than part of the blindness which obscures fundamentals like this: that we cannot destroy a thing and immediately have it back again? Wealth, strength (of body and character) are matters of creation and growth. Stock exchanges and departments of commerce, even with Hoover as head, cannot speak them into being! If the world was normal before the war (who can think it?), many of us shall not live long enough to see it restored. And what is to be said of moral standards during this general bankruptcy of values? One needs but to go to the nearest grocery or to buy even an ice cream cone to perceive how value has gone out of staples. It is sober commercial papers, or widely-famed financial writers in our great dailies, who bemoan the "lost morality of trade." Is it quite fair, however, to attribute all this to the war? Is it not possible that a depreciated morality had a measure of responsibility for the war? Some principles of grave import are disclosed by these questions and it is worth while to attempt "to think the subject through" as clearly as possible.

The so-called revolt against Puritanism has been a two-handed warfare. Radicals have renounced the whole system. To them the dogma "obedience to law is liberty" has invaded the domain of "personal rights" and they will have none of it. The movement against prohibition is in essence of this character. It largely ignores the plain teaching of physiology, of social well-being of economics, of the rights of the unborn. So plain, thirty years ago, were these matters that it was not impossible to include them in the regular courses of study in our schools. Must the radical be governed thus by one principle when he finds he is affected by it, or by a reasonable resultant of many? Was Puritanism so definitely one-sided that we are forced to be wholly for it or wholly against it? A large class of people would quickly reply to such a question. "by no means." Puritanism to them was right in aim—its method only needs revision. Things are not abstractly right or wrong. They are only relatively so. And thus begins a process of revision. The old-time austerity must yield to liberalizing influences. Self-denial, such say, must surrender to self-expression.

It is needless for our present purpose to follow either of these reactions to its extreme implication. Many sober people honestly think they both lead to the same philosophy, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die!" This dilemma now and again urges people on both sides of the globe to forsake the world and to seek life in secluded prayer, or in Nirvana, if they have the Oriental nature. Our special object in this editorial is to confess to a surprise at facts of our national life recorded in an editorial in one of our great dailies under the caption, "Prize Fighting in America." Our readers will form their own conclusions as to the bearing of these facts upon what is so generally named "The revolt against Puritanism." Says the editorial:—

People who never read the sporting pages of the newspapers are unaware of the great number of professional boxing contests that take place each year.

The premier heavyweight fights, like that between Dempsey and Carpentier, challenge their attention because the reports of them usually overshadow all other events of the day. But these championship battles are not often staged. In between there is constant activity in pugilistic circles.

The New York World almanac for 1920 devotes four solid pages of fine type to the boxing events of the preceding year.

The record shows that several hundred fights between professional boxers "of prominence" were staged in that year. If all professional contests of high and low degree were counted, the number for 1919 would doubtless rise well toward 1000. And the number of amateur bouts under the auspices of athletic clubs and associations would remain to be considered. It is obvious that the boxing industry enjoys a high degree of prosperity in this country.

Omitting the portion of the editorial dealing with gate receipts, in which the growth from $4000 to $400,000 is dealt with, we quote one of the concluding paragraphs. The significance to our discussion rests in the way in which the sport has been "refined."

The apparent popularity of professional boxing, or prize fighting, can be explained, however, without necessarily attributing to the American people an increasing degeneracy or coarseness of taste in their amusements. In consequence of the deserved attacks on the older prize fighting, the bloody beastliness of it was considerably curbed. Boxing with bare fists is no longer tolerated as it was in the period of the great Sullivan's primacy. "Finish fights" are under the ban. No state in the Union, not even Nevada, would now permit such an exhibition as the Sullivan-Kilrain fist fight to a finish in Mississippi a generation ago. Most of the States have laws that place public boxing under the regulation of a commission, and while the number of rounds permitted varies in different States, the extreme limit is fifteen in New York and Connecticut. New Jersey allows pugilists to "go" twelve and no more.

Our great daily gives us no clue by which we can reconcile the defense against "increasing degeneracy" with the staring headlines, used by it and by most of the higher-toned dailies, calling attention to the "Brutality" of prize fighting. It can hardly be brutal on one page, and "not degenerating" on another!

But is not this whole process "of degeneracy by refinement" the most threatening peril of our day? Is it not manifest in growing degree in the moving picture shows by which the stage has come to be an every-day influence in the lives of multitudes of our fellow-citizens? It is the testimony of a Friend who has seen numerous popular reels that she has yet to sit through one in which, in the interludes at least, there have not been some degrading spectacles!

Are we driven back after all to the austerities of Puritanism? Is the morality of religion compatible with the rush and tumble of life in a human society like ours?

It may not be wholly apart from the mark to appeal for a better understanding of the ideals and methods of Puritanism. Did it actually aim to expunge the esthetic nature? Did it aim at nothing better than an atmosphere of gloom? One of the great University Extension lecturers from England in this country had no more attractive lecture than that on the Puritan. His picture was of the positive side,—of the culture of restraint and it would be difficult to imagine a higher and more lovely type of home life and of civic virtue than that he presented as normal to many Puritans in the seventeenth century. Similarly, as has been before noted in these columns, it is no less an authority than Thomas Wentworth Higginson who pictures the extreme type of ancient Quakerism (his picture seems like that of Gertrude W. Cartland) as the very acme of attainment in culture and taste. Has the fact that Puritan and Quaker have too often ignored this side of their natures had a part in a general misunderstanding of their aims? Self-denial—the cross if you will, leads to the table-land of refinement in culture as well as to the full fruition of the spiritual life. If Quakerism is to be presented as "a way of life" to an inquiring world is it to cultivate the austere virtues of restraint—the positive side of these virtues, or is it to attempt to suppress the grosser elements in the usual round of interests, classed by an ancient writer as the "lusts of the flesh and the pride of life?"

J. H. B.

"The ministry, as it is recognized amongst Friends, is so unshackled—such liberty is given for the exercise of the gift bestowed, so extensive the field . . . and so varied the services to which [ministers] may be called, that it is peculiarly important all the means that can be employed for the help and instruction of these should be brought into exercise. Many young ministers (perhaps older ones also) do, I believe, suffer greatly for want of timely counsel. . . . Whilst we must not in any degree diminish the importance of ministers looking with a single eye to their heavenly Leader and Guide, . . . they must bear in mind that whilst to one is committed the gift of prophecy or preaching, to another is given the discerning of spirits; and that it is the Lord's will that this people should be subject one to another, that all may learn and all may be comforted."—MARIA FOX.

"The Way into the Great Values" then is to be willing to take pains with our inner life, and to give free play to those deepest instincts of our nature which lead us to respond to the things of eternal worth."—EDWARD GRUBB, in "The Religion of Experience."

IRELAND.

The report of the Committee for Relief Work in Ireland was presented, with certain minutes also of the Meeting for Sufferings.

John Henry Barlow referred to his having been one of those who, some little time back, had visited Ireland in the interest of peace, reconstruction and reconciliation. Was it not an amazing thing that while thousands of pounds were pouring into Ireland the reason was, not that there was a famine or anything like that, but that there was practically a state of war there. The conditions had resulted in a policy of reprisals, the policy of an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth and a life for a life. Arson and murder were abroad naked and unashamed. With regard to the query what should we do? there was no single solution. We need not, however, therefore despair. He would appeal to Friends to use every opportunity that might arise to improve the situation. We needed patience with Ireland, with the Government, with the people of England. Whatever might be said, Ireland had undoubtedly suffered grievous wrongs at the hands of England, and she, being the stronger, should make the first approach to peace. England had tried over and over again to help Ireland; but, with the best intentions, had failed. Let us each pursue the spirit of reconciliation. But that was not quite all. Did we believe in prayer? Ireland believed in prayer. Then let us pray. We had and we were praying. Might we then continue to pray as we had never prayed before for peace in Ireland. And while praying, let us not ask for vengeance, but that God would send out His light and His truth, that His spirit might touch the hearts of the people of England and Ireland, might heal the sores, the wrongs and sorrows of centuries past.

Charles E. Jacob acknowledged the help rendered by English and American Friends. He believed much could be done in the way of loans rather than doles. On the point of reprisals and evil acts of the other side, he felt strongly. He believed that if the newly started boycott continued, England would find her patience sorely tried. He prayed that the English people might be granted patience. Sinn Fein started with high ideals, but for what was now going on, Ireland was in danger of retribution and even of losing her own soul. The great hope was that there might be a truce between the parties, though how it was to be brought about he did not know, but Friends could pray that the opening might come.

Gertrude Webb felt extremely grateful for the work Friends had done in Ireland. There never was a time when the two countries should be more closely drawn together. England could never crush the soul of Ireland, which was more alive than ever. Though Friends could do but little, what they had done was extremely valuable.

W. Blair Neatby was glad that we had been called to our duty in this matter, but thought we should have something definite before us. He doubted whether the withdrawal of the armed forces of the Crown from Ireland would be a good thing, because of the probable consequent alarm of the moderate men and women in Ireland, those who considered themselves loyal. That would not make for a calm consideration of the subject. If there were withdrawal it should be done partially and gradually. The practical step which he would suggest was that all parties should meet to discuss the position without any restriction whatever. He believed in talking frankly to people in their own homes to find out the real position. He believed that Protestant ascendancy in the Northeast portion of Ireland was collapsing; and in many other ways he could see the wisdom of a free convention of all parties in Ireland.

Bertram Pickard remarked that no one acquainted with the facts could doubt the reality of the Irish war, the outstanding need being that that condition should cease. First there should be a truce, and then negotiations between the parties. Beyond that he did not see that much could be done.

We had a committee concentrating on the work of relief in Ireland, and it would not be sufficient to make a general pronouncement from this Meeting and leave it there. He thought we should work in co-operation with the Dublin Committee in favor of a truce and open negotiations to follow.

PEACE AND DISARMAMENT.

Marian E. (Lady) Parmoor introduced the report. The world, she thought, was sick unto death, and Ireland was a symptom of the disease. What were we doing to bring the world back to the will for peace? To do that we must go back to our doctrine of the inner light and its relation to world peace. All the difficulty of the present moment came from the too common belief in the power of coercion. When in Austria recently, she and her husband were amongst people who had been driven to desperation. All these great questions hung round the principle of consent as against coercion and conscription. The only real and true sanction for government was the sanction of moral weight, and the Society must bring this to the mind of the world as against domination and coercion. That was the first question. The second was disarmament. There would be no sanction of consent until we had got rid of the whole military system. The third point was our idea as to the League of Nations. Friends had a duty to put before the world what was right and what was wrong in connection with the League of Nations. The American Ambassador the other day suggested the idea of a Federation of Free Nations. It might be that the present League would come to nothing, and if so, she hoped it would go forward into the real Federation of the Nations of the World which we all desired. Might this question so take hold of us that we might each go forth as an apostle of peace. And might not the Continuation Committee of the All Friends' Conference call together from the ends of the earth all members of the Society of Friends to deal with this question at as early a date as possible.

John William Graham, speaking to the Lancashire minute, described armaments as the outcome of mutual fear, with which were associated commercial interests, and the oldest profession among men, that of the soldier, two of the strongest forces in a country. This demanded a frontal attack, as well as an appeal to people generally. The only reasonable chance of the world, practically bankrupt, returning to stability lay in the extinction of armaments. Among threatening clouds on the world horizon was the promotion of a new Defence Act in Australia, with the likelihood that it would provoke Japan, to which the Premier of that Colony was apparently looking forward. A danger to peace was the rivalry between this country, the United States and Japan, and though we could hardly imagine the possibility of war between ourselves and the United States there were conditions which tended in that direction. He hoped Friends would support, so far as was possible, the work of the Disarmament Committee of the League of Nations, but above all work earnestly towards instilling in the minds of men the utter utility of the use of all material force in the settlement of disputes.

Frederick Merttens said that for two years we had had a man-made Peace. Friends should seek to promote a Peace of God, uniting humanity.

Francis E. Pollard laid stress on the fulfilment of our local responsibilities in the promotion of the peaceful and peaceable spirit.

Joseph Bevan Braithwaite urged our support of the League of Nations, which had done wonders with regard to disarmament during the short time of its existence. Herein Friends would find their most effective influence could be thrown.

TEMPERANCE.

Arthur Dann said we had been thinking about peace and the use of force, and he knew no greater enemy to peace in the home than this monster liquor traffic. In a short journey in London the other evening the doors of licensed premises being open, he saw a great deal of evil going on inside; but even that was as nothing compared with the evil scenes outside, with the crowds of little children at the doors. The Prohibition movement in America had been a great success in most respects; and at home our enemy was amongst us much more seriously and threateningly. Let us pray for the abolition of this traffic and seek to make England a sober nation.

WAR AND THE SOCIAL ORDER.

The report of the Committee on War and the Social Order was presented during the three Committee Conferences held during the year,—at Ockley, Scarborough and High Ashurst, besides the International Conference held at Oxford shortly after the Conference of All Friends. The Committee also sent in a minute urging the application of the Eight Foundations of a True Social Order in our Society life and organization; and in regard to industrial problems expressing a sense of "the immense possibilities contained in the conception of each industry organized as a self-governing public service."

Malcolm Sparkes said it was none of their aim to attack employers, whose good intention he would acknowledge. He did not feel that Friends had been misled. The Guild was an attempt to put into practice the ideal of building for public service and not for profit. The fact that the employers did not join was the reason for the Building Guild not having won universal acknowledgment. "Service substituted for servitude" was the description he applied to the Guild system. It was a big change, and the results would be a colossal improvement. The men working in the Guild understood that they had a work which was their own, and by removing the fear of unemployment enthusiasm took the place of indifference, and the work was well done. Surplus funds, instead of paying dividends, went to the improvement of the service. The present condition of industry was an impossible one; there was no solution in State control, and therefore they came to the point at which a self-governing industry had arisen, the new idea being that an industry should organize itself to give service to, rather than get service from the community, a system in which nobody was an employee and nobody was an employer. The capitalist used to hire labor, but under the new system, labor would, if necessary, hire capital. He admitted the enormous risks of what they were doing, but if they accepted the principle they must not flinch from the risks.

(To be concluded.)

MOORESTOWN FRIENDS' SCHOOL.

The first year of the combined schools (Friends' High School and the Moorestown Friends' Academy) ended Fifth Month 9th, when Commencement exercises were held in the East Meeting-house. The Senior class numbered nine, five girls and four boys, of whom six were Friends. Three of these read essays, all of a high order of excellence. Roger Test's subject was "The United States and Haiti," Elizabeth Walton gave a well-proportioned and illuminating résumé of the work of Friends abroad, and Robinson Cole spoke on certain aspects of the Negro question in the United States. Following the distribution of diplomas, Professor Paul M. Pearson addressed the class.

In several of the classes enrollment to capacity had occurred before the close of school this spring. A few will leave, going to Westtown, George School, the Baldwin School, etc. Any day school must expect the boarding-schools to claim a proportion of its older pupils, but our losses this coming year promise to be numerically slight.

The following new teachers have been engaged: for the Junior High School, Sarah R. Haines (B. A., Vassar College); for the Elementary School, Rebecca E. Walton, Fifth Grade, and Ruth C. Russell, in the Kindergarten. Louisa M. Jacob returns after a year's leave of absence. Several of the faculty are taking summer courses.

The boys' locker-rooms are undergoing alterations, and steel lockers for the older boys are being installed. In two or more of the class-rooms, more modern arm chairs will replace the stiff, formal benches and desks.

Hopes are high for the School the coming year. The following sentence, taken from the opening paragraph of the new catalogue, we feel to be entirely justifiable: "The success of the first year has more than met the expectations of those who were instrumental in bringing about the union."

W. ELMER BARRETT.

COUNTRY DAY SCHOOL FOR CITY BOYS.

[NOTE.—The multitude of school children imprisoned by circumstances in the city limits must often appeal to the thoughtful as a serious problem. Not only do such have a right to the great out-of-doors, they have a necessity for it, if their physical development is not to be impaired. The experiment reported in the following article may be a prophecy for the future. With some adaptations we have reprinted it from the New York Evening Post, which maintains an important educational page.—Eds.]

Those who believe in the country day school—the type of school that has grown up around most of our large cities, where there are parents who wish to keep their sons at home and yet wish to give them the benefits of the out-of-door life during the day—will draw encouragement from the experience of the Polytechnic Preparatory School of Brooklyn, which has now had four years in its country environment.

When "Poly Prep" left her old home on Livingston Street, where for more than sixty years she had dispensed education to several generations of Brooklyn boys, there were many who feared for the venture and not a few who openly prophesied failure. In her new home at Dyker Heights, close by the sea, flanked on either side by Fort Hamilton and the golf links, away from the many distractions of the heart of the city, the school had all her old good points, however, save nearness, and added the advantages of new, well-ventilated fire-proof buildings and twenty-five acres of playing fields close at her doors so that every boy should have the chance to develop his athletic side and play as the country-bred boy may, outside the "little red school house." It was found, too, that the all-day feature brought much closer touch between masters and boys and between the boys themselves, giving the brotherhood of boarding school life during the day while keeping the boy in touch with the influences of his home and his church, with the conditions of the community in which he will probably live and with the boys who will be his probable associates in the work-a-day world later.

"Four years is long enough to test the wisdom of the trustees and of those who prophesied failure," said an official of the school. "During these four years we have had a war that called away many an older boy and brought to every school a sense of unrest that bore hard on the quiet forces of school work; we have also had a winter of coldest weather and the deepest snows known to the oldest inhabitant. Certainly the test has been severe enough. What of the results? Do they seem to justify the change? From the first year the school has been full; last year many boys were turned away for lack of room. This year forty-six Poly boys will go to colleges, as follows:—

"Williams, 13; Princeton, 7; Harvard, 5; Cornell, 5; Poly Institute, 3; Amherst, 3; Yale, 2; Dartmouth, 2; University of Pennsylvania, 1; Long Island Medical, 1; Hamilton, 1; Lafayette, 1; Colgate, 1; Stevens, 1.

"Four boys will go directly into business. Of the thirty-one boys who went to college from Poly last year, not one has been dropped for failure in studies or for other reasons.

"It seems fair to say that the trustees and not the prophets of failure were right, that the change has been a success in every way and that it has solved a serious problem for those parents who honestly wish to have their sons at home with them, yet given the chance for out-of-door life during the day removed from artificial amusements that city streets afford in such abundance."

HUMAN RELATIONSHIPS.

SEEING OURSELVES AS OTHERS SEE US.

To see ourselves as others see us is a wholesome experience at times and generally proves interesting. The following by a well-known Oxford man, R. H. Tawney, should give us pause. He is speaking to the Conference of the Student Christian Movement in Glasgow,* the main note of which was, in his thought, the consideration of methods by which Christian propaganda may be made more effective among non-Christian people. "But," he says, "propaganda is a matter of action and not of words. What persuades men is not speech or writing, but a way of life visibly expressed in a society which they feel enlarges their personality and makes them conscious of new powers. The main testimony to Christianity ought to come, not from Christian apologetics, nor even through individual Christians, but from a Christendom which is greater than them both."

"And it is from Christendom, its international relations and its economic order or disorder, that the main argument against it is derived."

"It is idle for the emissaries of Christendom to endeavor to persuade non-Christian people to believe that the Christian faith contains a solution for their problems as long as Christendom itself preserves its purity by jealously guarding that faith from contact with its own." If this is true, foreign missions need missionaries at home as well as abroad.

"I remember very vividly," Tawney says, "a conversation which I had some years ago with an Indian friend and the retort which I provoked when I tried to speak of the social ethics of the Christian religion. 'I do not allude,' he said in effect, 'to the periodical paroxysms of mutual destruction which overtake European nations, to the systematic immorality of their great cities, or to their occasional lapses into government by terror among those races which are temporarily so unfortunate as to be subject to them. These things (he went on) are sins of the passions, from which, however odious, few peoples can escape. What bewilders the observer is not the occasional aberrations of the Christian nations, but their habitual conduct and organization; not their failures, but their standards of success; not their omission to live up to right principles, but their insistence that wrong principles are right. Your religion (he said) is a noble if paradoxical creed, which affirms that all men are brothers; that humility and poverty are blessings, and riches a dangerous misfortune; that the way of service and self-sacrifice is the way of happiness. I do not blame you for not reproducing those theories in your practice; evidently they are esoteric and not meant for daily life. What surprises me, however, is that in your practice you erect into a system the duty and happiness of practising precisely the opposite. The normal condition of your social order is an economic civil war, which you hardly trouble to conceal. Your industrial system involves the regimentation of the masses of mankind by a few thousand rich men, who are individually, no doubt, innocuous, but who quite frankly regard their subjects as somewhat rebellious and inconvenient instruments of production. The normal canon, by which you judge those who have deserved well of the commonwealth, is how much money they have amassed, and to them you sell political power. Your creed is exalted, but your civilization is a nightmare of envy, hate, and uncharitableness. I would forego the former in order to escape the latter, and I hope that my fellow-countrymen will escape the contamination of Christian society in order that they may continue to retain some of their own, not wholly un-Christian, virtues.'"

These words of an East Indian call to mind similar ones written by one of our own American Indians, Charles A. Eastman: "From the time I first accepted the Christ ideal it has grown upon me steadily, but I also see more and more plainly our modern divergence from that ideal. I confess I have wondered much that Christianity is not practised by the very people who vouch for that wonderful conception of exemplary living. It appears that they are anxious to pass on their religion to all races of men, but keep very little of it themselves. I have not yet seen the meek inherit the earth, or the peacemakers receive high honor."

"Why do we find so much evil and wickedness practised by the nations composed of professedly 'Christian' individuals? The pages of history are full of licensed murder and the plundering of weaker and less developed peoples, and obviously the world to-day has not outgrown this system. Behind the material and intellectual splendor of our civilization, primitive savagery and cruelty and lust hold sway, undiminished, and as it seems, unheeded. When I let go of my simple, instinctive nature religion, I hoped to gain something far loftier as well as more satisfying to the reason. Alas! it is also more confusing and contradictory. The higher and spiritual life, though first in theory, is clearly secondary, if not entirely neglected, in actual practice. When I reduce civilization to its lowest terms, it becomes a system of life based upon trade. The dollar is the measure of value, and might still spells right: otherwise, why war?"

And again, "I was constantly meeting with groups of young men of the Sioux, Cheyennes, Crees, Ojibways, and others, in log cabins or little frame chapels, trying to set before them in simple language the life and character of the Man Jesus. I was cordially received everywhere, and always listened to with the closest attention. Curiously enough, even among these men who were seeking light on the white man's ideals, the racial philosophy emerged from time to time."

"I remember one old battle-scarred warrior who sat among the young men, got up and said, in substance: 'Why, we have followed this law you speak of for untold ages! We owned nothing, because everything is from Him. Food was free, land free as sunshine and rain. Who has changed all this? The white man; and yet he says he is a believer in God! He does not seem to inherit any of the traits of his Father, nor does he follow the example set by his brother Christ.'"

"Another of the older men had attentively followed our Bible study and attended every meeting for a whole week. I finally called upon him for his views. After a long silence, he said:

"'I have come to the conclusion that this Jesus was an Indian. He was opposed to material acquirement and to great possessions. He was inclined to peace. He was as unpractical as any Indian and set no price upon his labor of love. These are not the principles upon which the white man has founded his civilization. It is strange that he could not rise to these simple principles which were commonly observed among our people.'"

"These words put the spell of an uncomfortable silence upon our company, but it did not appear that the old man had intended any sarcasm or unkindness, for after a minute he added that he was glad we had selected such an unusual character for our model."

What is our answer to words like these? Is Tawney right when he says, "The real enemy of Christianity is not ignorance or apathy or indifference—the real enemy is a virile and militant creed, which affirms that the main end of man is to obtain the mastery over his fellow-men which is conferred by economic success. That faith is in itself a kind of religion. It is established at the very centre of our industrial organization, and only a faith can overcome it. If Christians are to be true to their creed, they must not nibble with pious phrases at the circumference, they must strike at the citadel and decline to be intimidated by talk of economic expediency into distrusting the social ethics of their own faith."

"When I am told that though the hearts of Christians burn within at the spectacle of social injustice, yet they are restrained from expressing their opinion by deference for economic principles or because they do not know what to do, I confess it appears to me a piece of self-mystification which is singularly lacking in plausibility. Christians need not feel that exaggerated reverence for economists. Economists rarely feel it for themselves, and they never feel it for each other. And, after all, Christians have both a right and a duty to let their attitude towards the main social issues of our day be known. . . . They (the churches) could see that every individual who comes in contact with them learns what Christians think and what the Christian tradition is with regard to matters of economic conduct and social organization. They have a public position and status. They can let the powers of this world understand the sensations which are raised in their minds by the decision to save money at the cost of the rising generation, as though children were the one class which you never do wrong to defraud; by the spectacle of unemployment, of which we have been warned again and again during the whole of the past six years, and for which during these years up to this very evening no adequate provision has been made; by the mendacity which induced a body of trade unionists to suspend their strike on the promise of an inquiry, and when the strike was averted, broke the promise to carry out the report in which the inquiry resulted. . . . We cannot evade these responsibilities by saying they are economic or political instead of describing them as what they are—issues which are moral because they concern the relation of man to man and the conduct of human society. The world is waiting to-day for some voice which will lift these questions on to a spiritual plane. Its unrest is not merely economic, it is moral. Men seek not merely greater comfort, but a society which may offer freer scope for the development of personality and may be guided by nobler motives than those of personal gain. They desire, though they do not always know it, some synthesis of religion with the practical interests of their lives which may give their work a new dignity by relating it to a spiritual aim. I believe that, if they are true to themselves, the Christian Churches have it in their power to offer it. I believe that by restating the social ethics of their own faith they can point the way to a society which may enjoy not only greater material comfort, but spiritual peace, because its social institutions and its industrial organization, and its economic activities, will be an expression not merely of economic convenience, but of righteousness."

ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE.

A DEPARTMENT CONDUCTED BY JOHN T. EMLEN.

NATIVE AFRICANS IN AMERICA.

One of the outstanding results of the World War has been the awakening of the nations to the needs and advantages of education. On all hands we hear the cry for schools and more schools, and now from Africa comes the same appeal.

There have come to this country from Freetown, Sierra Leone, on the west coast of Africa, two native women who bring an appeal from their women to the people of America, and from Zululand on the east coast comes a tall, powerfully built Zulu, once a student of Hampton Institute.

It is the intention of the women of Sierra Leone to study American schools with the object of starting the first vocational school for girls in West Africa, and to raise sufficient funds to enable them to take advantage of their government's offer to give them one-half of what is needed for the building and equipment, provided they raise the other half. The African woman has not yet had her chance. The boys of West Africa have an opportunity for every kind of training. There are good industrial and technical schools, as well as high and grammar schools, and even a college, but for a whole thousand miles there is not a single school that caters to the vocational education of African girls.

The Zulu has started four schools for academic training, but he finds it more difficult to start a vocational school in his section. There are two important reasons for this: one is, that the white mechanics and tradesmen dread the competition of the Negroes; and the other is, that the employers do not want to lose some of their best skilled labor from agriculture and mining.

These leaders from among the African people have visited many of the large colored schools in the South, for they believe that the Negro in America has better opportunities for education along all lines than in any other place in the world. The Zulu, Cele, is expecting to have all of his children educated in America, while he and his wife work among their people in Africa.

The purport of the message that the women bring is the need for a new type of education in Africa, an education that will keep the best in the native life and customs, and graft on to them from western civilization all that is needed for the development and progress of their people along modern lines. The native African is naturally not ashamed of working with his hands, but this is certainly not true of the so-called educated class, which is still under the influence of the Victorian tradition that "a lady shall not soil her hands and a gentleman must be engaged in one of the professions."

In speaking of the conditions in West Africa, one of the ladies from Sierra Leone, said, "The keynote of the twentieth century is Christian efficiency. Some twenty years ago one could keep body and soul together in West Africa for ten or fifteen cents a day. The impress on West Africa of Western civilization, however, has broadened the ideas of the African. How can the economic change be met? We believe it can be met through Christian efficiency. This is what we propose, with the help of our friends, to give to African girls. The missionaries already working in Africa are doing an excellent work, but the field is so vast that we feel that Africa will never be won for Christ unless the African himself, and especially the African woman, is trained to take a share in the work. Many think of Africa as a land of savages, but it is a misnomer to call people savage who do as beautiful art work as do the Africans who have never come in contact with white people, who engage in communal life, who have such a deep veneration for motherhood, such innate ideas of politeness and such a romantic and spiritual outlook on life. Many of these so-called savage people are worshipping the unknown God and are far nearer the principles and ethics of Christianity in their simple native life than when brought into contact with the worst of western civilization, which is invariably the first to reach them. Our object is to train girls who will feel called to go into the interior and bring light and understanding to those people before the introduction of new railroads, etc., brings commercialism into their midst. We also want to help the girls who will remain in the city. It is so hard for them to keep their self-respect without any money in their pockets, and it is impossible for them to earn any without training. It is astonishing to think that in a city with a population of a hundred thousand there is not a single trained domestic science teacher, stenographer, typist, book-keeper, dressmaker or milliner. There are girls who have an elementary knowledge of some of these things, but no one who is sufficiently well trained to earn her living by it."

"We, too," said her companion, "have been swept by the nationalistic impulse which is afflicting so many of the peoples of the world, but ours is a cultural rather than a political viewpoint. We wish to preserve the African instinct to beautify everything. The people in the interior, among whom I have lived, have very decided artistic longings. They decorate every conceivable object,—wooden spoons, calabashes, trays, horns, and even discarded whiskey bottles and cigarette tins. They work straight away on metal, leather and wood, and do most beautiful work in gold with very crude tools. The costumes which we wear are woven by our own people on native looms. The wonderful colors are native dyes and the designs are the expression of the beauty they see around them in tree, plant and animal life. We in Africa feel proud of American Negroes and we want them to take a greater pride in their ancestry. Indeed, we wish people everywhere to see and know about the work that has been done by Africans who have not been influenced by outsiders."

These two ladies say that they are deeply impressed by their cordial reception in America and appreciate to the full the right hand of fellowship which has been extended to them by both races.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

WITH clear insight and common sense we have amended our Constitution and have provided the greatest single economic factor looking toward material prosperity ever created by legislative enactment. I believe that the economic value of prohibition will eventually be an influence for the prosperity of society the like of which will amaze ourselves and the world.—FRANK A. VANDERLIP.

OPPOSERS of Prohibition are saying, "The people of this country were never allowed to vote squarely on adopting this Eighteenth Amendment." The answer is—the Constitution of the United States is not amended by popular vote. No previous amendment has been enacted by a direct vote of the people. If a "square vote" instead of a vote by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress and three-fourths of the States is so highly desirable, why was it not urged before? For many years the prohibitionists labored in every State of the Union for the popular vote in areas large and small, and their opponents used every means they could, both fair and foul, to prevent the issue from coming to a vote. It will become them now to reverse themselves and criticize the fair and legal process by which their case has been outlawed.

The talk of the "wets" should not be taken too seriously. They have shown themselves to be poor prophets and unscrupulous transgressors of laws, big and little. They predicted a general strike of labor when prohibition went into effect. They said, if there is to be "no beer, no work." They were mistaken. Recently they said there would be a protest parade in New York City of 100,000 men or more, and possibly some of their leaders may have wired to their Congressmen to this effect, but the fact is well established that the maximum number in line, including hired musicians in ample force, did not exceed 14,000. The demonstration was, perhaps, more gratifying to the prohibitionists because of its failure to represent in numbers or character of participants the spirit and nationality of our country, than it was to the organizations opposed to prohibition, who complained that the weather was too hot and dry.

Is there any "revulsion" against prohibition? The American Issue answers as follows, referring to the vote taken on Seventh Month 5th:—

The lower house of Congress passed a bill prohibiting the use of beer for medicinal purposes by a vote of 251 to 92. The Congress which voted so overwhelmingly against the brewers was elected last autumn, and the wet and dry question was an issue to a greater or less extent all over the country. These Congressmen are fresh from their districts, and in last fall's campaign had the opportunity of finding out the wishes of their constituents on this as on all other questions at issue. When the brewers and their supporters can line up fewer than 100 Congressmen out of a total of more than 400, it is difficult to see that "revulsion against Prohibition" about which we hear so much from the wet camp.

FACTS TO BEAR IN MIND.—Independently of the Eighteenth Amendment, we have nineteen States under prohibition by their own constitutional provision, fourteen more, in addition Alaska and the District of Columbia, are under statutory Prohibition, and of the remaining States nine have passed codes to enforce the Amendment. Of the remaining States two have passed such codes, but one was vetoed by the Governor (Wisconsin) and one was declared unconstitutional by the Attorney General (Massachusetts). In California the proposed code has been referred to the people. In three States the matter rests with a future session of the Legislature.

HAS CRIME INCREASED?—Recently the Anti-Saloon League made inquiry of the District Attorneys of Pennsylvania as to whether there had been in their respective counties an increase or decrease in crime in recent years. Comparison was asked between the years 1914 and 1920 as to the number of cases returned to Court for trial by committing magistrates. Thirty counties, including Philadelphia and Allegheny, sent in careful and definite reports. The area thus covered includes over sixty per cent. of the population of the State and is thoroughly representative of the State as a whole. Eleven of the counties reporting show an increase in the number of commitments and nineteen counties show a decrease. It should be borne in mind that during the interval between 1914 and 1920 the population has increased considerably, but notwithstanding this, the showing in figures is as follows:—

	1914	1920	DECREASE
Philadelphia	8,621	8,446	175
Allegheny	4,267	4,083	184
Other Counties	8,982	7,594	1,390

As to the number of cases returned for infraction of liquor laws, the reports showed a decrease of twenty-two per cent. The latter point is especially interesting, showing as it does that violations of liquor laws are probably no more numerous under prohibition than under the former license system.

FIGURES FROM SAN FRANCISCO, forwarded by our friend Walter E. Vail, as taken from the police records of that city, show that total arrests per annum five years ago were 51,430, whereas the total of the last annual report was 26,673, a decrease of nearly 50 per cent. The decrease in the number of arrests for drunkenness is 500 per cent. per annum. In spite of these facts, the wets have been asserting that drunkenness and major crimes have increased under prohibition.

THE CAMPBELL SUPPLEMENTAL PROHIBITION BILL, which passed the House (as before stated) by a vote of 251 to 92, offsets the Mitchell Palmer ruling by preventing the use of beer as medicine on a physician's prescription; prohibits the manufacture and importation of liquor until present stocks held under government order are exhausted; limits the number of prescriptions a physician may write to ninety in three months; and applies the prohibition act to Hawaii and the Virgin Islands.

THE Federal Prohibition Commissioner now under appointment is Major Roy A. Haynes, of Hillsboro, Ohio, formerly an editor and active in the temperance reform. He is about fifty years of age and a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He believes in enforcement and has made some very encouraging promises to conduct the work of the office with "efficiency."

THE Federal Prohibition Director for Pennsylvania is William C. McConnell, of Shamokin, whose headquarters will be in Pittsburgh. He has been prominent in Republican politics for many years. His department will have about 160 agents and other employees, with a total salary list approximating $300,000. The expense of operation, however, should be fully covered by fines collected. His appointment was the suggestion of Senator Penrose, and has not been received by the temperance forces with enthusiasm. However, he has taken the trouble to 'phone to the Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League to assure that organization that he intends to enforce the law rigidly to the utmost of his ability. In this he should have the hearty support of every good citizen.

COLONEL HARVEY DRINKS WATER.—At the Pilgrims' banquet in London, Ambassador Harvey responded to all toasts with clear water, refusing all the alcoholic courses. The Colonel even refuses to compromise on grape juice.

THE Republic of Finland put the National Prohibition policy into effect one month before the United States went dry under war-time Prohibition. There, as here, there has been continuous effort put forth to break down the law and create a situation whereby the people will become disgusted and demand the return of the license system. However, in a recent vote in the Parliament on a measure sponsored by the liquor interests the "wets" are reported to have been defeated overwhelmingly.

SCOTLAND has recently closed 350 saloons out of the 440 that the London Daily Chronicle says were marked for extinction. Forty were in the city of Glasgow. It appears that the "liquor trade" in Britain is of the same stripe as in this country. We read that twenty-five public houses near Glasgow are "doing business as usual," in defiance of law. There is a measure of anxiety, however, among the sponsors of the business.

The Brewers' Gazette, a British liquor paper, says, "If Local Option obtains a footing in England, as it may do now in Scotland, then very quickly Prohibition will follow on its heels. It behooves us to battle strenuously against the thin end of the wedge, and not to bolster ourselves up with the delusion that Prohibition is outside the range of practical politics."

RETURNS IN IRELAND.—Ulster elections—all temperance candidates were returned, several at head of the poll, and there is a probable strong temperance majority in Parliament. The leading publican and anti-prohibitionist in West Belfast only polled 311 out of 56,000 votes. The president, four vice presidents and two members of the executive of the Ulster Temperance Council all were successful.

THE NEXT YEAR.

Just how much longer is the relief work in Europe going to continue? Hasn't the time come when we ought to do more for our home people and let the European people take care of themselves? Aren't the Germans so prosperous that they are able to take care of their own poor? The above represents the questions that have been asked me since Rufus Jones and I returned from inspection of the European fields. They demand an immediate and emphatic answer.

The need for relief for European women and children cannot be met for many years. The long period of undernourishment and the effects of the depletion of the reserve stocks of clothing and food will be felt for many years to come. It will be many years before the average families in Austria, Germany, Poland, Russia, or other of the newly-created eastern States are able to provide for their own needs. The real question is, how long is it desirable for foreign relief agencies to co-operate in such countries? To really pauperize would be worse than to starve the people, and the serious question is, how much longer should an agency such as the American Friends' Service Committee continue to give relief to these war-stricken countries?

At the present time the German mark is selling at 65 for the dollar. Previous to the war they sold 4 to the dollar. At the present time the Austrian kronen is selling 665 for the dollar; before the war it sold five for a dollar. At the present time the Polish mark is selling for over 2000 for the dollar, the pre-war value being 5 for a dollar. Salaries and wages have been increased in all of these countries but living costs have soared. It is very evident that a family of five with a total income of the equivalent of $7 per month cannot possibly get ahead. This economic situation must be taken into consideration if our question is to be answered.

During the war practically all the countries of Europe made war materials. Little if any attention was paid to the necessities of the civilian population. Mills and factories had sufficient reserve stocks to supply the immediate demands of the great majority of the people. With the cessation of the war, however, and the falling value of the currency, mills and factories were not able to produce. Raw materials could not be procured, and little by little the people were brought down to the barest necessities.

Until the governments quit making war materials it is absolutely impossible for the mills and factories to turn again to the manufacture of articles for civil consumption. Until the governments of the world quit juggling with the exchange and extend credit on raw materials to the impoverished nations, it is impossible for them to meet their own needs. It therefore resolves itself into this. Either the relief work for these countries must be continued during another year at least or the people must die. The clothing situation will be more desperate this coming winter than at any time since the war began. The three-and-a-half-million children who have been fed through the American Relief Administration and through the American Friends' Service Committee show great improvement. Food cannot be procured locally, however, to keep them in a normal condition and there are still many hundreds of thousands who need supplementary food. The business conditions in America are not as good as they were even six months ago, but living conditions in America as compared with living conditions in Europe are as different as day and night. The waste of America would feed Europe. The cost of one battleship would supply one supplementary meal a day for three million children in Europe. The need is there, the wealth is here, and under such conditions it is quite evident that a Christian people cannot refrain from doing their part.

It is to be hoped, therefore, that sufficient funds will be found in America to enable the child-feeding work in Germany to be continued on the basis of supplying food for 500,000 children a day for eleven months, beginning with Tenth Month, 1921. That in addition to this, at least $500,000 worth of clothing and cloth in the bolt can be distributed among the most needy people. The agricultural, seed distribution and general relief work in the devastated areas of Poland and among the Russian refugees should be continued. In Austria, where Herbert Hoover's organization is now supplying the food for all of the children, it is desirable for Friends to administer relief for the salaried and professional classes of people, who on their present income have not sufficient provisions to keep body and soul together. The light of the little candle of the hospital in Serbia, which is set upon a hill, must not be allowed to go out. As the one foreign relief agency working in Russia there is a door open before them which no man can shut. The little babes born in the hospitals in the Friends' Maternity Home at Chalons-sur-Marne cannot be left to die.

Jesus Christ is being interpreted to the peoples of Europe through the food and clothes and service which Friends are giving at the present time. More than the material relief is the re-awakening of faith and hope and courage in the hearts of the depressed peoples. It is not by might, nor by power, not in the quantity of canned milk that is being sent in, but the "In His Name service" which is being rendered at the present time that salvation is being brought to the world. This is the day for which we have prayed. We have put our hand to the plough and cannot turn back. Let us continue to pray for the spirit of Christ to dwell in our own hearts and for the material things which will enable us to minister to the needs of the world.

WILBUR K. THOMAS.

THE FIGHT.

It was during the Russian retreat out of Poland soon after the Great War began. A fur-capped, bearded man clad in sheepskin, a revolver in one hand and a burning torch in the other, burst into the house with a curse and shouted that in half an hour our home would be burned. We collected what things we could in our wagon and fled to the east. Looking back, we saw our village go up in smoke and flames.

It was not a lonely trail, this one that we were taking. The battered track that wound across the plains towards the eastern horizon rumbled with the thud of retreating men and horses and guns. Scattered among them were frightened refugees like ourselves, some of them driving cows and sheep, blocking the way and being cursed and hurried by the impatient soldiers.

On and on we went, past village after village, finding carts, livestock, children and soldiers everywhere. Streets were full of camping families, using their wagon as a shelter. No food was to be bought for man or beast except here and there secretly a little at exorbitant prices. Our money came to an end, the savings of years gone! The mounted military with their awful whips cutting the air shouted their orders to us to move on. Horses were out on that ceaseless dusty march; cattle became crippled; acute fatigue and dysentery claimed our little children and our old men. The road began to become the Way of the Cross. A horse or a cow had to go for a bushel or two of potatoes, or a father's best coat for some bread. But it was still on and on, day after day. "Get on, don't take our food!" was the greeting everywhere from the distracted villagers. At last the time came when our most prosperous farmers were reduced to beggary and their children to stealing such scraps as could be found.

Since baths were unheard of, disease began to be rampant among us. Typhoid and typhus crept in, claiming thousands of victims and strewn by the roadside a trail of rude crosses.

At last we reached a railway junction. Here the military authorities commanded us to board the train. We had to part with most of our remaining possessions. Our precious horses and carts had to be left behind. We got for them what we could, but there were many sellers and few purchasers. In the scramble for places, parents lost their children and their baggage. To be left meant utter destitution and each one fought for himself.

The train was sent off, as we learned afterwards, without instructions as to its destination. We were passed on from one station to another to get rid of us. Babies were born in the moving train. Men and women died there. Days stretched into weeks and weeks into months. Feeding and medical organization along the railways broke down utterly under the endless stream of human victims of the barbarity of war.

At last, after months like this, remnants of the families that had left what is now the eastern border of Poland forsook the train in towns and villages in various parts of Russia, and some, we learned, found themselves in far Siberia and Turkestan. We from our village, what were left of us, stopped in the Samara district and there we spent, in a life-and-death struggle with hardship, the remaining years of the war.

THE RETURN.

Six years passed thus, hard, sad years. At last the endless war was over. Many of our number had died. We lost two of our own little ones during the famine-winter. Some of our friends had started on the long trail back to Poland and we became impatient to go. Report said that one could now safely cross the border. We had accumulated a few things which we were able to sell and buy a thin horse and a rickety cart. The rest of our personal effects we were able to tie up in a few bundles, and with a couple of bags of rye we set out in our turn, my wife and I and our two remaining children, one 12 and the other 10.

I will not tell you in detail the history of that weary journey of more than a thousand miles. Enough that we lived through it and arrived, just as the water began to freeze in the ponds, in sight of our own familiar fields. You can imagine our excitement. We knew that our village had been burnt when we went away, but one cannot help hoping that some miracle may have happened to make things look somewhat as they used to be. Alas! no miracle had taken place. The nettles were growing four feet high on the ruins of our former home. Little heaps of mud and ashes on both sides of the road were the only evidences that once houses stood there. Occasionally a part of a stove, built of clay in the Russian fashion, stood gaunt and solitary in the midst of weeds.

As we drove along, the tears streaming down our cheeks, we came at last to a stack of straw near which two children were playing. Some boards standing against the stack indicated that it was occupied. We stopped our tired horse and went in. A neighbor's family which had returned in the spring was living here. A hut made of wattles and straw stood not far away in which, we were told, lived other neighbors who had come back the autumn previous. Three other families similarly situated completed the population of our once prosperous village.

For ourselves there was nothing except to dig a hole in the bank beside the road and construct a dugout. A door of twigs and straw would keep out the wind. Perhaps the coldest nights we should be able to crowd into one of the already overcrowded huts of our more fortunate friends.

This we did. As you see, we survived the winter. Here we are. Thanks to the Friends' Relief Mission, we were able to plow our land this spring and plant it with seed which they gave us. Our children eat at the kitchen of the Americans. These clothes that we have on came also from the Friends. Without the Relief Missions we should be dead. Apart from what the children get at the American kitchen we are subsisting on nettle soup and bread made of the potatoes which we have begged wherever we could find them. Our only hope is to keep alive until better days shall dawn. The Friends are talking of helping us to build houses, the Government furnishing the timber. It seems as if we could not exist through another winter like the last. May God grant that they will be able to help us! And may God bless the kind men and women abroad whose hearts have been touched by our great misery!

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE CASTLE HOME.—Deep in the heart of a German forest lived little Nana and her brothers and sisters. They were the children of the forester, and Nana was the eldest. She was very happy in her life, although it was a narrow one. She helped her mother with the housework and the children, and brought fagots for the fire, but when her mother wished her to learn to read or to sew she was impatient and unwilling.

"Surely," she would say, "I know enough for the life we lead; why should I trouble myself with what is above me?"

One day her mother, who had been lady's maid at the castle before her marriage, said to Nana: "Put on your holiday dress to-day. I am going to see my mistress, and I shall take you with me."

With a glad heart Nana got ready, for it was a great joy to know that she should at last see the inside of a beautiful castle she had admired so often from a distance.

The noble lady received them very kindly, and her little daughter Therese was charmed to have a playmate, and earnestly begged that the little girl might be allowed to stay; and so it was arranged that Nana should spend a few days at the castle and sleep in the housekeeper's room and help to amuse Therese, who was just recovering from an illness.

The week that followed was one of unmixed delight to the forester's child. A new world opened to her. To her surprise she found that Therese, who she had supposed lived a life as free from care as a bird or butterfly, was day by day expected to perform her appointed tasks and duties, and submit to the firm but gentle rule that was exercised in the castle; and with wonder she saw the beautiful work that came from her brush or her needle.

When she returned to her forest home it was with the promise that, if she would fit herself for the position, she should, when she grew older, become the lady's maid of the little mistress of the castle and live there always.

And now what a change was wrought in Nana. No longer did her mother have to struggle with her to force her to attend to her instructions. Earnestly did the little girl plead with her to teach her all that she knew, and patiently hour by hour did she apply herself to her task, until her clumsy fingers grew nimble and skilful, and she could do beautiful work, of which Therese herself might have been proud.

Not less marked was the change in her whole manner and mode of thought. When little Carl broke the lovely cup she had prized so highly in the past, instead of grieving as she would have done a few months ago, she bore the loss quite calmly.

"I shall have so many beautiful things when I go back to the castle," she said, "what does it matter?"

When the children were rude or troublesome, instead of being angry she would say gently, "It will be such a little while that I shall be among them; surely I can be patient while I stay."

When her companions' rough ways annoyed her, she would think, "I should be sorry for them, they know no better; they have never been inside the castle; they do not know how they should conduct themselves." And so, as time went on, it seemed as though the thought of the castle life became the reality and her daily life the dream.

I wonder if the children who are reading this story know why I have told it to them? We, too, have the promise that we shall live in the palace of the great King. Are we fitting ourselves for that life? Does the thought of the joys that await us make us able to submit patiently when the joys of this life are taken away?

When those around us trouble us, does the thought of how short a time we shall be among them help us to bear with them uncomplainingly, and instead of being angry, do we grieve for them—because they have no hope of ever living in the King's beautiful home?

Let us try to realize that the life to come is a very real life, and that in a little while we shall have our part in it, and that the object of living is to be ready when the King calls us to come to Him.—ALICE BROOKS, a Friend of Baltimore, Md. FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

By invitation as representatives of London Yearly Meeting, Robert O. Mennell and Perry Bigland attended a Conference of Mennonites at Lunteren, Holland, Sixth Month 13th to 17th. Both Friends had opportunities to speak and their messages were well received.

THE mid-summer number of Friends' Fellowship Papers is at hand. The editorial on London Yearly Meeting is revealing. John S. Hoyland (whose recent marriage to Jessie Marais is noted) has a fine article on "Jesus and Nationalism." A brief article from Canada is the only American voice. "Prisons and Prisoners in Vienna" is handled ably by Olive Hestline. She has this statement, "the moral acts of compassion a man hath the greater is his soul." Young Friends in New Zealand are clearly depicted in their name and activities by A. B. Pudney. The editor, Elizabeth B. Howard, makes "Three Note-worthy Books" seem indispensable to Friends, viz.: "The Quakers, Their Story and Message," A. Neave Brayshaw; "The University of Christ," William Temple; and T. E. Harvey's Swarthmore Lecture, "The Long Pilgrimage." The three make a good summer program of reading for Friends.

In reporting California Yearly Meeting, the American Friend notes that there was "an epistle from the Esquimes of Alaska in their own quaint English, signed by four of their number."

At the conclusion of the term at Westtown last Sixth Month, one applicant for admission next year, under the rule admitting children with one parent a member, was on the list. Those who anticipated a great influx will be surprised at this.

DEBHAM QUARTERLY MEETING, England, has a very practical way of keeping in touch with the children of the meeting at boarding school. The Friend (London) notes that a picnic was arranged for those at Ackworth from this Quarter, and "four carloads of visitors and children spent an enjoyable time in the woods concluding with sports and games."

PENDING direct information we are able to report from The Friend (London) that Abner and Ella Newlin were with A. Kemp Brown at Bergen on the fifth of Sixth Month, and in attendance at the General Meeting for Norway on the eleventh and twelfth of the same month. It is noted that Thorstein Bryne "interpreted excellently clause by clause for the visitors." "The following week both parties were leaving for Germany."

IN a communication to The Friend (London), Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin has this very interesting paragraph:—

"Perhaps the most significant and in some ways the most hopeful fact in China to-day is the New Thought Movement. It is an idealistic movement, a revolt against organization and outward authority and dead traditionalism, and a searching out after truth, after a better social order and after a greater measure of individual freedom. The moving spirits are young men who have been educated abroad, largely in the United States. The centre is in Peking. They are not opposed to religion, but they have no confessed religious basis. They seem to me to have a good deal in common with the Frei Deutsche Jugend, and they seem to turn their thoughts more directly to social betterment and to be stronger on the practical and perhaps weaker on the mystical side. I am hopeful that we may find so much in common that I may be able to help them to see how to relate their movement to Christian thought. It seems to me that this is a place where the Quaker presentation of truth may come in just at the right time and save some of the finest young life in China from drifting into antagonism to all religion."

IDEALISM IN ACTION.

The general depletion of civilization, now so much and so often the topic of public speech and of the newspaper press, has one outstanding refutation that must give thoughtful persons everywhere a thrill of hope. We refer to the almost electric effect throughout the world of every expression in high places of a noble idealism. The last year of the war with its consummation of human misery was sustained by this idealism. The voice by which it was expressed seemed to speak in terms of world leadership. Even yet it cannot to many seem possible that the great forward steps toward world-order, then apparently so imminent, were vain steps. Be that as it may, we are again under the spell of this thrill of idealism. The gulf-stream of better things has once more swept toward shore and the warmth of a new order is in the air. President Harding's call for a Disarmament Conference puts him for the moment in the class of world leaders. Can the great resources that have been stirred by his call be made active for world progress? Or shall we fall back again into the arms of despair and its attendant misery?

It behoves us all in the face of such great promise, and especially in remembrance of former defeats of such promise, to inquire how idealism is to be translated into action, how it is to be harnessed to the rough and tumble of a practical world? And first of all if we are to understand the larger bearings of this problem, must we not inquire how each one of us may become a practical idealist? Is it not probable that the process in its individual bearings is closely related to the larger aspects of it in its bearing upon world processes?

Let us then admit that much idealism in personal as well as in national life does fail of its end. The very common expression, he is a mere idealist, reveals this common failure. It is a charge that many of us have had to face. Have we candidly attempted to analyze the reason for it? Is not this very general criticism based on the thought that idealism belongs in the world of sentiment as distinguished from the world of action? Do we belong to that large class of those who do not take the pains to express our sentiments in acts? Does our lofty thinking, our noble feeling exhale as a mere mist without "watering the parched ground?" These queries may serve to remind us that idealism only becomes practical fact by a process of down-right hard work. The practical idealist is the hardest worker in the catalogue. Early and late, "in season and out," to use the Scripture expression, he is tireless in his energy and determined to let no difficulty "stay his hand." But such an attitude reveals the further, perhaps the absolutely essential element, in any honest effort to translate idealism into life. It can only be done by sacrifice. One must give up ease, pleasure (in the limited sense of that word), the rosy path, to climb the heights and attain the goal. As common as this philosophy is, as evident as the principles behind it are, we live in an age that does very much overlook it.

Idealism for the state as for the individual demands work, demands sacrifice. Who are they to pay this price? Where, particularly, now the war is over, are those to serve the country for the joy of service? How much and what sacrifice do we willingly make for the State? If we think about it for a single moment we see how much inclined we are to expect declarations and pronouncements to work themselves. They simply will not. They demand something of us. Prohibition, disarmament, international and inter-racial amity, demand something of us if they are to become practical policies.

And do we not in our own individual lives reflect something of the difficulty that does actually annul world idealism? Is it not a common effort everywhere to escape sacrifice. Our forefathers in the Truth were determined to express their sense of brotherliness, of truth-speaking, of restraint and simplicity, at whatever cost of sacrifice. On that foundation they created a type of service and of character. Do we desire to claim the type without the cost? However limited our circle, however obscure our path, we may be able to make a contribution toward world idealism, if we take the right path, if we meet the conditions of persistent hard work and of sacrifice in expressing our own idealism.

J. H. B.

THERE never was a time when folk of every class and kind searched more hungrily for spiritual Reality, for Purpose in their lives, for the real significance in personal and social life of the teachings of Jesus; for ways to invest personality in activities that really count. In every corner of the world men and women are thinking urgently of these things, seeking to find The Way.

They will not be satisfied with formalities, however ancient, nor put off with phrases, however eloquent or entertaining. If anything is happening to the Church, it is due to its failure to know "the day of its visitation." If anything is discrediting the ministry, it is because it has lost the missionary spirit and no longer feels in its soul the "Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel," no longer cries "Here am I, send me!" This is no time for perfunctory job-holding in the places of inspiration and leadership.—N. Y. Evening Post.

THIRD-DAY MORNING, TWENTY-FOURTH OF FIFTH MONTH.

The pressure of business in recent years tended to crowd out the meetings for worship to which the morning of this day of the Yearly Meeting was devoted. The frequent occurrence of this condition led to the decision to substitute for the full morning's meeting "a prolonged period for worship," prior to the opening of business. This period—from three-quarters of an hour to an hour—was used on this occasion, as previously foreshadowed, by Ella Newlin, from Iowa, who, in a sermon of some length, expressed her concern with regard to a lack of spirituality among Friends as among other religious bodies. Repentance, she feared, was a word out of use in the present day; but the Church must come back to it before it could do acts "meet for repentance," a thought on which our Friend impressively enlarged. Previously she had appeared in supplication.

SCHOOLS COMMISSION REPORT.

The following points of that report seem to find an echo in American experience:—

THE HIGHER COST IN THE SCHOOLS.

"Meantime [in the last six years], the cost of education has increased so much that the normal fees for Friends at our schools are now roughly double what they were in 1913. It is true that the cost of living may go down and give some relief, but the charge for teachers' salaries is likely rather to rise than the reverse. The future cost of education at our schools is likely to vary from £80 a year upwards, and there is abundant evidence that many Friend parents are finding that this is beyond their means. Subscriptions come from the margin of income, and it appears clear that on the whole Friends are poorer as a consequence of the war. The income from endowed funds has not been increased; these in most areas are drawn upon to the full, and are said to be 'at the breaking point.' The appeal for the Central Endowment Fund has so far been an almost complete failure.

THE NECESSITY OF REDUCING THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS.

"Under these circumstances we cannot expect to carry out the recommendation of the Education Commission and increase the number of Friend children at Boarding Schools by one hundred; rather is it quite unlikely that we shall be able to keep up the present number, 750. The question is forced upon us how many schools the Society can afford to maintain efficiently, and the situation clearly suggests a general policy of concentration."

The conclusion of the report is in this sentence:—"After the history of the past one hundred and fifty years it is almost impossible to conceive of the Society of Friends existing without its own system of education, yet Friends should realize that the present crisis and present tendencies in the Society already require us to face this vital problem."

John W. Graham remained opposed to the abolition of a single Friends' School, as a centre of happiness, of dearly won tradition, of Quaker instruction and influence.

Ernest E. Unwin did not agree with the last paragraph of the Commission report and hoped that a Conference would be called. A John Bellers might arise to lead us forward. A new organization must follow the moving of the Spirit and not precede it. The living Spirit of Education needed passing on from one to another and this could only be done by the living soul. In the hope of getting the Society enthusiastic for education he hoped a conference might be called.

Lucy F. Morland thought we should consider how to meet the difficulty that rising costs were driving Friends' children out of Friends' Schools. She feared that many of these were among those who most needed such training. The best we could offer should be given, irrespective of financial ability or social position. Neither should it depend upon local trust funds or the presence in a Monthly Meeting of wealthy Friends.

While thinking of the possibilities of improving our schools—we should make everything of the best possible—we must take a wide view of our responsibilities. We could not provide Boarding Schools for all our children; therefore the next important thing to consider was the position of those children who could not attend our schools in this country, including those who ought to be there but were not, and who needed the fostering care of the Society.

THIRD-DAY EVENING.—HOBART SCHOOL.

The remaining subject on the agenda for the day was the report from Hobart School.

Lucy F. Morland said the school had a great hold on Friends not only in Tasmania, but throughout Australia; in fact, it would not be too much to say that Hobart was one of the great links binding Friends together in the whole Commonwealth. She thought that the school could hardly be rated too highly in the service it rendered to the Society. The accommodation, especially for the staff, would be considered quite inadequate for our English schools, though the brighter climate allows of so much outdoor life that this did not matter so much as might be feared. The school ranked as a secondary school, but had not achieved quite the level of similar types of school in this country. On the other hand, the standing of the school left nothing to be desired; it was most highly thought of by others not connected with Friends. The great difficulty facing the school was finance. Costs had risen seriously and would rise still more. There was no chance of raising fees either for day scholars or boarders. There was therefore a great demand upon the generosity of Friends at home. If the General Meeting of Australia could have the control of the school it would probably make all the difference in its prospects. It would be possible to attract teachers from England with a real concern for the spread of Quakerism in Australia. Perhaps Friends there had not yet sufficiently appreciated their responsibility for the proper maintenance of Hobart School.

FINANCE.

The minutes of the Conference on Yearly Meeting Finance held last autumn, the Yearly Meeting Accounts and a minute of London and Middlesex Quarterly Meeting with regard to the raising of its quota to the Yearly Meeting Fund were before the Yearly Meeting at the closing session. The Accounts showed that only five of the Quarterly Meetings, two of them among the smallest, had made up the quota asked for a year ago, and the total, £5,763 11s. 1d. (including amounts paid by six Quarterly Meetings after the accounts were closed) was £1,763 8s. 11d. short of the £7,500 asked for.

The reading of the Epistle was followed by a period of worship, at the close of which the concluding minute was read.

Notwithstanding some feeling of disappointment, the Meeting closed on a clear note of hopefulness, beautifully expressed by Rufus M. Jones in the final session. He desired that we might have our souls lifted above the discouragements, defeats and disillusionments and go back to our tasks with the vision of hope. The prophets had three ways of facing the difficulties and catastrophes of their times. The first was the way of Amos, who regarded them as a revelation of the eternal justice of God—God holding a plumb-line, the everlasting law of moral gravitation. But justice is not enough. The second was the way of Habakkuk—the way of resignation. "Although the fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall there be fruit in the vines," etc., "yet will I rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation." Whilst it was well to be strong in spirit, it will not do to say, under the bludgeonings of chance, "my head is bloody but unbowed." There was a third way, the way of Hosea, who saw something higher than either of the other two. Though his wife had been unfaithful, had sinned greatly and been sold into slavery, yet he did not cast her off, but loved her all through, sought her out and loved her back to him again. Hosea found God was like that and that the valley of trouble was a door of hope. Rufus Jones hoped Friends would go home with a triumphant sense of the infinite power of God and His love, praying that we may be the organs of that life, spirit and love and may be baptized in a faith that cannot be overthrown.

MINUTE SENT TO LONDON YEARLY MEETING BY THE ENGLISH COMMITTEE ON WAR AND THE SOCIAL ORDER.

[NOTE.—London Yearly Meeting in 1920 adopted a Minute requesting the War and Social Order Committee to formulate practical proposals, and authorizing them to arrange for a conference in this connection. The Committee held a conference at High Ashhurst in Third Month and adopted a Minute to be sent to the next Yearly Meeting. I have received from the Secretary a copy of this Minute, which appears below. It is marked "Confidential until after Yearly Meeting."—E. W. E.]

"We have given careful consideration to Minute 96 of last Yearly Meeting requesting us to formulate practical proposals.

"It has not been possible to arrange for a conference, but we put forward the following suggestions which, if the Yearly Meeting so decides, might be submitted to a conference to consider and work out the details more fully.

"Starting from the Eight Foundations of a True Social Order adopted by Yearly Meeting in 1919, we urge that the Society of Friends should itself act honestly and courageously upon its professed belief in equality of opportunity. This involves:—

"(a) Such financial arrangements as will ensure that the management of the Society's affairs shall be no longer so largely in the hands of men and women of leisure and assured income. All should share according to their concern and capacity. No financial stringency of the moment is an excuse for shirking this obligation.

"(b) A genuine effort to bring about equality of opportunity in education. The difficulties of the day threaten to accentuate the present inequalities. The prospect of Quaker Education being limited to the children of those who can afford to pay high fees is one which we must all deplore.

"In our consideration of industrial problems, we have been impressed with the immense possibilities contained in the conception of each industry organized as a self-governing public service in which all sections pull together as one team for the common object, and no longer pull in different directions for the disposal of surplus profit product. This gives hope of removing many of the grave evils of the present régime; it satisfies the test which our Society has itself approved; it appeals to the great motives of service, adventure and comradeship; it will enlist for constructive purposes much of the enthusiasm and energy at present seeking a disruptive outlet.

"We recognize that this conception will need working out with care and expert knowledge, and that varying methods of approach and diverse schemes of organization may be desirable. In the Building Industry a beginning has already been made. The Mining and Transport Industries, the Distributive Trade, Education, Banking, to mention only a few instances, may all adopt it in varying form.

"We welcome the signs that the Trade Union Movement, no longer merely defensive and resistive, is becoming constructive, and is rising to this new vision of creative service. We ask the Yearly Meeting to declare for this new industrial Democracy, for a system in which management becomes leadership, deriving its authority no longer from the shareholders, but from those who do the work, and harmonizing public ownership with full industrial self-government.

"While we are not unmindful of the risks to the whole community, we think they should be faced in responding to the call of this great venture, the re-organizing of our industries and vocations for service rather than for gain. Industry for service, developed throughout the world, will ultimately destroy the roots of war, and render armaments absolutely meaningless in face of the rising spirit of human comradeship."

FRIENDS IN DETROIT.

A REPORT AND AN APPEAL.

[NOTE.—The work of Friends in Detroit is of wide interest, as it combines the members of various Yearly Meetings in a common effort. Our correspondent (a Philadelphian) reports that a prominent Friend of the Middle West has said, "I wish there were more Philadelphia Friends here in this meeting—those of you who are here have a real service in maintaining a proper balance."—Eos.]

Friends of the meeting in Detroit feel that they would like to share with others some of the satisfaction which they obtain in a review of the first year's work ending Sixth Month 30, 1921.

Until the Third Month, meetings for worship and First-day School were held in a club-room on Adams Avenue on First-day mornings, with occasional evening meetings either there or in the homes of our members.

Early in the Third Month, through the generosity of a visitor to our meetings, Augusta Voight, the large home at Second and Ledyard Street, owned by her, was given to us for use, pending a final disposition of the property, and since this date full advantage has been taken of the gift by fitting it up for a real Friendly centre.

Meetings are held regularly on First-day morning at eleven o'clock, preceded by a First-day School at ten A. M. A meeting under the care of our younger members is held at 7:30 First-day evening, while on Fourth-day evening a meeting for worship is held, usually led by one of our members or by a visitor who may be with us. Our Monthly Meetings follow this meeting on the first Fourth-day of the month.

Class meetings of the First-day School are frequently held, with light refreshments during an evening, and women Friends meet one day a month for sewing and for the study of Discipline. The encouraging feature of these meetings is the attendance figures.

Out of a record membership of eighty, divided into three classes: (a) active, those who have joined by convictionment, or by removal certificate from some Monthly Meeting under the Five Years' Meeting, (b) associated, children of active members, and (c) affiliated members, these being members of some Monthly Meeting other than the Five Years' Meeting, who may be temporarily residing in or near Detroit; we have an average attendance at our First-day morning meeting of seventy-five, and about one-third of this number regularly attend the other meetings. For the quarter just ended the First-day School reports an average attendance of forty-five with sixty-two listed as members.

Roy Wallam, a Pastor from Spiceland, Ind., has been released by the Indiana Yearly Meeting and the Five Years' Meeting Board for service here and has been actively engaged in co-ordinating the various interests and especially visiting each of the several hundred people whose names we have, who should become interested in this meeting. Inasmuch as this meeting in its membership is represented almost wholly by those who have come to Detroit to work, it has in it much of the pioneer spirit of earlier days, and the loyalty of our ancestors is witnessed here in the desire to serve the community under the standard of Quakerism as far as it can be applied within a cosmopolitan environment.

With one or two exceptions (chiefly among those not active in the meeting) there are no persons of material wealth in the meeting, yet during the past year about fifteen hundred dollars have been raised to meet the expenses of the meeting and to assist suffering people in other lands. The subscribing of such an amount has meant a very considerable sacrifice on the part of many, especially during the hard times of the past six months.

In justice to the Indiana Yearly Meeting and the Five Years' Board, it can be said they have arranged to help support this meeting, believing that the success attending the efforts of those active in the meeting merits their consideration. Inasmuch as the membership of the meeting comes from such widely different sections of the United States and Canada and even Australia, the writer feels that the time is now at hand when Friends generally can help with a modern Friendly work of prime importance to the society at large, by taking this meeting under their prayerful consideration, and as way may open either visit it in person, advise us of any Friends who may be in this vicinity, send Bibles, books or literature of a timely interest for our Library, or help in a financial way.

If in the next six months we can prove to the donor of the magnificent home, that we are carrying on a meritorious work that has the approval and support of Friends generally, permanent arrangements for the continued use of the property by the Friends is more than a possibility. Centrally located as the house is in a big apartment house section, with but one church for many blocks around, it would seem to all that unusual opportunities are before us, and the fact that twelve or fifteen non-Friends from the immediate neighborhood are usually in attendance at our First-day morning hour for worship encourages us in the belief that more will be glad to worship here when it becomes better known.

Another feature which has possibilities is that one of the larger daily papers has signified its willingness to print on the church page each Seventh-day an article prepared by our committee on "Friends and what they have been doing." A committee is under appointment to prepare such matter for publication, but feels the subject needs very careful consideration in order that the matter submitted may have a live interest.

This meeting is represented officially with the Detroit Federation of Churches, and their annual report, just issued for the past year, gives a total of twenty-two thousand admissions to church membership within the fourteen Protestant denominations associated, during the past year, of which number sixty per cent. confessed no previous church membership.

A very large proportion of the million persons in Detroit is made up of those who have come here to work. Large numbers of these are comparatively young people. This presents an unusual field for religious effort, and nowhere is there a better opportunity than here to present the Friendly message. Friends are doing excellent work in the foreign fields, there seems to be little difficulty in arousing interest in movements far away, and yet Detroit is a rich field, ripe unto the harvest, just at our doors. It offers untold opportunity for those who care to have a part in a service at home, and the writer can assure such that they will be welcomed, whether for a brief visit or an extended sojourn.

A real service may be rendered by sending us the names of Friends who may be living in or near Detroit, or by informing them directly of this Friendly centre.

W. G. HEACOCK,

OUR OPPORTUNITY I

THE CHRISTIAN MESSAGE AND THE ORIENT.

JOSEPH E. PLATT.

(Joseph E. Platt for a number of years past has served as a Y. M. C. A. Secretary in China. He is to return to his work there within a few months.)

Some of us heard Frederick Libby's strong appeal at George School—all of us should ponder his article in the Intelligencer, and the editorial of Walter Abell in the issue of Sixth Month 25th. These and similar calls and challenges that beat against us continually demand a response. What are we going to do about it? The hour for the Society of Friends to rise and function in a larger way is here. If we are really in earnest we cannot shift this responsibility.

We hear much to-day about the early Friends and the spirit that drove them forth as messengers. In the lives of those Friends and of others who have been used of God there is one outstanding impression—the contacts these men have consciously established in two directions. It is because of these contacts that men and groups function. They cannot help it. Great results are as inevitable as is the starting of a motor when the switch is thrown in. These two lines of connection are first with the living God, and second with men and their need. Here are two concrete tests that we should be consciously and constantly applying to our individual lives if we desire to be classed as followers of Him who came that men might have life and have it more abundantly. Is our contact with God vital and deepening from month to month? Are we actually touching the lives of men? Life on these terms costs, but it is the way into which Christ calls us to follow.

This, as it seems to me, is our "next step" in preparation for the great work ahead. We want the Society of Friends to function fully in this hour. We want to feel that at this time of need and opportunity our contribution is extending the boundaries of the Kingdom. As far as we personally are concerned it depends on connections. We must make them. That is our task. We do not need to worry about the big results. They are God's concern. He functions through our connections. We see it clearly in the Friends' Service work. As we have broadened our vision and established new contacts God has liberated forces that amaze us. Why limit Him in the face of greater and more urgent need?

Japan, China, the Orient, the Pacific—what problems and fears and speculations these names suggest! Consider the rising tide of interest and attention in that quarter. Here a great new drama in human history is being enacted. What a challenge to the Christians of the world! One of the most constructive and progressive minds of the new China is Chang Po Ling, President of the famous Nan Kai government school in Tientsin. Once a Confucian scholar, he is now a prominent Christian educator and would be classed easily among the first half dozen Christian leaders in North China. Recently on his return to China after an absence of two years, he expressed his impressions as follows: "China's fires have gone out. They need religiosity."

They are already being relit. There are some—and they are in control now—who are relighting them with embers from Japan and Germany. It is entirely possible that the centre of militarism may soon shift from Europe to the Far East. Others are relighting them with sparks from that relentless furnace of modern industrial competition. The Renaissance movement among the educated classes is a rising tide of the greatest significance, calling for a reconsideration of all established customs and values, and tending to substitute the intellectual and esthetic for the religious. Into this situation, the Christian forces are penetrating—though as yet very inadequately—with the dynamic of the living God. Now is the hour to mold the future when everything is in flux; to sound the message when leaders are asking what is fundamental in the civilization of the West. Here is one of the great storm centers of the world. The clouds are already above the horizon. It is the simplest kind of Christian strategy to pour our forces there now in this hour of great plasticity.

Henry Hodgkin, former Secretary of the English Friends' Foreign Mission Board, now on a tour in China, writes of more opportunities than he can cover to speak in government schools and before groups of educated men. There is deep response to his message of the Christian way of love and peace as we see it. There is need; there is danger; there is urgency; and there is opportunity and response and desire. And the Christian church of the West is often living in comparative ease and luxury. Oh, that we might establish more contacts and quickly! The heart of God reaches out with just as much longing to every man, woman and child beyond the Pacific as it does on this side; but it is also true there, as we see it here, that for some reason He depends largely on human connections to release His power in the lives of men. It has always been so. Human messengers, interpreters, connectors are needed. We found God and life in that way, and there is abundant evidence that He is present there to-day vitalizing the connections made in His name.

A true story was told at George School of a Christian minister who dreamed that Christ came into his church and stayed through the service. He got to thinking about it, and wondering what Christ would think of all the different things he was doing, to such an extent that it resulted in a complete transformation of the life of the church. If Christ were to come and sit through one of our Meetings, or our First-day school, or our business meetings, or our breakfast table conversations, or spend a day in our homes, or with us in business, one wonders how much of it He would like to see changed. Would that we might be gripped by such a sense of the reality of the presence of Christ as to impel us to live daily lives that will be counting for the Kingdom. In so far as we are striving to make new contacts with our Father in Heaven and to live in line with His will, and also as we are endeavoring to touch the lives of men where the struggle is fierce, can God release power through our lives and can the Society of Friends rise to that for which God is calling it in this hour.—From Friends' Intelligencer, Seventh Month 23rd.

AN APPEAL TO THE YOUTH OF GERMANY.

[While this article is specifically an appeal to the "Youth of Germany," it may well (and easily) be expanded into an appeal to the Youth of the World. As such we gladly give it a place and bespeak for it a thoughtful reading.—Eos.]

"God has given to the English the sea, to the French the land, and to the Germans—the air."

These words were written by that great German, Jean Paul Friedrich Richter at a time when the navy of England had conquered at Trafalgar, the armies of Napoleon had swept over Europe and the great German idealist philosophers, Kant and his successors, were setting up their empire in the minds of men.

A hundred years have passed since Jean Paul wrote. The wooden navy of England has vanished, but a new one rules the sea, the empire of Napoleon has been destroyed, but a new French imperialism aims at dominion over Europe. Can the analogy be followed further that we might find in the Germany of to-day the successors of Kant, Fichte, Schelling and Hegel?

It is this question which the youth of Germany must now answer.

Nelson no longer rules the sea, nor Napoleon the land, but Kant is still one of the rulers of the air. When the first developments of modern science threatened to destroy the ancient faith of humanity in the supremacy of human values, in a universe with a plan and purpose, Kant saved the day and restored man to his old supreme significance. The new science had found in the external world only a fortuitous concourse of atoms, and in the internal world only a chance combination of sensations. All was on a dead level of value. Kant found in the very soul and nature of man that which justifies his prayers and hopes. This old idealistic faith of humanity which subordinated all things to the development of personality and gave value to material things only insofar as they serve that end, found its beginning in the reasonings of the Greek philosophers and its supreme exemplification in the teaching and life of Jesus. Its greatest modern impetus came from the German philosophers of the early part of the nineteenth century. They used the critical methods of the new science which threatened to destroy humanity's faith in itself to build up that faith anew on a surer basis.

Much of the structure which they reared will endure forever, and much of it has been destroyed by the attacks of modern criticism. The world within which Kant and his followers discovered and which they showed merged into the life of God Himself, giving thus an infinite value to every human life, has been subjected to the merciless analysis of modern psychology. All the old values are again challenged. To this new science man's highest ideals and lowest instincts are of equal significance and of equally humble origin. It would reduce man to a mechanism controlled by blind instincts, desires, environment and not by an ideal of the infinite

God-given possibilities latent in the humblest human beings. To science alone a man becomes a thing, a means and not an end, a tool in the hands of stronger men and no good reason can be advanced why there should be any more evil in shooting down a hundred men than in cutting down a hundred trees, except that a hundred men are of more use for economic purposes. The most recent development of this psychology is the most dangerous to the self-respect of men. Propaganda has become almost an exact science, and whole nations can be made to love or hate, praise or execrate, at the will of those who control the machinery of publicity. No greater degradation of humanity has ever been devised or carried out.

The progress of science marks the progress of the race, but only under certain conditions. "Knowledge is power" is a true saying, but it is also true that knowledge may be power to construct or power to destroy. The war through which we have just passed, has shown that modern science, which we supposed was devised to further civilization, can be used to reduce man to a beast, and destroy what the years have built up. Plato, the first great idealist, pointed out that a physician might know how to save life, but of what use is his knowledge, if he does not know, whether it is better to live or to die. He might ask equally well to-day, "of what use is an aeroplane, if the man who is in it does not know whether it is better to drop bombs or to carry mail." Of what use is all the development of our science, if the end is greater guns, greater armies, poison gas, and hatred. Obviously, the end is destruction unless man can be restored to his old position of infinite value and supreme significance.

Here then we see clearly the choice which must now be made by the youth of Germany.

It is a choice between Caesar and Christ, Napoleon and Kant, materialism and idealism.

Here are two worlds, both waiting for strong men to rule. One of these worlds is a world which science, when bereft of idealism, declares to be a mere conflict of contending forces, which produce and destroy men as they produce and destroy things. In this world strange plants flourish. This is the world of Mammonism which would destroy man in factory or mine to produce material things. It is the world of militarism which treats men as things and succeeds in so far as it reduces the soldier to a mere mechanism without any will of his own. It is a world of imperialism which treats nations of men as things and succeeds in so far as it reduces nations to mere tools, to further its own ends.

But on the other hand, there is the world of human values, of art, literature, music, personality, the world where the human being is the one thing of infinite importance. In this world man is no more a means than a great picture is a means to any other end than itself. Here science flourishes as well as in the other world, but only to develop and never to destroy human beings. Militarism, imperialism, mammonism, cannot live here for the great reason, that they treat men as means and not as ends, and so do not recognize the sanctity of every human soul, rich or poor, high or low. They are by their very nature self-destructive, for they develop forces which, being as blind and as ignorant of value as they are, destroy whatever is at hand, including themselves. Those who spread a doctrine that men are things, are ultimately treated as things themselves.

Germany is now at the parting of the ways. Pulling her toward one side is the old military party demanding revenge on its enemies. Pulling toward the other are those young men and young women of the new Germany who have caught a great vision and who would bring Germany back to the idealism of the early nineteenth century. They see in the growing militarism of their conquerors these very elements of self-destruction which destroyed the militarism of Germany and in this they see the opportunity for Germany to assume her old spiritual leadership.

Such a leadership involves first of all a spirit of service. If in the world where men are things, mere means to material ends, leadership comes through force; in the world where men are themselves the only ends, leadership comes through service and love. In the first world, growth comes by accumulation from the outside as a crystal or anything inanimate grows. In the second world, growth comes by the reaching out from within of that ever-expanding inner principle of life which grows in so far as it overleaps what would confine it and, through service, merges its life in what is beyond it. Such a spirit can no more be confined by the narrow boundaries of egoism and nationalism than a living thing can be confined in a rigid case. Every great thought involves a world-wide vision, a passion to find lodgment in the minds of all men of all races everywhere. The speculations of philosophers and the dreams of poets must be brought out of the smothering atmosphere of the study into the open air and incarnated, in the men who toil and struggle, that they might have hope and faith.

And the great paradox is, that this leadership in the realm of the spirit is possible not in spite of, but because Germany is a defeated nation.

The analogies of history help us to see why this is so. We owe the foundation of our European civilization not to the Roman but to the Greek. The Roman sword could only kill, but the Greek ideas gave life. But though these ideas first developed in the days of Greek independence, it was not until Greece became a vassal state that she entered upon that missionary career which made her the "mother of civilization." Of the Roman Empire there is not a trace left, but the Empire of Greek thought "will remain," in the words of Macaulay, "fresh in eternal youth, immune from mutability and decay, eternal as the intellectual principle from which it derives its origin and over which it still exercises its control." But if we owe our civilization to the Greek, we owe our religion to the Jew. It was not until Judea lost its independence that the missionaries of monotheism and Christianity set out on their career of world conquest by which Christianity has become the professed religion of most of civilized humanity.

These two tiny nations, Greece and Judea, overwhelmingly triumphed in the realm of the spirit where they still rule long after the empire of their conqueror has been laid in ruin.

It was a defeated Germany which gave us modern philosophic idealism, and if Germany has triumphed before she can do so again. The world is in pain. Men have lost their way. Another war will bring a new age of darkness, and yet every move of the diplomatists of Europe increases the probability of another such war. There is no one to assume spiritual leadership and restore man to his faith in himself and his neighbor. Again and again does history repeat the old theme that "they that take up the sword shall perish with the sword," and again and again do prophets arise and cry out that "the fruit of the Spirit is life eternal." If the youth of Germany can see this, they may yet save Germany and the world.

Well did Goethe write:

"Thou hast destroyed it, the beautiful world,
With powerful fist in ruin 'tis hurled
By the blow of a deniged shattered.
The scattered
Fragments into the void we carry.
In thy own bosom build it anew.
Let the world commence
With clearer sense
And the new songs of cheer be sung thereto."

To be a Christian is to have arrived at the faith and fellowship of Jesus, as settlers arrive at a new land whose resources they must develop, whose conditions they must study, and to whose atmosphere they must adapt themselves: it is to enter a sphere or environment in which our relationship to Jesus must be allowed to regulate the entire course of our life. We engage to refer everything to His authority, to catch our inspiration from His motives, to be interested in His interests, and to set before us at every turn His standards.—DR. JAMES MOFFATT.

FROM JAPAN.

NOTES.

Our missionaries in Japan are soon leaving for the mountains and seashore for a much-needed rest. Gilbert and M. P. Bowles and E. Newlin will be in a new place this year beyond Karnezavia, at Nojiri. Alice Lewis and Edith Sharpless are to be at Takayama near Sendai, Rosamond Clark goes to Karuszuiva and will be near Thomas and Esther B. Jones. Gordon Barker sails for this country the second of Seventh Month to spend a year with a cousin in Southern California before entering college. Herbert L. and Madeline W. Nicholson are taking the six weeks' course in Dr. White's Bible Training School, in New York City. They expect to spend part of Eighth Month with Friends at Pocono Manor.

Gurney and Elizabeth Binford report a very helpful Yearly Meeting in Canada, at which Max Reich was present and gave much inspiration in his Bible teaching. They will be in Ontario until Eighth Month 20th, doing deputation work for the Canada Friends, by whom they are supported.

A farewell meeting was held by the Executive Board of the F. M. A. on Sixth Month 26th for Esther and Margaret W. Rhoads who are sailing for Japan on the Shinyo Maru Eighth Month 23rd from San Francisco, and for Wistar Wood, a member of the "Committee of Ten," who sails this month for a term of teaching at the Canton Christian College, China. Dr. Wm. W. Cadbury and his wife were present at this meeting. It was thought to be a very helpful occasion.

Detailed plans and elevation of the new meeting-house about to be built in Tokio are received. The plans are very pleasing and we feel sure will meet the needs of the Tokio Monthly Meeting with its various interests. We will remember that the money for this building was given for a memorial to Elizabeth W. Farnum, and Mary F. Brown.

A BEGINNING IN SOCIAL WELFARE.

"I congratulate you," said Baron Sakatani, "on being the first Province in Japan to carry out a Social Welfare Campaign. Two or three of the largest cities have attempted something similar, but this, to my knowledge, is the first campaign in the country." This was the comment of the chief speaker at a mass meeting held in the city of Mito during a recent Social Welfare Campaign in the province. The "Ibaraki Province Social Welfare Society," to translate the name literally, had been planning for months a very modest series of meetings and almost held their breaths to see how their efforts would succeed.

The "Society" with its long name really consisted at first of what we would call a committee of interested men chosen by Thomas E. Jones from Mito and three other towns scattered over the province. Their plan was to approach the people from three standpoints, an exhibit, moving pictures and meetings addressed by prominent authorities.

For several days before the fifteenth and sixteenth of Fifth Month, the Jones's home presented an interesting sight. In the study were perhaps five boys distributed over the floor in different postures, or at desks; one busily translating Child Welfare posters borrowed from the National Sunday School Association, another absorbed in putting the finishing touches of color on a huge pile of advertising bills made for the campaign by the students in the advertising class at the Commercial School. Still another was perhaps writing announcements—a fourth, letters; while out in the yard a boy split bamboo to make rods for posters, and in the kitchen a man made a huge quantity of flour paste. On the parlor floor three more students hunched themselves over their copying of translations for posters for the exhibit, and in the bed-room off the front hall a moving picture mechanic and his assistant tinkered with the rented machine. The little maid ran out to order in hot noodles with egg for the boys' supper, and an obliging student was off on an errand for red ink and writing brushes. A hurried call from the hospital across the street very likely meant a telephone call from Tokio, where the Bowleses were making various arrangements for us, and if a telegram or a guest did not come while the harassed housewife was answering the phone, it was fortunate. For the master of the house had to keep right on with his full days of teaching during all the preparations.

But all these details were forgotten when on the morning of the 15th, the people began to pour in to see the exhibit, held in three rooms of the Municipal Building. It consisted of about 150 posters on Child Welfare, Pre-Natal Care, Diet, Tuberculosis, Alcohol, Tobacco, Good Roads, Good Housing, City Planning, Efficient Schools, etc., together with various educative models and literature for sale and distribution. That evening the large hall in the same building was packed so that people had to be turned away a half an hour ahead of time.

The Vice-Governor, Honorary President of the Social Welfare Society, introduced the speaker, Toraji Makino, of the Social Welfare Bureau of the Home Department, who gave an able lecture, before the films, which showed life-saving in mines, welfare for employees in factories, and kindred subjects. Till twelve o'clock the faithful students helped clear up the hall. The next day streams of people still filed through the exhibit, and in the afternoon Baron Sakatani, Shuzo Aoki of the recently organized Citizens' League (prohibition society) of Japan, and our friend Makino addressed a very representative audience.

By next morning the exhibit and moving picture machine were all packed up and on their way to Minato, a seashore town where the hall was packed with 850 people to hear Makino and Aoki. The next stand was at Shimodate, in the far Northwest corner of the province. Here people not only came to the exhibit, but brought note books and copied down facts which interested them while 1500 assembled for the pictures and speeches, in the evening.

Rain poured down in Tsuchiura the following day, so the Exhibit was comparatively deserted, only three or four hundred visiting it, but the evening meeting when the Governor sent his personal representative with greetings had an audience of 1700. Altogether, in four places, 10,250 people saw the exhibit and attended the lecture meetings, and as the newspapers, not only in this province, but in Tokio and all over the country, gave great publicity to the campaign, there were many more uncounted people touched.

All this was accomplished with $250.00 appropriated to the Social Service Committee of the Friends' Mission in Japan. Was it well spent? The best part of it to us is the fact that the Social Welfare Society has heartily agreed to go on with the work next year, and undertakes to raise a thousand yen to finance it. Already we know personally of several who have stopped drinking, and the officials at the Provincial Office, who co-operated very kindly in the campaign, are most enthusiastic over the results and promise to send a representative to every business meeting hereafter. Sometimes all people need is some suggestions about the way to accomplish results.

BOOK REVIEW.

"THE SWORD OR THE CROSS," by Kirby Page.

To all thinking people the chaos into which the Great War has plunged us is most grievous if not alarming. Where did we go wrong that our present distress should have come upon us? How can we expect to reconstruct our ordered and happy civilization? Our old ways of thinking seem to have failed us and new values press upon us for recognition. With loss of physical lives and the reduction of incomes, materialism in all its glory and with all of its satisfactions has grown less appealing. We feel drawn to spiritual sources for any abiding satisfactions. The church has always claimed an ability to succor and comfort the distressed and afflicted. Where has the church been in the hour of our need? Where will she be when humanity can give thanks for a constructive vision? In his small but earnest book Kirby Page answers the first question and points the way by which the church may take her place to hasten the coming of a new vision.

The horrors of war and the way in which the church has failed to grasp the principles which Jesus taught and died for are clearly set forth. The author says: "Is it possible that the historian of another century will look back upon the present attitude of the church toward war with the same degree of amazement that we look back upon the defense, upon Biblical grounds, of human slavery, the liquor traffic and the persecution of heretics." "If in 1914 the Christian people of the various nations had refused to compromise by taking up the sword, if they had shown the same spirit of loyalty, sacrifice and disregard of consequences which was displayed by the soldiers in the recent conflict, if they had staked everything upon the redeeming power of sacrificial and unconquerable love, if they had followed the way of the cross, it would have meant the death of many—but it would have proved to be the most powerful factor in the healing of the nations and in hastening the coming of the Kingdom of God." To convert the Christian Church to this point of view is the passionate desire of Kirby Page.

Jesus Christ came into a world in which Rome was a tyrannous and unrelenting power and the Jews a restless and expectant people looking for a political leader—a true "Son of David." In the third temptation Jesus felt the full force of an appeal which nothing but his Divine understanding of spiritual values and his belief in spiritual rather than material forces could have enabled him to resist.

He chose the way of the Cross and so must his followers if they are true to their leader. He was the greatest of the idealists and "The nature of the universe being what it is, the thoroughgoing idealist is also the most thoroughly practical man. We have scorned idealism and we have failed to be practical."—E. A. Burroughs.

"The Christian militant of the present day is faced with a tremendous challenge. He is challenged with a deeper faith in Jesus' way of life, to an undying conviction that the way of the Cross is the most dynamic, powerful and compelling way of life. Mightier than divisions of infantry or cavalry, more powerful than dynamite or ammonal, more irresistible than poison gas or boiling oil, is the spirit of the Cross. It is the one thing in the world that cannot be frightened, discouraged or conquered. It is the one way of overcoming personal, industrial and political oppression. Truly it is the greatest thing in the world."

We commend the book to all professing Christians with a heartfelt desire that its message may be fruitful in our daily lives to the coming of the Kingdom of God.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

GOD IS LOVE.—There is a beautiful text, dear children, that tells us "God is love;" so if we wish to be like Him we must ask Him to put His loving spirit into our hearts.

What makes the world go? "The spring," you will answer. Well, love is the spring that will make our lives go right.

I once read the story of a countryman who took the hands of his clock to the clock-maker asking him to fix them as they would keep going wrong. When the clock-maker told him that he must have the clock to work upon to make the hands go right, he was angry with him and carried the hands home again. We are often like that foolish man. We ask God to make us do the kind, loving things, when what we ought to do is to put our hearts into His hands, so that He may get them in order, and then the good actions will follow.

When Jesus came into the world we read that men were "Hateful and hating one another;" after He left it, the people said of those who followed in His footsteps, "See how these Christians love one another," and some one has beautifully told us that "Love is the badge of discipleship."

Then, too, love is the language of heaven. If we expected to go to France or Germany we should try to learn the language before we started, and so the language of love must be learned upon this earth if we expect to use it in the world beyond.

When I was a child I read a story that impressed me very much. It was of a man who had lived an utterly selfish life, who had a wonderful dream. He thought that he had died and gone to heaven, and as he stood dazzled and amazed at the wondrous sights he saw, a bright angel floated up to him, and asked him what right he had there. "If there is any one here to whom you have ever done a kind or generous deed," she said, "he will recognize you, and you will be permitted to stay, but if there is not, you can have no part or lot in this beautiful home."

Then she led him through the courts of heaven, and the lovely angels looked at him with pitying, tender glances, but there was no one there who knew him. Just, however, as his guide's hand was upon the gate of pearl to send him forth, a spirit came toward him, crying, "Let him stay—I recognize him—he was kind to me upon the earth." "No," said the selfish man, as he looked into the glorified face, "that cannot be. I never saw you before." The spirit smiled. "I was the poor blind beggar for whom you did so many kind things, when you were a little boy. I claim you as my friend; you will remain."

Now, children, I do not wish to teach you that you can buy heaven by loving deeds, but our Lord has said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto Me," and your kindly deeds are only the proof that you have borne His likeness upon the earth.

You often hear people say of a child, "He is like his father or his mother," and if we are really God's children, we shall be like Him, and remember, the time will come when nothing will be so important to us as the fact that we have borne that likeness to Him.

Do you know what the promise is to those who have really been His children upon the earth? It is a very beautiful one: "They shall see His face, and His name shall be written in their foreheads."—ALICE BROOKS, a Friend of Baltimore, Md. Taken from "Nettie's Early Days." SOME DAYS IN NORTHERN WISCONSIN.

GEORGE VAUX, JR.

Perhaps the most outstanding characteristic of the work of the United States Government for the Indians is its variety. There is hardly a phase of human activity which is not touched somewhere by it. The life cycle of humanity is embraced from the cradle to the grave; education in all its activities is included; the care and conservation of property of almost every description claims attention; the environments include the varying characteristics of almost every State in the Union. It therefore comes about that he that would study Indian conditions first hand, and would investigate the progress of that people, has an excellent opportunity to know something of very different parts of our country. My own travels in this behalf have enabled me to see rural New York State, Oklahoma, New Mexico, Arizona, California, Oregon and Washington, as well as all that travel to and from these States implies. This year a new territory was assigned to me—northern Wisconsin and Michigan.

It is the practice of the Board of Indian Commissioners once or twice a year to look over the field and to allot to the different members the localities which they can severally cover to the best advantage. The visits may be initial ones, or they may be by way of following up what has been done in former years. It had been a long time since the Chippewas of Lake Superior had been seen by any of our number, so they were allotted to me for this season.

The Chippewa is one of the largest tribes in the United States. The bands formerly ranged from the shores of Lake Huron across northern Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota to the Turtle Mountains in North Dakota. Various estimates have been made as to their numbers. The Indian office report for 1920 gives upwards of 20,000. Over 12,000 of these are in Minnesota, whilst to Wisconsin about 3700 are attributed and nearly 1100 are in Michigan. The Minnesota Chippewas have been much in the public eye, owing to the ghastly swindles relating to timber perpetrated upon the White Earth band. Fortunately Wisconsin and Michigan have furnished no parallels to these, and hence one of the reasons why no more has been heard about them.

It was early in the Sixth Month that we started on this tour. The Chester Valley had never looked more charming, and we were quite willing to accord to Lancaster County its claim of the foremost agricultural county, save one, in the United States. The drought had not yet made itself felt, and all the beauty of early summer was manifest. Chicago the next day was as overpowering with its teeming millions as ever. A visit to the United States Indian warehouse, where supplies for the service are delivered and re-shipped to the various agencies and schools, disclosed a change of location from that formerly occupied. Some buildings hastily erected during the war for the use of the Quartermaster's Department of the army are now devoted to a cause which is more civilizing in its object than the prosecution of military activities. We could not but sympathize with the clerical force there, however, who have to work in close proximity to the stockyard district, and where every breath they draw is laden with an aroma of almost sickening characteristics.

The night was spent with friends in one of Chicago's suburbs, where we heard something of their "community church," which is the social centre of the whole neighborhood. Just now the pastor is a Congregationalist. Through the "block" organizations any new resident in the neighborhood is soon called upon by the nearest neighbors and drawn into the men's clubs, or the sewing circles, or some one of half a dozen activities, not superficially religious, but each leading to the church as the strong force behind; as the cementing influence holding all together; as the final attraction drawing all into one common purpose of spirituality.

It was five A. M. and foggy when we stumbled out of the sleeper in the early morning light, twelve hours after leaving Chicago. An affable Indian was waiting for us and soon we were rattling in the government Ford over the intervening three miles leading us to the Lac du Flambeau Agency and Boarding School. Here they were not awake yet, but we were shown into our comfortable room at the teachers' club to await breakfast.

On a rolling strip of land, covered with tall pine trees, remnants of the virgin forest, and separating by its width of a few hundred feet two of the numerous lakes which are included in this 70,000-acre reservation, the School is picturesque-ly situated. The buildings are wood, and painted white. There are dormitories for boys, and for girls, kitchens and dining-room, a school building, barns, employees' cottages, the agency office, perhaps fifteen or twenty buildings in all. In these are carried on all the activities necessary to run this reservation and school, at a point remote from any settlements of whites.

Years ago the timber was sold and cut off in this vicinity. The land has grown up in scrub. Endeavors have been made to get the Indians to clear up their allotments and engage in farming. Unfortunately no very large measure of success has attended these efforts. True, these Indians live in wooden houses, and all wear civilian clothes, but apart from gardens near their cottages the agricultural activities are not very great. Potatoes are the staple crop and flourish in northern Wisconsin.

All of these Chippewa bands have a great admixture with the whites and full bloods are the exception rather than the rule. Notwithstanding this fact these people at Lac du Flambeau are still very primitive. There are among them both Protestant and Roman Catholic Missions. But it seemed as though the Christian religion had a strong hold on only a very few of them. In one of their villages the "Medicine Dance" was in progress. It lasts for several successive days and was being held in a special lodge, covered with birch bark and built for the purpose. This was high enough to stand erect in comfortably, and perhaps ten feet wide and fifty or sixty feet long. The dancers would move in a procession up and down this lodge, keeping step to the beating of a crude drum and their own hoarse cries, whilst the spectators sat on piles of blankets ranged on the ground along the sides. These Indians are experts in elaborate bead-work and all the performers and many of the spectators had beautifully wrought garments and ornaments crusted with beads formed into the intricate designs characteristic of this tribe.

If it happens that one of these dances should occur at the season when the potatoes should be planted, and all the able-bodied men and women are engaged in the dance or in preparing for it, for a couple of weeks, the garden is not sowed. The result on the year's crop and the inevitable hunger next winter seem to be very manifest to the white man. The Chippewa does not see it till the strong arm of Uncle Sam makes itself felt and the Superintendent forbids the dance till the gardens are duly planted. But it is not without trepidation that this step is taken. The Indians say they might as well be killed as not to be permitted to dance. Public sentiment is not with the Superintendent, and he must exercise not only authority, but tact and discretion as well, or he will be defied and the total effect will not be advantageous in the long run.

The lakes of the Lac du Flambeau reservation are a fisherman's paradise. Among them they have trout, bass, pike and muskellunge. Many of the Indians make an excellent living as guides for summer visitors. Knowledge of the fish and the various places where they may be found is necessary to success. Much of the fishing is done by trolling from boats with a short steel rod and often artificial bait. The imitation minnow known as a bassarino is perhaps most employed. Our own fishing was mostly confined to the trolling we could do in visiting the various parts of the reservation by motor boat, the most available means of communication. The lakes are all connected by short thoroughfares, some of them narrow and hard to navigate, but all possible for a moderate-sized boat. We were not rewarded by any big "muskies." The one we hooked proved to be under size and so had to be returned to his home. This large variety of pike sometimes reaches a length of eight feet and a weight of fifty or sixty pounds. They are a very gamey fish, and it requires a good deal of skill to land one weighing even twenty pounds with the light rods employed. They are usually shot with a rifle before the battle is over.

To insure the future of the fishing in these lakes, and the important industry for the Indians, there is maintained at the Agency a fish hatchery for pike. Each year millions of fry are set out again in their native waters. This activity is supported by charging white people a small fee for the privilege of camping and fishing on the reservation.

THE LEAST OF THESE.

Armed with sandwiches (generally of a frozen nature by lunch time), two relief workers set forth from the Mission home in their furmanka drawn by Ruski and Polski, the sturdy, lazy little relief ponies that need intensive encouragement before they will ever make up their minds to move quickly. It is to be a day's visiting in a district village preparatory to a clothing distribution there in a week's time.

The ponies are tied up to a tree and given a bundle of hay (part of our seat) to keep them satisfied, and the house to house stalking begins. We enter the outer room of the first house, inhabited by cow, horse or pig if it be a prosperous family, knock on the door of the living-room. "Is it possible?" we ask. "Yes, possible," is the inevitable reply. One's first impression is generally one of stuffiness and swarming humanity. One-roomed dwellings are the rule, and two or three families often share the same room.

The peasants rise to meet us, and peasant courtesy is well worth encountering. The women cease their spinning, the children peep out from their warm seat on top of the stove. "Will you seat yourselves?" they ask, pointing to the bench. "Yes, we returned from Siberia last spring; we were in Russia five years. Last summer we ploughed two morks, but the Bolsheviks took five out of our seven stooks of corn, and the Polish soldiers our hay, but we made a late crop to feed our horse during the winter. He is very old and blind." "Have you a cow?" we ask, noticing the white faces of the children. "Only a young one," is the reply, and "Soup Kitchen" is entered on the card. "Why aren't Iwan and Anastasia at school?" we ask. "Please, lady, they have no boots and also the school books cost thirty marks each; we cannot afford it."

We think with joy of the boxes of boots piled up in the men's bed-room at home, and "Boots—big feet" is another entry. The names and ages of the family are correctly noted, and we peep at "Palagia," the six-months' old baby, swinging, wrapped in a bundle of rags, in the basket cradle which is suspended from the ceiling. The Stara Babka—the old grannie—sits silently watching the scene and one wonders how she managed the long journey back from Russia, for she would have to take her share of walking. These old people have no idea of their age, and agree to any age suggested, whether it be seventy or a hundred and ten years!

The women have resumed their spinning. "Is it from the flax seed the Mission distributed last spring?" "Yes, we shall make ten metres of linen from it for shirts and summer clothing," they say.

We rise, promise to bring the clothing next week and explain that a small payment will be expected for it. As we are going out the man nudges his wife. She darts to the stove, pulls out a black pot from underneath it, and picks out the two biggest eggs. "For your supper," she says. We thank her warmly and give her back the eggs. "Keep them for the children, please," we beg.

How many families have we visited? Forty-one to-day—we shall only take another day over this village! Ruski and Polski have their bits put in and the tangled harness is twisted into shape. "Wjo, wjo!" says the relief worker, flourishing the whip, "if you two lazy ponies don't hurry up we shall not be in before dark."

INTERNATIONAL CHARITY IN AUSTRIA.

Distress among the peoples of Central Europe is not confined to the peoples of those countries alone, but exists also in a great measure among the foreign families living in Vienna. It has been the privilege of the Friends to bring help to many families of the middle classes from Alsace, Poland, Russia, America, Ireland, England and Belgium who have been living for months in Vienna and have had all means of earning their living cut off. Some of these people have had most interesting histories.

An Alsatian is a teacher of languages, whose parents lost all they had in the Franco-Prussian War, and who, with her sisters, had to begin to support their parents as well as themselves. In Austria she had secured a small home and was laying by for her old age when the war came. Being unable to find children to tutor she gradually used up her savings so that when found this month she was penniless, very hungry and underfed, and with shattered nerves. Her case was brought to the attention of the French Government and she is to be repatriated and cared for.

There is a Russian family who were landed proprietors and who were forced to flee during the revolution and are now stranded. The father is doing laboring work with a local builder, but is not fitted physically for such work and cannot earn enough to support the family.

There is an aged American woman of the most delightful personality and a keen mind. She is the Austrian-born widow of an inland revenue official, formerly from New York State, and is ineligible for any help as an American citizen unless she returns to America. As her sole income is but 200 kronen a month from a friend, and 60 kronen from her Protestant church, she is unable to leave Austria. Her food is most inadequate, but her room is spotlessly neat.

The other nationalities include widows who are living on their savings, and selling their possessions piece by piece, and teachers who find little demand and less pay for the subjects they can teach, but who have lived abroad so long that it is impossible for them to find a living in their native land. Others are families with a small pension, where the wife and mother finds it an impossible task to make the narrow income stretch far enough to cover the needs of a family of growing boys and girls for food and clothing.

These instances of the many thousands of people in the same situation are not stories of starvation, but in reality depict a worse situation, that of constant distress and undernourishment and misery and fear of the future. Some need only encouragement and interest to build their hope and belief. Others need the help of influence which will bring them in touch with proper authorities who can arrange for their comfort in different living conditions or for a return to their native lands among friends. Others need immediate relief in actual food and clothing. Some need money to tide them over exigencies which would result in ruin. The relief of this class of people will be one of the outstanding phases of the Friends' work this coming year.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

DISARMAMENT ACTIVITIES OF FRIENDS.—The Yearly Meeting Peace Committee has an active Disarmament group which is doing excellent work. The Representative Meeting has no desire to compete with the above organization or in any way interfere with its activities. By common consent it is agreed, however, that in officially approaching the Government on important matters it is appropriate that the Representative Meeting should take action; its Legislative Committee is responsible for two visits to Washington on the 15th and 27th [ult.] made by a small delegation on each occasion. Arrangements had been made by wire to meet certain Washington officials, in order to secure first-hand information, as to progress of the coming Disarmament Conference, called by President Harding, give the movement encouragement, and what is now more important, endeavor to find what lines of work Friends can take up to promote the issues under consideration. It would be a breach of confidence to detail all sentiments expressed at Washington; briefly stated, Representative Brooks who drafted a joint resolution on Disarmament was very hopeful as to the outlook. Senator Borah, author of the Naval holiday bill, thought the President had embraced too much in his program; that what we wanted now was disarmament; the far eastern complex situation may very seriously retard the prime object that very many desire. The Senator will not oppose the plans of the President; he urged its full support and full publicity, for unless the American people are really behind the movement, it may fail; the work is only begun.

Senator Poincave was sure the rest of the world was too poor to fight us and that it was folly for us to spend such vast sums in armaments. Senator Knox expressed confidence on the part of the President in selecting men of high character and statesmanship as American delegates to the coming Conference.

Representative Mondell, Republican "Floor Leader," was hopeful of good results at the Conference and did not share with Senator Borah fear in tackling the far eastern problem, which some think is the key to the situation.

The visit on the 27th was mainly to interview Secretary of State Charles E. Hughes and Secretary of Commerce Herbert Hoover, though an audience was secured with Postmaster General Hays; visits were also made to different organizations working for disarmament, and not the least, to David Lawrence, the newspaper man, who is in close touch with the affairs of the world. Secretary Hughes was most courteous; the official Japanese reply accepting the President's invitation to take part in the proceedings of the Conference had just been received that morning. The Secretary who will probably have a most important part in leadership at the Conference, was free to acknowledge that there will be serious obstacles to overcome, but the only thing to do is to face them openly; he expressed confidence as to success of the ultimate results of the Conference; details are not matters for open discussion. One concern with us should be that in conducting its proceedings, an overruling Providence should be recognized, for the Lord does still rule in the earth. The Paris Conference lamentably failed in this particular. Secretary Hoover received the Philadelphia group a little after five-thirty by appointment; free discussion of the issues involved were promptly entered upon; he emphasized the importance of the people of the country keeping very much alive in this disarmament campaign; it has been approved by Congress and is now in the President's hands. The character of persons who should and who should not represent us was discussed, also the matter of free and open discussion as compared to that behind closed doors at Paris; there are dangers in each course.

The delegation came home encouraged. For two hundred and fifty years Friends have worked for what now seems at least a possibility, may we reverently pray that it may be a reality, "Peace on earth, Goodwill to men."

CHERISHING THE MINISTRY.

The state of the ministry in our (Philadelphia) Yearly Meeting has been seriously considered on several occasions of late.

Are we beginning to realize more fully that in some localities no minister has been recorded for years; that the number of women ministers, in this day when women are entering more widely than ever before into varied public service, is very small compared to our whole membership?

In one Select Quarterly Meeting the danger of failing in a proper recognition of gifts in the ministry rested heavily upon the minds of some Friends, and the duty of the elders in encouraging timid spirits was dwelt upon. But the mind of the writer turned to the responsibilities of the hearers. And this touches us all. "Take heed how ye hear," our Saviour's words to His disciples are needed now as then.

A Friend recently told of a Mennonite elder who said that he believed more of their young people would enter the ministry if they did not hear so much criticism of the ministry in their own homes. Can this be true of us as well as of our sister church? We turn away from the thought! Far be it from us to hinder the course of the life-giving stream by any shallows of gossip or sharp rocks of sarcasm!

Yet, with this thought in mind let us sift the conversation of a group returned from meeting, and see what there is in it of that nature. The Query as it reads: "Do you uphold and cherish a waiting, spiritual worship, etc.," presents two thoughts; let us dwell on the latter requirement.

We "cherish" what we love and value, and especially what we fear to lose,—a delicate child, a tender plant. It is possible to "uphold" our testimony as to worship and ministry without the attitude of "cherishing."

Just how our elders are to promote this, or what is our own part in carrying it out, no human wisdom can teach us, but undoubtedly if the way is faithfully sought, He who is "the Way" will make it plain to us.

To some people the spoken word of appreciation may be welcome and helpful. Others may feel that having delivered the message which they felt was entrusted to them, it is safest to let it rest between their own souls and the Giver of the message, and so they seem to shrink from any expression or comment by others. But these, too, are often helped by the sympathetic attitude expressed without direct speech upon the subject.

The ministry of prayer claims our consideration also. Is there less of it than we need?

"We do not have prayer meetings," said one of our younger members, explaining our way of worship. "No?" said the man to whom she spoke, "I suppose all your meetings are prayer-meetings." So, in a sense, we hope they are. So, in them, we have felt ourselves treading "the silent aisles of prayer," as Whittier did, with his worshipping Friends. Yet when the poet painted for us that lovely picture of a true minister in "The Friend's Burial," he spoke of her "Voice of prayer,

Which seemed to bear,
Our own needs up to Heaven."

I recall, in my girlhood, hearing a Friend say of Regina Shober that at the time she was recorded a minister her voice had been heard only in prayer.

Another phase of the subject is the need of a ministry for our children, which may give them their place in the exercise of the meeting. Where a school-group forms a considerable part of the meeting this is often recognized, but the scattered groups of children in our smaller meetings may sometimes feel that there is little for them.

At our Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders some time ago, a Friend from Canada gave us a touching sermon on the text, "Feed my lambs;" and I am sure others than myself, then present, will recall his simple, vivid description of how the food must be put within their reach if the lambs were fed.

The sum of these thoughts then is, that if we feel the lack of certain elements in the ministry,—a lack of fresh anointing to carry on the work of those "gone before,"—a lack of expression of the Spirit of prayer,—a lack of the simple teaching that will reach young hearts and minds,—that we shall search our own hearts and homes and see how far we are contributing to this condition.

The bestowing of the gift is certainly not in our hands, and we may not be among those who are concerned in its recognition and "recording;" but the free exercise of it, its growth and beauty and usefulness may depend more upon our cherishing than we are willing to believe.

116 YEARS COOPER

A TEACHING MINISTRY AND THE MINISTRY OF TEACHING.

For some years past, from summer schools and multiplied conferences, one very emphatic note has been sounded as the needs of the Society of Friends have been analyzed. We must have a teaching ministry, it is said, if we are to survive the challenge of our own youth or meet the insistent need of the hour. We have come to look upon this lack as a special Quaker malady, so that a report from New York that Henry Sloane Coffin, widely known Presbyterian, has told a conference of ministers "that people do not go to church [now] because they do not learn anything there," comes as no slight surprise. How often have we heard Presbyterians cited as models in the use of a teaching ministry! With some bearing in the same direction was the conversation recently of a high church Episcopalian. They talk, he was saying, of the failure of the churches. What is it that has failed? Elaborate musical services, spectacular preaching with movies, and all such devices that appeal to the senses. In our denomination [the high church branch], he continued, no such devices are permitted. Our churches are filled with people, but they are there not for what they hear but for what they do. Like you Friends we go to church to worship!

Without making any immediate application of either incident let us inquire what we mean by a "teaching ministry." Are we referring to some method of lesson-giving, to preaching with the acquirements of scholarship, or to preaching of the inspirational type that will drive the hearers to attack their own ignorance? Doubtless a Presbyterian would recognize that modern conditions have greatly modified all these lines. It is part of the "profession" of the ministry to understand these things. Unless our attention is specially directed to it, however, we may not quite realize how much and how successfully even the so-called secular press has invaded the whole of this territory. "Sunday editions" aside, many of the great dailies maintain weekly editions in which the religious page represents much of the best talent in teaching that the country affords. When one adds the approved religious weeklies to this list, the array of what is certainly teaching ministry is so great that only a very brave or a very talented person would enter the lists single handed. The results of such a wide diffusion of knowledge is many-fold. One point has a clear bearing on the general subject. Those who are intelligent and thoughtful to the point of giving some time regularly to religious reading soon form a distinct preference for one or another of the multitudinous lines of research or scholarship. It jars on them to have these lines handled by any not expert, so that insensibly but very easily what is called a teaching ministry develops an atmosphere of criticism, often very legitimate criticism, that does, however, in the end prove very deadly to growing interest and life. Thus have we seen, even amongst ourselves, some failure of what was regarded as high endowment in the teaching ministry.

The other side of the situation is, however, momentous not only for Friends but for other religionists. The proportion of those who are un-interested, that is, unwilling to put forth the effort to learn, is so large that there is certainly a loud call for proper correctives. Must we calmly admit that the bulk of adults are to settle down in practice at least to the conviction that their education is "finished?" Whether as a social, political or religious organization, human society is hopeless on that basis. Means for teaching—continued teaching, must be found in the home, the school, the church. When we cease to learn in any direction we begin to die in that direction.

It is the record in the Gospels that Jesus began to preach and to teach. His ministry even on its teaching side was of the kind described as the ministry of power. Now in one direction, now in another, he opened some vision of spiritual reality. After all these years of study and exposition these visions have new meaning as our eyes are anointed by His Spirit. Worship that is based on seeking that spirit will have a teaching quality. In some notable instances, past and present, it has had a most notable teaching power, even where no words have been spoken. Is it a decline of worship of this quality that helps emphasize the need of a teaching ministry? Is it exegesis we need for growth or a baptism of power?

Changing the point of view for a moment, is there some easily definable relationship between a teaching ministry and the ministry of teaching? If so, may it not help us to clarity of thinking in regard to the difficult subject of the ministry? Quite evidently the ministry of teaching is something mostly apart from instruction. There can be, as we all know, lucidity of exposition, scientific accuracy in method, even enthusiasm for the subject, with entire failure of the teacher in the particular thing we mean by ministry. It is customary to account for this by saying, it is all a question of personality. But how can we define personality? We are perhaps rather charmed to hear some one say, personality is the capacity of a human being to liberate spiritual power for service. But does that make the matter other than very subtle? We look for great personalities for teachers not so much for what they can do as for what they are. If, however, they are what we are looking for, they will make us,—make our children, do with vigor and accuracy the assigned tasks. Personality begets personality, and whether in the school or in the church it represents the final endowment for service. Dr. Alfred Ernest Garvie in his monumental work on "The Christian Preacher" says: "that the preacher is an inspired man because he is experiencing the presence and power of God's spirit in his reason, conscience, affections and purposes, that his own 'life is hid with Christ in God,' that he is in all meekness and lowliness, because of his unworthiness, yet with all boldness and trustfulness, because of God's call and endowment, fulfilling a Divine mission in delivering a Divine message."

This may reveal a common ground upon which we shall get a teaching ministry as well as a ministry of teaching. Apart from the Divine mission, the Divine endowment, we can have little confidence in human arrangements even to deliver the Divine Message.

J. H. B.

To His own generation—weary and disappointed—Jesus had called men to be of the child spirit, and the message was equally applicable to men in this age. There was no growing old with Christ or those of His followers, no cynicism or tarnishing of the eye. "Those whom God loves never die old." Christians must ever keep the world young and sweet. What will preserve us from becoming blasé, disillusioned and cynical when surrounded by some of the terrible and hard facts of life! Jesus saw the facts, but was not embittered. To Him God was ever "Abba, Father." Only as we thus follow Him and go out to help bind up the broken-hearted shall we know and retain that strength and youthfulness of spirit.—NATHANIEL MICKLE.

DE SHEEPFOL'.

[We have not often printed dialect poetry in THE FRIEND. We are inclined to think some of our readers will be glad of this exception, if they are not already familiar with this beautiful version of the prodigal son.—Eds.]

De massa ob de sheepfol',
Dat guards de sheepfol' bin,
Look out in de gloomerin' meadows
Wha'r de long night rain begin;
So he call to de hirelin' shepa'd—
"Is my sheep, is dey all come in?"

Oh, den says de hirelin' shepa'd:
"Dey's some dey's black and thin,
And some, dey's po' ol' wedda's;
But de res', dey's all brung in,
But de res', dey's all brung in."

Den de massa ob de sheepfol',
Dat guards de sheepfol' bin,
Goes down in de gloomerin' meadows
Wha'r de long night rain begin,
So he le' down de ba's ob de sheepfol'
Callin sof': "Come in, come in,"
Callin sof': "Come in, come in."

Den up tro' de gloomerin' meadows,
Tro' de col' night rain and win',
And up tro' de gloomerin' rain-paf
Wha'r de sleet fa' pi'ein' thin,
De po' los' sheep ob de sheepfol',
Dey all comes gadderin' in;
De po' los' sheep ob de sheepfol',
Dey all comes gadderin' in.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A SISTER DISCOVERED.

We seldom see a Roman Catholic "Sister" traveling alone—duality is apparent, but here was one on a railroad train, my seat was near hers—so to be neighborly I said, "May I bring thee a drink of water?" She produced a pretty cup, which I filled. "Come and share my lunch," was her invitation—so I brought out my own box and sat beside her, as we follow the windings of the Susquehanna River.

Some ripe yellow apples I had gathered in an orchard especially appealed to her, while her toothsome cookies baked by a "Sister" pleased my taste.

She was an elderly, sweet-faced, intelligent woman, a teacher of geography in a parochial school in Rochester, N. Y., and so education was our topic. Her boys, she told me, were more amenable to moral suasion than girls, and brought flowers the day after conversion. "What do you do in vacation" was my next question. "We attend to our necessary sewing—and now I am going to Retreat for a week in Baltimore." "What does that mean?" "A period of spiritual meditation." "Do you visit your families?" "That is not allowed, but our women relations may come to visit us, and our convent has special rooms set apart for such guests."

"Your black clothing is attractive in winter," said I, "but now it looks so hot!"

"Oh, we get used to it," was her reply, but I was amazed to find how much she wore.

A book called "Hidden Servants," by Francisca Alexander, I recommended to her, as containing Italian folk-lore, written by this artist-friend of John Ruskin, and as I told something of the contents her eyes shone—"Oh, I like that," she whispered.

Then she introduced the subject of William Penn as a favorite in their school. "I am Librarian of our parochial books and we have five hundred volumes, using the card catalogue and charging two cents for each loan; we love Whittier and Longfellow," and she named many of their shelves, standard authors.

"I have some thirty dollars in hand now," she continued, "and would like suggestions from you as to what shall be bought," so a list is to be sent her from 304 Arch Street, of the general reading supplied from there. "The Next War," by Will Irwin, I especially mentioned, for she had heard little concerning Peace and its true foundation.

We were now approaching the city where our paths diverged, and as we bade farewell she exclaimed heartily, "I dreaded this long journey alone and you have made me happy." I could say the same.

FIRST EXTENSION COMMITTEE CONFERENCE IN BURLINGTON AND BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING.

The first of a series of Summer Conferences under the care of the newly appointed Committee for the Extension of Christian Fundamentals, in Burlington and Bucks Quarterly Meeting, was held in the Meeting-house at Crosswicks, N. J. It proved a most encouraging opportunity.

As a rule, only a handful of worshippers assemble in the mornings of successive First-days. This time quite a company gathered from far and near. The Friends "of the other branch" gave up their separate meeting on this occasion, and met with us in the Divine Presence, along with many in the locality who do not bear the name of Friends, as well as visitors from a distance.

In the afternoon, after an open-air lunch and social intercourse, we reassembled for the conference on the subject: "What is distinctive in the witness of Friends?" The introducer, M. I. Reich, gave copious quotations from the "Journal of George Fox," and William Penn's "Preface," endeavoring to make plain wherein ari Friends held the catholic Faith of the whole body of Christian people, and wherein they felt themselves called to do a special work in the world. Until the Truth of the spirituality, inwardness, peaceableness, and life-transforming power of the Kingdom of Christ has overspread all nations, there is need for the maintenance of their testimony, and we, to-day, dare not fold our hands.

A lively discussion followed. Amongst those who took part in the subsequent consideration of the subject were Dr. Edward Rhoads, James M. Moon, R. Barclay Moon, Mark Bacon, William Bishop and Wendell Oliver. Friends felt that there had been a stirring of the waters by a Divine influence, and were cheered. Truth was proclaimed with a joyful conviction of its ability to meet all human conditions, whether spiritual or temporal.

SOME DAYS IN NORTHERN WISCONSIN.

Nearly one hundred miles almost due west of the Lac du Flambeau Reservation is the Lac Courte Oreille Reservation. The two are in rather similar country abounding in charming lakes. Their area is about the same, approximately 70,000 acres. The trip by railroad is tedious and circuitous. Fortunately, however, a kindly friend, a Catholic priest, offered to drive us. The route is through the wilderness. Most of the land has been cut over and is now growing up again. For miles we saw neither houses nor human beings. The chance of encountering deer and other wild animals kept us alert. During our trip two deer rewarded our watchfulness, and still another was served up for dinner one night. The game laws do not apply to Indians on reservations. Hence it is that in this region many Indians have venison at all seasons of the year.

On this trans-country ride we saw one demonstration of what seemed to us the utter foolishness and lack of judgment of people of whom one would expect better things. At very considerable distances apart we passed several uncompleted houses falling to ruin. They are what is left of a colonization scheme, intended to relieve Chicago of some of its congestion by getting Poles to settle up farms. Much of the land was very poor, the soil being light and only three or four inches thick; it all had to be cleared of stumps and brush, an operation which would cost hundreds of dollars for each farm. The location was isolated, being miles from any railroad. It is not to be wondered at that the scheme was a complete failure. It must have cost its promoters thousands of dollars, from which there appears to be no likelihood of any return.

The Lac Courte Oreille band appears to be in somewhat more advanced condition than that at Lac du Flambeau, though quite a similar situation in many respects exists there.

There is more real farming in progress. School facilities are not so good. There are no day schools supported by the Government, but there is an excellent boarding school at Hayward, which is off the reservation and several miles away from the nearest Indian settlement. Some of the Indians have been enrolled at the public schools. Unfortunately, it is the case too often that the published statistics of Indian attendance at public schools is misleading. As a rule, there is no compulsory school law which is operative on an Indian reservation, and enrollment and attendance are very different things. Probably none of us would blame the parents of small children, who were not enthusiastic about their attendance at school when such attendance involves walking three or four miles each day, exposed to the rigors of a northern Wisconsin winter, which means deep snows and temperatures not infrequently of forty degrees below zero.

Ashland, Wis., was our next objective, as here is the agency headquarters for the La Pointe or Bad River Reservation, situated along the southern shore of Lake Superior.

Twenty-five years ago a contract was made with the Stearns Lumber Company to cut the timber on this reservation. The price then was $3 per thousand feet of stumpage of white pine as a basis. The scale was a sliding one, and latterly $10 per thousand has been paid. A couple of hundred Indians have had continuous employment in the cutting operations or in the big saw mill at Odanah. This is equipped with all the modern machinery for the turning out of first-class lumber. One of the developments is what is called a "hot pond." Of course all the logs are held in a boom in slack water awaiting being cut. In winter they are frozen in, but the waters adjacent to the landing stage are prevented from freezing by submerged steam pipes, so that the supplying of logs to the endless chains carrying them to the enormous band saws need never be interrupted by cold weather. We were told one Indian charged with the hauling of the logs out of the water had not missed a day's work in over fourteen years.

But there are other industries besides the production of lumber in which members of the La Pointe band are engaged. With them farming is a real thing and carried on on a considerable scale. Potatoes and hay are standard crops, whilst some of them are planting many acres in strawberries, which do very well there. Still others emphasize dairying, and the fact that the Ashland creamery runs its motor trucks with periodic frequency into the heart of the reservation to gather in the milk and cream furnished by Indians, proves that their product is of commercial importance. In passing, please note that this creamery before the Eighteenth Amendment was a brewery.

At Birch, a small Indian village near the eastern edge of this reservation, we saw an eloquent practical contradiction of what I have said above about Indians in public schools, which shows how necessary it is to be careful in one's generalizations. Birch is remote; though located on a State highway—there are fine ones all through Wisconsin—it is not easily accessible, and it is something like ten miles to Odanah, where the nearest schools are located. This situation did not please the Indians. In Wisconsin they are citizens and vote, so they got together and petitioned the proper authorities under the Wisconsin law for a public school. There were enough children without school facilities to comply with legal requirements, so the school board last autumn rented a vacant house belonging to the estate of a deceased Indian and opened therein a public school. The attendance was ten Indians and one white. The latter was expelled by the teacher. The Indian attendance through the year was practically one hundred per cent. To me it seems as though Birch, Wisconsin, has solved its local Indian problem.

Twenty miles north of Ashland is another reservation, Red Cliff. It required a day to visit this locality where there was nothing very striking to note. A run in a motor boat took us to Madeline Island, one of the Apostle Group, where was one of Father Marquette's posts in early days. It was a famous place with the Indians, and some of the important treaties with them were negotiated there. We saw the old house where some of these important agreements were finally consummated.

Not far off is an old Indian cemetery adjacent to the Catholic church. Here we saw none of the quaint little houses which the Indians are accustomed to erect over their graves, each having a place in which food may be inserted for the departed. There were, however, two inscriptions which attracted our attention. One read as follows:—"To the Memory of Abraham Beaulieu. Born 15 September, 1822, accidentally shot 4th April, 1844. As a mark of affection from his Brother." The other recorded that the deceased had died on such a date "By Thunder."

From Ashland, a night's ride took us to Houghton, Mich., the heart of the "copper country." Here the glory indeed seems to have departed. With the present low price of copper, most of the mines are shut down, the large stamp mills are deserted, and the smelters are operating only to a small extent. In this region the copper is found disseminated in a metallic state through a very hard porphyritic rock. Frequently it is in tiny grains, often in larger particles, and strings, and sheets. At times enormous masses weighing hundreds or even thousands of pounds are discovered. When very large these present serious problems to the miners.

With improved methods of extraction they are now working over the great beds of waste from the earlier operations, and the salvage from them is one of the most profitable present ways of production.

In the smelter huge plates for electrolytic work were being cast. It seemed scarcely possible that the streams of molten, vivid violet colored fire were really copper!

An hour's run by rail from Houghton is Baraga, Michigan, the agency for the L'Anse Reservation. Here it was we said our farewells to the Chippewas of Lake Superior.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

PRESIDENT HARDING'S MOVE FOR DISARMAMENT.

President Harding's announcement on Seventh Month 10th of the prospect of an international conference to consider the "limitation of armament" and principles and policies in "the Far East" was received with great satisfaction and great hope by the people of this country and abroad. Such a conference might reduce the tremendous burden of taxation under which all nations are laboring and might also reduce the possibilities of future war.

Friends of peace are urging three things as being essential to success,—that Disarmament be kept as the primary object of the Conference, that the Conference be constantly open to public knowledge and public criticism, and that our representatives be men of the highest type of statesmanship.

It is also clear that a vigilant intelligent public opinion is an essential, and we believe Friends should seriously keep in touch with developments and do their share in creating a right public sentiment.

"DISARMAMENT BY AGREEMENT, IF POSSIBLE; BY EXAMPLE, IF NECESSARY."

Our nation should lead in the crusade for disarmament. We cannot prevent war by getting ready for it. We should invite the world to disarm. Our nation should join with all who will join, and go as far by agreement as any other nation will go. If other governments refuse to join in disarmament, we should set the example by beginning a systematic decrease in our military and naval expenditures, and call upon the religious, humanitarian, and industrial forces of the world to coerce their governments into the same policy. We cannot afford to make our policy depend upon the policy of other nations, because other governments may be less independent of the militarists and manufacturers of munitions. We cannot join the world in progress towards universal bankruptcy at the command of misguided militarists, or greedy manufacturers of war materials. The world is weary of war; the oppressed are crying out for relief from the burdens of government, and there is no hope from any other direction as long as the energies of mankind are directed toward preparation for war. "O ye of little faith," was Christ's rebuke to those who would not trust in the power of spiritual things. If any nation was ever in a position to put God's truth to the test and try the forces of friendship and love, our nation is. Our motto should be not "disarmament if others will join," but "disarmament by agreement, if possible; by example, if necessary."

"A WARLESS WORLD BY 1923."

The sixteen thousand delegates to the Christian Endeavor convention at New York City last month took a strong stand on the subjects of peace and universal brotherhood and adopted the slogan, "A Warless World by 1923." Dr. Francis E. Clark, President and founder of the movement, said that all the forces of Christianity throughout the world would be called upon to join the Endeavorers in their effort to prevent war.

ANOTHER "BOXER INDEMNITY."

"Dr. James Brown Scott, presiding genius of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, has unearthed a forgotten piece of American-Japanese history of timely interest. In 1863 the Strait of Shimonoseki, improperly closed to commerce, was opened by the joint action of the United States, France, Great Britain and Holland. An indemnity of $3,000,000 was exacted from Japan and paid after some delay owing to embarrassing conditions in the Japanese treasury. Each of the four participating nations received an equal share ($750,000), but the sum paid to the United States remained unused for twenty years. The public conscience in America was not as easy as to the justice of the money extorted from Japan, whereupon, in 1883, Congress voted to refund our share. It was accepted by the Tokio Government 'as a strong manifestation of that spirit of justice and equity which has always animated the United States in its relations with Japan.' Neither the British, French, nor Dutch followed America's example."

A BACKWARD NATION'S ADVANCED POSITION.

It is of interest to know that President Oregon, of Mexico, some weeks ago, stated that he would use his executive power to defeat any proposition to commit Mexico to the construction and maintenance of the navy. This was said in relation to the proposal in the Mexican legislature to spend upon a navy $50,000,000 as a starter. President Oregon said: "I believe modern countries should demonstrate their moral strength and not attempt to build up a display of brute strength. This money will be spent for instruction and for agricultural purposes."

FROM KIRBY PAGE'S "THE SWORD OR THE CROSS?"

For the follower of Jesus, the test of morality of any procedure is, Is it Christian? Is it in harmony with the spirit and teaching of Jesus? The test is not, Is it the lesser of two wrongs? Is it sanctioned or commanded by the state or church? Is it in accordance with international law or the accepted code of morals of the majority? Is it sanctioned in the Old Testament? The supreme test is, Is it Christian?

Not even in seeking to protect his family is the follower of Jesus justified in doing a thing that is un-Christian. As great and solemn as is the obligation to defend one's family, it is not the supreme duty of the Christian. . . . It is infinitely more important that a man should be true to Jesus and His principles than to protect his family at the expense of the Kingdom.

The use of the sword may preserve political freedom and liberty of thought and action. And it is here, in the final analysis, that the ethics of war must be determined. Is war justifiable as a means of preserving political liberty?

Jesus had little to say about political freedom, he had much to say about moral and spiritual freedom. When confronted with the question of human freedom, he saw that unless men's hearts were changed, freedom from Rome would simply mean an exchange of masters. To destroy the oppressors of a nation is not Jesus' way of bringing freedom to its citizens. Real freedom is not a racial, national or international problem; it is personal.

Not even when the political freedom of a nation is at stake should the Christian militant make use of an un-Christian weapon. The following of Jesus Christ is infinitely more important than the maintenance of political liberty at the expense of his principles.

To increase the number of men and women in all lands who will refuse absolutely to sanction the use of any un-Christian weapon, who will follow without any compromise the teaching and example of Jesus Christ, and who will seek diligently by every possible means to spread abroad in the lives of individuals and of nations the spirit of Jesus, this is the only sure way to abolish war.

HAROLD C. GODDARD IN "SUPER-RESISTANCE."

[The average non-resistant pacifist] preaches pacifism as if it were a truth that could be had for the asking, a rule that could be followed, a power that could come from the mere act of subscribing to a creed. He talks about its "acceptance" or "adoption," when, if he talk at all, he should talk about its "practice" or "attainment." He advocates a dogma when he should be creating a spirit. He attempts to turn into a principle what should remain a form of life. Let him look up his own name in the dictionary and he will discover that it is his part to make, not to preach, peace. Would we could always keep that distinction clear—between the peacemakers and the peace-preachers! As of old, it is the peacemakers that shall be called the children of God.

HUMAN RELATIONSHIPS.

SYNOPSIS OF WHITING WILLIAMS' COURSE OF LECTURES, GIVEN AT FRIENDS' SUMMER SCHOOL, GEORGE SCHOOL, PA.

Taking a backward view of the Summer School at George School, the spirit of both work and play seems to be summed up in three words: personality, brotherhood and love. This spirit is indeed the only way in which the world can understand our big industrial problem and solve it, according to Whiting Williams, who in his pleasing and characteristic manner, presented this vast subject to us.

In dealing with this problem, under the various heads of "What the Worker Brings to the Factory Gate, what he carries through the employment office, what he can give to the company, and to his foreman, and what he himself wants," Whiting Williams came prepared with first-hand information. For seven months in America, and three in England, he gave up home and family, and becoming a laborer, walked, worked, and lived side by side with the unskilled workmen of to-day in factories and mines.

After all, according to Whiting Williams, this industrial problem is not so complex, but the simple matter of personality, and the relation between people. If the whole world would understand the true meaning of the brotherhood of man, and practice it, there would be no problem. The ideas which the worker has regarding the company are gained through his experiences with the men with whom he comes in contact in the plant. The problem of this relationship begins when the worker asks for a job. We can never get efficiency, or the best of a man's ability, until that man feels right toward his job, and toward the man for whom he works. The desire for individual worth is necessary; and the worker who loses belief in himself has no desire to give anything to his employer. Disrespect comes from a lack of a chance for service, and utter demoralization from the unsteady job. If only each man who has workers under him could understand this importance of the personal equation, industrial peace would soon be restored. How much all of us wish we could have said of us what Margot Asquith said of her husband, "He is a man who makes every one with whom he comes in contact think better of himself."

This idea of a man's own worth, and his attitude toward his employer, are both influenced by three things: the getting of a job and holding it, the physical condition of his body from long hours of labor and poor living conditions, and his mental condition from ignorance and suspicion. It is not what is on the worker's mind, but what is at the bottom of his heart; he feels rather than thinks. The having of a job and holding it, lies at the bottom of the problem. If a man holds his job by making it last a long time, efficiency is lessened. "Irregular work makes an irregular worker who is bound to be an irregular citizen." Long hours produce tiredness and tiredness produces temper, and the combination which Whiting Williams calls T and T, when said rapidly, sounds like TNT, goes off as quickly. Also, short hours but poor living conditions lead to the same demoralization. The mental condition is affected by his ignorance of the English language, a large per cent. of our unskilled laborers being foreigners; and this inability to understand arouses suspicion. In the face of these conditions, the working-man wants to feel that the job is the basis of his self-respect. A man expects to be treated according to the importance of his job, and thinks well of himself by reason of this importance. The only solution is a better understanding between men, and more faith in human nature.

Thus people are friends or enemies according to the way they meet each other's needs. Employment offices are necessary to get the jobless man to the steady job, and here the relationship begins. The men in these offices should be the kind who will produce and foster the proper relationship between the workman and his employer, men who will meet these sensitive job seekers sympathetically. The necessity of these employment offices arises from the abnormal condition of men wanting to change their jobs; the normal condition is the desire for a steady job. Thus come all the "forms" and red tape, the hiring clerk, the doctor, etc., men who have a splendid opportunity to start the proper relationship, but who in many cases, through brutality, forceful authority, or indifference, plant the seed of Bolshevism in the heart of the new employee, who loses all his self-respect before he begins his work. Confidence in the company depends on the confidence the workmen have in the man over them. It is a matter of a series of contacts or relationships with each individual enclosed in a circle called the company.

Therefore, the giving of energy depends on the direction of energy. The job manager must get from his men the maximum power units, for he in turn is judged by what he can get out of his men. And what he gets depends on the way he treats them. It is not the popular man necessarily who gets the most, but the man who is interested in his men. Leaders, not drivers, are wanted. A man likes to get satisfaction out of his job, and when he is robbed of this satisfaction, the company work units done, are lessened. If a man's attitude toward the company is bitter, because of his contact with his foreman, the less he does, for this is the way he gets back at the company, and "saves his face." There is a real personal satisfaction in doing things and doing them well. If a man is being "balled out" continuously, he loses his self-respect, his belief of his personal worth, and the importance of his job. The relation between the man and his foreman is in the same proportion as that between the foreman and the superintendent, and so forth all the way up the line; thus the idea of the company is built up by deducing his experience from the man above him. Other ideas of the spirit of the company are gained through the working conditions in the plant. Men do appreciate bettered conditions. They do not mind hardships where such is the character of the work, but when conditions can be made better, and are neglected, when tools are poor and no care taken of them, the satisfaction of doing good work is seriously impaired. "Fatigue is not a result of effort, but a disproportion between the efforts and the results."

There is a strong connection between these physical conditions and moral convictions. Bad conditions make a man think less of himself, and the less he thinks of himself, the less he cares what he does. The real nature of evil is a result of the whole being, physical, mental and spiritual. Man is ever striving for a balance. Thus a man's self-respect is according to the appreciation of his own achievements. His idea of getting on is not determined alone by money, but by distance traveled. And upon this distance traveled, and on the standing of the job, depends his social standing. One cause of discontent during the war came from the unskilled laborer being raised more in proportion than the skilled mechanic. Therefore the matter of getting on is a matter of relativity. Self-respect is ever changing. And this self-respect must be maintained if efficiency is to be gained. The matter of strikes is not a question of loyalty or disloyalty, but of which loyalty, loyalty to the company or to his fellowmen. The only solution is to save the self-respect of each side without fighting; in other words, compromise.

Thus, in conclusion, Whiting Williams again stressed the value of a man respecting his own worth, which can only be gained by the faith other men have in him. By this method alone can we get the maximum of a man's energy. Decrease discipline in industry and substitute faith; appeal to men by faith not force. "The wish is the father of the thought, and the thought the father of the deed." The laborer is not anxious to share the management of the company, but to share the satisfaction of the worth of doing the job, and a recognition of his own value. Industry has become so compartmentalized that we do not know conditions. "Our duty is to get the air of recognition, esteem, and understanding up to the working faces of the men. We must save the life of humanity by having faith and belief in men. True brotherhood is the only way by which we can save the world."

J. BERNARD WALTON.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

STUMBLING BLOCKS.—Nettie had left a box of nine-pins, with which she and her little brother had been playing, upon the steps, and soon afterward, Frank coming hurriedly down stairs, stumbled over them and fell down the whole flight, cutting an ugly gash over his right eye.

Nettie was deeply grieved, and a dozen times in the day stole to the side of the bed, upon which the little fellow lay, to inquire how he felt, and to kiss the wounded forehead.

A few days afterward, when he was able to play around again, Cousin Sue, who was sitting in her room with the door open, heard him cry out impatiently from time to time, and as each angry cry was followed by the sound of Nettie's laughter, realized that his little sister was teasing him.

"Nettie!" she called to her, "What is the matter with Frank?"

"O, nothing," answered Nettie, coming to the door, "only he is as cross as a bear this morning."

"I thought, my darling, that when you hurt your little brother so a few days ago, you determined to be very careful never to do so again."

"O, I have not been hurting him," said Nettie. "I was only teasing him a little."

"The Bible tells us we are not to put a stumbling block, or an occasion, to fall in our brother's way. Now, the other morning, when Frank fell over the box you carelessly left on the step, and hurt his head, it grieved you terribly, yet to-day you are doing him a greater harm by thoughtlessly making him sin. Remember every time you make him speak or feel angrily, you are putting a stumbling block in the way of his soul."

Nettie looked very grave. "I never thought of it that way before," she said.

"You have done your little brother a serious wrong by tempting him," said Cousin Sue, gently. "When we remember how hateful all anger must be in God's sight, it is surely a cruel thing to arouse it in another, and thus bring down upon him the displeasure of his kind Heavenly Father."

"I am sure I am very, very sorry," said Nettie, and spoke seriously with her eyes full of tears.

"But, dear, don't you see your being sorry will not help Frank. When we tempt another to do wrong, we make three dark marks—one on our own soul, one on God's book, and one upon the soul of the person we tempt."

"Now, the sin upon our own soul can be cleansed away, for when we pray 'wash me and I shall be whiter than snow,' God answers that prayer. And the mark upon God's book can be cleansed away, for God has promised to blot the sins we have repented of out of His book of remembrance for His own sake, but all our prayers, and all our repentance, cannot cleanse away the mark that has been made upon the soul of the one we have tempted. So you see, Nettie, as it is so easy to do mischief, and so impossible to undo it, we ought to be more careful of our influence over others."

Nettie sat silent a long time after Cousin Sue ceased speaking. "I do not want anything to be written in God's book against my brother," she said at last. "There is one way to get it blotted out. I will talk to Frank about it and get him to ask God to forgive him, and I will never, never tempt him again as long as I live."

Cousin Sue smiled somewhat sadly as she looked into the little flushed face, but Nettie was thoroughly in earnest. She never forgot that talk, and it made her very careful, and very tender with her little brother.

tween his last furlough and his arrival again in London for a year's rest last week."

As Friends will many of them remember, Isaac Mason after starting work with the F. F. M. A. twenty-nine years ago, has latterly been "lent" to the Christian Literature Society for China, and through them has been doing work of incalculable value by his translations into Chinese.

I particularly like his catholicity of choice. The Devonshire House Reference Library has recently, for instance, received from him Dr. Hodgkin's "Lay Religion," L. Violet Hodgkin's "Fierce Feathers," and a revised edition of "Christian Biographies," containing, it is plain from the illustrations, (though not to the uninitiated from the quaint text) some stories of well-known Friends; Col. Turton's "Truth of Christianity" figures, as does "Christian Practice," Penn's "Fruits of Solitude," W. Wilson's "Christ and War," and other Quaker books. But Isaac Mason has not stopped there. For students he has provided R. C. K. Ensor's excellent little book on "Belgium" and Canon Masterman's "Progress of Democracy," and for the juvenile Chinese public, which is a fruitful field, he has given "Swiss Family Robinson," Lamb's "Tales from Shakespeare," and Basil Mathews' "The Splendid Quest."

"My last book," our Friend told me, "is 'The Arabian Prophet,'" being a translation into English of a Life of Mohammed, written about two hundred years ago by a Chinese Moslem. As there are some ten million Mohammedans in China there is a necessity for the missionary to have some indication of the background of the faith practised and for these the book is produced.

"My first piece of work when I went out six-and-a-half years ago (six months of my time since then were engaged in touring through China with our dear Friend, Joseph Elkinton) was to help in the completion of a Chinese Dictionary of the Bible, mainly based on Dr. Hastings'. I was too late to do the article on Peace, but the section on War is mine. The edition of five thousand of this large two-volume work is practically exhausted, a fact which gives some indication of the demand. An Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics on the same scale is now being prepared."

While there is a growing and steady demand for books on philosophy and cognate subjects, Isaac Mason says that unfortunately the field of general literature almost solely covered a few years ago by the Christian Literature Society has now been flooded with translations of sensational and erotic fiction of the cheapest Western type, with deplorable effects on the readers.

In fact, Isaac Mason views the general situation in China at the moment somewhat pessimistically. "The last ten years have been a spectacle. Opium is now being grown again all over China" (I thought of the suggestion at the last Meeting for Sufferings that the Opium Committee should be laid down). "Pekin may issue edicts against it, but the generals in command of the forces up and down the country ignore these and accept bribes from the farmers wherewith to pay their soldiers. In fact, I fear the land at present is soldier-ridden, and is stagnating under the military hand. I wish we could only have in China a Peace Society as good as the movement in Japan for which Gilbert Bowles is responsible."

But it is only the immediate outlook that seems so dark, I gathered. One cannot live a generation among the Chinese without realizing the potentialities and promise of this great land and people. Looking further ahead, perhaps when they have been through the fire still more, our Friend sees hope and a glorious future.

LITERATURE IN CHINA.

THE WORK OF A QUAKER MISSIONARY.

Some sixty titles of books and pamphlets, translated, most of them within the last six years, is not a record to be ashamed of. "This," writes a correspondent, "was what I discovered was the work accomplished by our Friend Isaac Mason be-

THE BIBLE OF A FAMOUS QUAKERESS.

THE BOOK ONCE OWNED BY ELIZABETH HADDON, WHOSE STORY IS TOLD IN LONGFELLOW'S "TALES OF A WAYSIDE INN," FOUND IN A STATE OF GOOD PRESERVATION.

In New Era Magazine, official medium of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A. Reprinted in THE FRIEND by their kind permission.

Ships that pass in the night, and speak each other in passing,
Only a signal shown and a distant voice in the darkness;
So on the ocean of life we pass and speak one another,
Only a look and a voice, then darkness again and a silence.

—LONGFELLOW'S POEM "ELIZABETH."

On this Thanksgiving Day let us give thanks for Elizabeth Haddon. One of the sterling Christian founders of America, she shines to-day as an example in piety, benevolence, the old-fashioned domestic virtues which are the bulwark of our nation, filial devotion, community service, marital felicity, wifely consecration. Her good deeds and great love live in tradition and family records, where Longfellow found them and spun their golden threads into imperishable song.

I have found the Bible of Elizabeth Haddon. Printed in 1566, one of the very first Bibles printed in English from movable types, it was brought from England to the American wilderness by the famous Quakeress, and now is in the possession of a devout Presbyterian family of her kinsfolk. The Bible has never been known to the public, but is cherished in one of the beautiful old homes such as make Philadelphia known everywhere as our most American city. The owners shrink from publicity, and their desire to retain their privacy must be respected; but they graciously consented to have Elizabeth Haddon's Bible brought forth for New Era Magazine from its safety vault, and permitted me to have some of its notable pages photographed, as well as the volume entire, for reproduction in New Era Magazine.

AN HONESTLY MADE BOOK.

The cover and the edges of the leaves alone show the strains and wear of the Bible's 354 years of existence. The texture of the beautiful old paper and the integrity of the honest old black ink stand forth a monument to the early printing and bookmaking crafts. Here is a genuine antique which must impress all beholders, a splendid original of the first English Bible, with the additional flavor and value of having been personally owned by a great American Englishwoman whose memory is a household word throughout the United States.

Elizabeth Haddon's Bible is sixteen years older than the Rheims Testament, sometimes spoken of as "the oldest Bible." The Haddon Bible is an authentic "Great" Bible. It is also a "Treacle" Bible. Coverdale, the translator, rendering "The Prophecie of Jeremie," gave the reading "I am hev and abafed, is there no Triacle at Gylvad." This in the King James modern version reads "balm in Gilead."

The Haddon Bible is indeed "Great." It weighs 18 pounds, and its dimensions are: thickness, $4\frac{1}{4}$ inches; width, $10\frac{3}{4}$ inches; length, $10\frac{1}{2}$ inches.

The rugged Old English type of the Haddon Bible is easy to read to-day. Those who have unsuccessfully wrestled with Chaucer will have no difficulty in drinking in the scriptural story from the Haddon Bible pages. This is chiefly due to the fact that the Bible is written in the purest, simplest English, a marvel of lucidity and simplicity which no changes of spelling can obscure. The old rendering as here revealed is not at all difficult for anyone who can read modern English. It can only be called quaint. The word "triacle" of course could never be guessed as having been later translated "balm;" that is a freak of translation; but the old spelling "triacle" is at once recognized for our "treacle" of to-day.

THE TWENTY-THIRD PSALM.

Some of the first translations, materially changed in the King James version, will be found to possess a marked beauty of their own, and only the advance of scholarly interpretation of the original tongues could have caused abandonment of such beautiful expression of eternal truths. Even then the old form must have been quit with extreme reluctance. For instance, in the familiar Twenty-third Psalm, reproduced from the Haddon Bible complete in the pages of New Era Magazine, our modern version of "He leadeth me beside still waters" is rendered in the Haddon Bible "beside waters of comforte," a peculiarly satisfying expression; and the passage about setting a table "before me in the presence of mine enemies" appears "table before me against them that trouble me." The old-fashioned "s" is of course plentifully sprinkled throughout the Haddon Bible. It was more like an italicized and elongated "f" and in such extracts as are given in New Era Magazine the letter "th" is used as the nearest type we have to-day to indicate the remarkable old "s."

Other specimens of the old orthography which seem strange to us to-day are: "Servaunts" for "servants;" "captuyuyte" for "captivity;" "Jhon" for "John;" "Lamentacions" for "Lamentations." But the study of the Haddon Bible shows that while the version of the present day is modernized in its spelling and text, the original sense of the first English translation of more than 354 years ago is faithfully preserved in our authorized version.

ARTISTIC INITIALS.

One of the added beauties of the Haddon Bible is that each chapter opening is illuminated by a handmade woodcut of artistic design, and close search fails to discover any two of these difficult initials alike. The entire Bible, including the Apocrypha, is printed in Old English text, large, black, clear type. The volume is in an excellent state of preservation. It is bound substantially in wooden boards, covered with skin. Its contents include, in accommodation to the prevailing English religion of the period, "The Feasts," "Morning Prayers," "Litanie" and "Collect." Queen Elizabeth was on the throne, as witness a drawing of the ruling monarch on the title page, wherein she is pictured together with Moses and Christ, the design being to show the law and the prophets, the church and the State, all in harmony under the direction of the Word of God, which the artist has indicated by a supreme mystical sign over all, from which the other figures and letterings descend and radiate.

A copy of the first printed Bible in English recently sold for $3700. The Haddon Bible, with its peculiarly rich family history, in addition to its authentic antiquity, is to its owners priceless. It is also priceless in its memories and inspiration to the Christian world at large. The family inscription, photographically reproduced in New Era Magazine, shows the original signatures, placing the ownership with Elizabeth Haddon Estaugh, and by her given to her nephew, John Estaugh Hopkins, namesake of her husband. The name Hopkins came into the Haddon family through the marriage of Elizabeth's sister Sarah to Benjamin Hopkins. The Redmans, subsequent owners of the Bible, are descendants of Thomas Redman, who married Elizabeth Hopkins, granddaughter of John Estaugh Hopkins. The name Redman was originally Redmane, from the color of the hair. The family name of John Estaugh was perpetuated at christenings as late as 1811, when a son of William E. Hopkins was named after Elizabeth Haddon's husband. This last-named John Estaugh Hopkins died in 1884. The name Elizabeth, in honor of Elizabeth I Haddon, had been a favorite in every branch of the family, and still is. The beautiful old town of Haddonfield, N. J., was named for her, and her name appears as landmarks elsewhere, as witness Haddon Hall, Atlantic City.

A BENDING staff I would not break,
A feeble faith I would not shake,
Nor even rashly pluck away
The error which some truth may stay,
Whose loss might leave the soul without
A shield against the shafts of doubt

REPORT OF WILBUR K. THOMAS AND RUFUS M. JONES TO THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE, SEVENTH MONTH 28, 1921.

We have found in all the missions a strong nucleus of members in every case, including the head of the Mission, who are deeply interested in the spiritual effects which are following and which should follow from the extensive work of relief. It has naturally not been felt to be right or proper to use the prestige gained from Relief Work to attract members to our own Society, but at the same time, all the Missions have been like lighted lamps on hill-tops, and they have silently, even unconsciously, spread widely abroad the ideals of a new way of life and a positive spirit of love and reconciliation.

We believe that in the future considerable care should be given in the selection of personnel with reference to the formation of a group of workers who will unite as fully as possible those two essential aspects of Friends' work abroad. Believing as we do that the spiritual service of the message of life should spring directly out of the Relief Work and be an inherent part of the whole undertaking, we feel that the work carried on by the Council of International Service ought to be a Department of the Service Committee instead of being directed by a parallel organization. The doors are now open for a very large international service along the lines of our fundamental conception of life. This work calls for prepared men and women who can live abroad for longer or shorter periods, and who can carry forward in more permanent ways a work which has been already well begun in a large number of European cities and towns.

GERMANY.

In view of the past history of the child-feeding work in Germany, we recommend that it be continued as at present under the supervision of the American Friends' Service Committee with the Friends' War Victims' Relief Committee supporting the work in Cologne as at present. In case money is not forthcoming from England, the work can be supported by funds from the drive in the United States.

The present Field Committee Work should be continued as a Joint Work, and we strongly urge the American Friends' Service Committee to assume a larger share in the work, both with personnel and with money. It is hoped that the present campaign for funds in America will make it possible to enlarge the anti-tuberculosis work and hospital relief for children.

POLAND.

Our recommendations and actions on the work in Poland are well presented in a letter which we wrote and sent to all the workers in the Polish Unit, which was as follows:—

DEAR FRIENDS:—

Representing the two Home Committees, we have come with great reluctance and hesitation to make a study of the situation in the Polish Unit. The lack of unity in the Unit has been apparent for a considerable length of time, and we realized from the first that our knowledge of the field and its conditions was far too inadequate to make us capable of passing judgment. We felt therefore that our greatest service could be rendered if we could encourage the members of the Unit to think out their own problems more thoroughly and thus solve the difficulties themselves. This we have tried to do, and we herewith present to the Unit our conclusions and suggestions:—

The difficulties of the Unit have come about from lack of "team-work" within the group.

We find no evidence of differences on account of nationality or training.

The individual members of the Unit have worked with great devotion and commendation, and only words of praise can be used to express our deep appreciation of the service rendered by practically every one connected with the work. Trouble has arisen only when a particular phase of the work has been emphasized to the detriment of the whole work. "Team-work" or loyal co-operation with the head of the Unit in carrying out the determined policies would undoubtedly have resulted in an entirely different spirit in the Unit. We feel that this is past history, however, and only call attention to this fact to emphasize the necessity for the closest kind of co-operation on the part of the individual members of the Unit with the head of the Unit in carrying out the work determined upon.

Our definite conclusions are:—

That when William Fogg leaves, Florence Barrow be asked to come out and take charge of the work until it is finally closed up, and that Florence Barrow select one of the American workers to serve as her assistant in the office at Warsaw.

That the Unit should look toward closing the work within the next six months.

That personnel be reduced automatically as periods of service are completed and as the lessening of the work in any one department makes the larger personnel unnecessary. That the Unit consider the possibility of continuing some of the agricultural and housing work to a date not later than Fourth Month 1, 1922.

That the work for the succeeding six months be in the following four departments:—Student, Agriculture, Fresh Milk, Child Welfare.

That the general budget and number of personnel in each department be as follows:—

(No replacements in personnel to be made as personnel diminishes except by direct action of the head of the Unit.)

We realize that we ourselves will have practically nothing to do with carrying out these suggestions. We can only present them as our conclusions and trust that you will work in complete harmony with whatever may be the established policy of the Mission. Your usefulness is entirely dependent upon your loyalty to the group. You yourself must be a living example of the spirit which actuates us all in this work. Love and unity must prevail, else those whom you serve will not get a glimpse of the Christ who has led us into this service.

In conclusion, we wish to record our very deep appreciation of William R. Fogg. We believe that a fine and noble Christian spirit has been manifested by him under the existing and trying circumstances.

(Signed) FRED ROWNTREE,
HARRISON BARROW,
RUFUS M. JONES,
WILBUR K. THOMAS.

We also wish to report that we advised the Polish Unit that, including the special donation already in the hands of the American Committee, we cannot see our way to promise more than eight to ten thousand dollars per month for six months, beginning Seventh Month 1, 1921.

AUSTRIA.

We find that the Austrian Unit have already recognized the necessity for cutting down their program, and have made arrangements to limit their work to the amount of funds available. The A. R. A. representatives in Vienna have agreed to propose to London and New York that they supply the Friends' Mission with food for the children up to three years of age, inclusive, and that the Friends continue their present plan of control and distribution as a separate organization. The rest of their plans calls for a minimum amount of about $120,000 or £30,000 to carry the work until Fourth Month, 1922, and we believe that the two Home Committees should undertake to find this amount. It is hoped that the campaign for clothing in the United States will be successful enough to assure the continuance of the clothing program.

We have informed the Field Committee of the impossibility of guaranteeing any definite sum, and it has been agreed that a further review of the financial situation is to be made in Ninth Month. The Home Committees are requested to notify the Vienna Unit at that time of the amount of money they think they can supply.

RUSSIA.

We have not been able to visit Russia, but we sincerely trust that the two Home Committees will continue to work along the lines outlined at the time of the London Conference in 1920.

CHALONS-SUR-MARNE.

We were not able to visit the Maternity Home at Chalons-sur-Marne together, but we are all of the opinion that the two Home Committees should take such action as will make it possible to fully equip the hospital.

SHIPMENTS received during week ending Seventh Month 30, 1921—135 boxes and packages; 1 marked Mennonite Relief from Ohio, containing 102 garments.

Contributions for week ending Eighth Month 1, 1921—$4,812.97.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING was held as usual on the 1st and 2nd inst. Dr. Wm. Cadbury was present at both sessions, after an absence in China of five years. Three members of a committee of the Yearly Meeting's Extension Committee were at the meeting of Ministers and Elders. Their appeal for a widened vision and a deepened experience met a welcome response.

In the Third-day session practically nothing apart from routine was attempted, but there was a solid, settled sense of optimism, as the un-failing resources of Divine strength in Jesus Christ were emphasized.

THE tragic death of Marcia Doan, editor of The Quaker, near Greenfield, Indiana, Seventh Month 24th, in an automobile accident, cast a deep shadow over the Young Friends' Conference at Richmond. She had shown herself a very capable and tactful Friend in her position and she will be widely mourned.

WALTER S. MEADER writes an interesting account of New England Yearly Meeting in The Quaker. He says, "Particular interest was manifested in the German letter on account of its thoroughgoing adoption of all the concerns and customs of the early Friends, protesting against hiring ministry, music, had worship, oaths, war, alcohol and tobacco, and adopting the plain language and dress."

On the statistical report he makes this note: "New England Yearly Meeting records a net loss of forty-seven members during the year 1920 in spite of the fact that requests for membership exceeded the resignations by more than sixty. The principal losses were by death and discontinuance of names of non-resident members."

The conclusion of the article is the closing minute: "We have been blessed, during our many sessions, by the presence of the Holy Spirit, and we have realized that it is on His power and guidance more than on organization or personal initiative we must rely in accomplishing His will. With renewed faith that He is able and that He will enable us for service we conclude, purposing to meet in Vassalboro, Maine, at the appointed time next year."

SOME of our readers may know Dallas Lore Sharp as a writer. The Quaker makes this quotation from an article of his in the Atlantic Monthly with the title "Education for Authority":

"My children have not had what I had in religion—not my Quaker grandfather certainly, who was lame and walked slowly, and so, I used to think, and still think, more surely walked with God. My first memory of that grandfather is of his lifting an adder out of the winding woodpath with his cane, saying, 'Thou must never hurt one of God's creatures'—an intensely religious act, which to this day covers for me the glittering folds of the snake with the care, and not the curse, of God."

CARL HEATH, at Essex and Suffolk Quarterly Meeting, gave an account of two journeys he made in Central Europe, in the course of which he discovered that everywhere in that area Quakerism was a passport to anywhere, a fact that was "both exhilarating and humiliating." Throughout Europe there was a door wide open for Friends to carry, in the living spirit, a live movement of Quakerism, which could only be done by the prayerful support of the whole Society, and by the offers of individual Friends with a real concern for the work.

The following comes to us by way of London. If the item is not Friendly News it will be of use to Friends:—

The Los Angeles Times gives some interesting statistics of the "silver cost of the war." If the cost of the war were taken in silver dollars and rolled into rails, it would be sufficient to build a silver railroad twice around the earth at the equator. If the amount were divided equally among the entire population of the earth it would give each man, woman and child one hundred and seventy dollars.

"A BODY COMPACT."

The subject of a diminishing membership in some communities of Friends and a failure in growth in others occupies at times the serious thought of many members, no doubt. It may well be a subject of solicitude; but in casting about for a cause and a remedy, it is of the highest importance that we do not mistake the nature of the weakness, nor fix responsibility in the wrong place. We need a spiritual diagnosis in harmony with the mind of the Great Physician. If we can feel that we are individually in the line of our calling, fulfilling our measure of service, however humble and obscure it may be, we shall at least escape condemnation for what may be regarded as a condition to be lamented. But our concern will not stop here. If we are alive "in the Truth," we shall want to see it spread, and its blessed fruits multiplied.

Nevertheless, it is pertinent to inquire whether our present concern ought not to be more for the integrity and purity of the Society than for the size of it as an organization. Look about a little among other Christian bodies, and see whether the largest congregations and most popular churches are in general displaying the standards of pure Christianity better than do some smaller, less conspicuous ones. Devices for securing attenders and even an increase of membership may effect something in numbers, but not much in strength and efficacy if there is not a corresponding conviction to govern the conduct. A situation in which there is a large association of members may be externally impressive, yet if it were such that certain truths or principles must not be spoken of for fear of controversy or discord, the organization would be far from thorough unity. To maintain a real unity of an upbuilding kind, we must of course be on the right ground.

A Friend of the first period placed membership and fellowship on such a foundation that the resulting visible church would be (and was) "a body compact." Doubtless his thought was consonant with that of the apostle when he said that the body was compacted by that which every joint supplied, so as to make increase of itself in love. If we could but come into, and abide in, the condition under which the early Church was multiplied, "walking in the fear of the Lord and in the comfort of the Holy Spirit," should we not have reason to look for an enlargement of our borders?

To determine the times and seasons of this, however, is not within our province, and our faith must include patience. Our responsibility is in living according to our measure of light; and if we might be so faithful to our high calling as to be instrumental at this time in promoting justice and goodwill in our various neighborhoods, as well as amongst nations, such service would be a memorial greater than could be made by the mere gathering of numbers. Oh! there is sore need of reform in what is called Christendom; and when one considers the signs of self-indulgence and vanity, of intolerance and ambition, often so apparent, one can hardly be indifferent to the discredit given to the Christian name. Nevertheless, there is much of evident good to rejoice in, and we may be sure that a work of the Lord is going on in many hearts and many places, beyond our sight or knowledge. The proportion of good and evil is not easily determined, and we are not to forget that a firm foundation standeth, having this seal: "The Lord knoweth them that are His."

To return to the main theme, however, it seems to the present writer that the most urgent call to the Society of Friends is to come up in loyalty and dedication to the Truth, as well as in the service to which the times give emphasis, rather than to concern itself overmuch with plans for increasing its numbers. If there be life and patience and fidelity on our part, there will doubtless also be growth and expansion in the Lord's own time.

THE GOOD REMAINS.

Still come the seasons as of yore,
And stars maintain their ancient way,
Wearing their old-time glory dress;
Still morning, blushing, kisses day.

Nor have the flowers lost their charm;
Nor is the song of birds less sweet;
And from her glittering couch of dew,
Nature still wakes the sun to greet.

Still soothes the murmur of the brook,
The mystic poetry of the breeze
In summer glancing, and the rose,
Wooded, gives her nectar to the bees.

And angels still surround the throne;
And love divine is still supreme;
The good remains, the evil dies
And fades from memory like a dream.

ABINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING.

The members of Abington Quarterly Meeting, together with a few Friends from other meetings, met in Germantown, on Fifth-day, Eighth Month 4th, at 3.30 p. m.

At our meeting for worship we were urged to be ambassadors for Christ and also to strive for a peace within us, which we can attain, notwithstanding the great rush and turmoil of this present-day life. A prayer was offered for forgiveness and strength that we might live according to God's will for us. After a period of silence, the business meeting was opened by the Representatives answering to their names. The four Queries were read and while we felt encouraged that there seemed a growing interest in our business meetings, and that many strangers attended our First-day Meetings, we still had to report a small attendance at our mid-week meetings. One Friend deplored so much diversity of opinion among our members, but thought it a challenge to prayer. Another voiced the opinion that there could be no real ministry that does not help others along the heavenly journey.

The Extension Committee urged that all members of our Quarterly Meeting should help them when they are called to do so, and it was thought a great opportunity for our Society. J. Passmore Elkinton said that the Committee feels very dependent on the local meetings, as to the best means for carrying out their purpose. In their approach to the public they will need money for literature, conferences, etc., but especially will they need inspiration; their task is to concentrate on the Christian message as expressed in Jesus Christ.

Harold Evans reported satisfactory interviews with Secretaries Hughes and Hoover, at Washington, by their Committee on Disarmament. They were pleased with the spirit of friendship and good-will toward the nations in which negotiations were being carried on. Hughes expressed appreciation of the interest of Friends, and Hoover seemed wholeheartedly in favor of disarmament.

Dr. Edward G. Rhoads reminded us of the importance of the belief in our Lord Jesus Christ, as expressed in John iii: 16. He thought the reason we had lost in attendance at our meetings was our lack in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Edward Wood encouraged us by telling of a young Japanese whose viewpoint had been changed by his contact with Friends and who will return to his country a Christian. He hoped Friends would make use of such opportunities.

The Meeting then adjourned, after which supper was served.

THE GRACE OF PERSONAL FAITHFULNESS.

We copy this editorial from the American Friend and thank Elihu Grant for such a clear note:—

Are we learning how to live and grow in grace? Fragments of prosperity which developed because of remarkable opportunity still lie strewn about us. The emergence of many new personalities and their activities is bewildering. Their finger-touch seemingly upon the very pulse of great movements, the influence they wield is intoxicating. Their word or deed often causes world events to pivot. And we have been told that many of the men in high place are such ordinary men. Might not we attain to such power? In the old Arabic tales, luck or chance seemed often to put immense power under the control of very obscure persons. We would fain be Aladdins of a newer world of chance. We've eaten the apple and our eyes are opened, but do we see aright? Great results flow from small causes in every life. Love, ill-temper, harshness, sweetness, service, are working influentially all the time; not necessarily in public life, nor where men will give praise unless they are very thoughtful men. The power of the so-called mighty is not so assured or desirable. It is often but a chance to display weakness and to do infinite harm. We reckon ill if we belittle the influences from our present lives and over-estimate those that spring out of Washington or New York. Reputations wither more often than they improve in the public glare. It is too often mere excitement that is craved, self-importance rather than fruitful service. In the revelations that have come to us of worthlessness when sincerely devoted to duty-doing, let us not underestimate the glory of a chance to work and the grace of personal faithfulness. The exalted ego is the worst foe of good people to-day. Self-expression has degenerated into self-advertising. Service is confused with prominence. Our comparative freedom from restraints must not lead us to forget that the finest living has laws of its own. If we are of the Spirit, by the Spirit (of Christ) let us also walk. Creaturely activities are no substitute for inward growth in grace.

FRIENDLY ECHOES FROM REVIEWS.

Midsummer numbers of two of our most important reviews contain articles both about, and of interest to Friends. In the Constructive Quarterly, Herbert W. Horwill, formerly London correspondent of the New York Evening Post, contributes a long article on "A Quaker Social Movement." In it he says: "A silent revolution is going on among the Friends. How striking is their change of attitude can scarcely be realized by anyone who is not in touch with present-day Quakers either by personal association or by constant study of the Quaker Press. There were certain signs of this new tendency before the war, but it was the war itself that really woke Quakerism from its 'dogmatic slumbers' in the matter of the industrial system." Then follows an understanding description of the historical background (when the writer says Robert Owen had no Quaker following, he should not forget the help of William Allen) and details of the Industrial Parliament Scheme of Malcolm Sparkes, the State Bonus Scheme, Jordans Village, New Town, and the work of the War and Social Order Committee.

The Hibbert Journal (Leroy Phillips, Boston, Mass.) as a quarterly cannot be as prompt as other journals with its reviews, but its notice of W. C. Braithwaite's "Second Period of Quakerism," published in 1919, is worth waiting for. The series (of which it is a part, and of which Rufus M. Jones's "Later Periods," due this month, will be the concluding volume) so the reviewer says, "rank among the most valuable of recent additions to the history of religion in this country."

In the same number of Hibbert is an article on "Religious Knowledge in Schools." Based on a "Headmaster's" recent examination for a whole school, many of the questions being very stiff ones, it gives material of great value for educational and incidentally too some amusement. Friends should particularly note that according to one boy, "The Inward Light means the light which keeps you merry and alive. If you had no Inward Light you would be sulky and dull."

In a Czechoslovakian magazine, Fuggellen Sjenle, is an article entitled "The Activity of the Society of Friends During the War." It speaks with great admiration of the leading ideas of the Society—their broad, humanitarian spirit, their generosity, their far-sighted view in politics, their courageous stand against militarism. It deals with the ideal Christian attitude the Friends have taken towards the enemy alien subjects, and ends with the sentence: "The blessed hand of the Society of Friends has reached our suffering country—when will their spirit also enter all hearts here?"

HUBERT W. PEET,

174 Venner Road, Sydenham, S. E. 26.

DR. WALTER RATHENAU, speaking for the new Germany in his book, "In Days to Come," has this to say: "In days to come we shall have to put away from ourselves our dearest vanities, weaknesses, vices and passions; upon us will be imposed the duty of cherishing sentiments and performing deeds which to-day we esteem in theory while despising them in practice; we shall have to learn by hard experience that our aim in life must not be happiness but fulfilment, that we have to live not for our own sake, but for the sake of God."

MUSTARD SEED AND A BIRTHDAY.

[In giving space to the following we have made an exception to our general practice regarding the publishing of anonymous articles. Despite the fact that it bears no name, and that there is here and there a tendency towards "fine writing," we are printing it, with the feeling that it will perhaps "reach the condition" of some who may chance to read it.—Eds.]

The other day he had a birthday. Not that that in itself is of particular moment; we all have them—with increasing frequency. But it so happened that this one marked the completion of his thirty-third year, and he could not help thinking of that Perfect Life—lived out, filled full, offered up, in the same brief period.

What could his own life show in comparison? A sorry affair, indeed, it seemed. Mud-stained from many slips and falls—some the result of awkwardness and weakness, but others from what really looked like a perverse willingness to stumble and lie prone in mire and slime. Waste, empty spaces of time squandered, and nothing to show for it. Here and there, to be sure, was the evidence of effort—effort which had sufficed to throw dust in the eyes of some of his friends who, unlike himself, were always on the lookout for some sign of good in others. But the best that was there was mediocre. There was no one thing that he did superlatively well. He never had known the joyful satisfaction that comes from excelling at something—from making a mouse-trap, or a lead-pencil, or whatever it was that Emerson talked about, a little better than anyone else could do it. Most things that he did seemed rather below the average, a few came up to it, but none excelled.

Dismay made him his ready prey. Was all his life to be like that? Was he never to rid himself of those stains of dust and mire? Was his life to be always a trudging down the valley of mediocrity, with never a glimpse from the high hill-tops on each side, out into the world of those who did at least some one thing well, and was he never to feel in his face those fresh West winds which, he knew, must blow, up there where men succeeded? He knew he hadn't five talents, nor yet three. Was he going to have to realize, as the years wore on, that he hadn't even one, which he could double for his Master?

Despair seized him. Nothing he did was worth while. Then why do anything? The efforts he had made in the past were sufficient, he knew, to deceive his less discerning friends (thank God! he still had friends, but how long could he keep them?). He might go on repeating over and over those same deceptive motions, which seemed to promise something, but never did perform. Yet he knew that it was all hypocrisy, and he still hated hypocrisy—even in himself. People said to "try"—he had "tried," till he was sick of trying.

Doomed to failure! The dread word rang in his ears. Failure! Failure! Why not give up now? He hated himself, and most other people, too.

Then there came the realization that with all this welter of mediocrity, weakness and failure, there was still one talent that was his. He could obey!

When nothing is required that is beyond our ability to perform (how often he had heard that from the lips of experienced, tried men!) obedience is one thing at which we can all succeed. Here our gifts and talents do not enter, they are quite apart from our willingness to "mind our Guide." The least gift might obey, the ablest can do nothing greater.

As he dwelt on this, hope came to him once more. Here was something he could seize upon. He grasped it, and it held. In a volume of half-forgotten lore he happened upon the following, and it helped him, seeming to confirm his own discovery: "How may a man come out of the darkness of the night into the light and brightness of the day?"

"By joining to the first glimmerings and breakings forth thereof upon him. The least light of truth hath the same nature, virtue, and properties with the greatest. Though not the same in degree, yet the same in kind; and he that will come to the greatest, must begin with the least."

He remembered hazily something in the Psalms about

"sitting in the seat of the scornful." Was not that his own condition? Discouraged himself to the point of inaction, he had jeered at the efforts, often feeble enough, of others, whose shortcomings were as patent to him as his own. But with this fresh life, this comprehension of what real obedience could mean, came an appreciation of the honest effort of every sincere person. He grasped something of its significance. He saw its majesty. He was still a long way from the point where he could see "that of God in every man." But he knew what the words meant, at least. He had seen that pinnacle from the valley, and he knew that he could reach there, if he would. The mustard seed was planted.

THE STAR IN THE DAYTIME.

[This editorial is reprinted from the N. Y. Evening Post. It has a lesson that we all need at times.—Eds.]

The curious thing about the Star was that once you found it, looked right at it, and kept your attention fixed upon it you could see it clearly, if you had the right kind of eyes. Lots of people couldn't see it at all, some because they did not have the right kind of eyes, but mostly because they were blinded by the garish light of an extraordinarily bright and sunny morning. The sky was a bottomless sea of azure; the clouds that swept across, melting into shifting wisps and flecks or vanishing altogether as the sunshine ate them up, shone like new snow. The fluttering flags on tall poles distracted your gaze. But if you did get into a shadowed place or down in the depths of the canyons between the towering buildings, carefully work out the exact location and fix your gaze there, you saw the Star, glittering like a diamond in the blue.

Then it came to you afresh that after all the stars are there all the time, passing stately across the sky, sending out their steady stream of light, as much and as truly in the glare of the brightest day as against the velvet blackness of the darkest night. It is not their fault if we do not see them. It is the fault of our eyes, filled with the blaze of things, or of the earth-born clouds that shut us in. Also, we do not trouble in the daytime to look at, or for, the stars. Only those who look, out of the depths of canyons or at the bottom of narrow vistas, see the stars in the daytime.

In the daytime we are all-powerful. In the awe and loneliness of night we pray, each after his own fashion:

Now I lay me down to sleep;

I pray the Lord my soul to keep.

As if to say: "While I am awake and on the job I can take care of myself. While the sun is shining, never mind the stars." The prayers of most of us come out of our fears.

Suddenly comes a day when we discover that whether we look for it or not the Star is overhead and shining, regardless of our seeing. And we realize then that if our eyes are open and intent we can see it and steer by it—unless we suffer the garishness of the day to blind us to its glittering presence.

"I CONFESS I have at times had cause to marvel at the forwardness of some who though but children, if rightly children at all, have undertaken the work of men, hardly discovering a willingness to give the preference to any; and when they have been admonished by those of much more experience than themselves, they have been apt to retort, or to plead a Divine commission, and that it is right to obey God rather than man, as if they had the sole right of speaking and judging, too. I had divers times seen the great danger of being deceived or misled by the transformer, and therefore was afraid of being confident of my own sight, and looked upon it to be safest for me to stand quite open to instruction, let it come from what quarter it would: there being nothing more desired by me than to be right."—JOHN GRIFFITH.

A MOTHER'S LETTER TO HER SON.

[We are indebted to our friend Susanna Kite for the following. Apparently it is clipped from a local paper, but we cannot make the usual acknowledgment as the name of the paper is not given.—Eds.]

The following mother's letter to her son upon the completion of her ninetieth year, for which we are indebted to our good friend Cyrus Cooper, of Ohio, is from the Episcopalian, and shows that vital religion is the same under whatever name. All Christ's disciples must take up the daily cross and experience the old nature crucified and the new man created in Christ Jesus. This work is in the heart, carried on by the Holy Spirit, and yielding the fruits of righteousness and peace.

"My Very Dear and Only Son:

"I sit down to address to you probably the last letter you will have from me. I suffered much on account of your and your ever-beloved wife's heavy trials; but my faith is unmovable in all these things working out for both you and myself 'a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.' I am now nearly ninety years old; but I consider myself one of the happiest beings in existence, for most of my trials are gone through; and, under the apprehension of those to come, I am happy to tell you my feet are on the Rock. I have a husband, three children, and two grandchildren beyond the boundary line of sin and sorrow. God was manifestly glorified in the deaths of those who came to maturity; and the rest are quite as safe. My health is just as good as it ever was, only the infirmities incident to old age; and fewer of these than perhaps any other of my age. My memory is good; I seldom forget anything I hear; I can read a little, and hear tolerably well; I have food to eat, and raiment to put on, and when sick, tender hands to aid my infirmities. I feel as if a volume would not be too much for me to fill, if I told you all I think of you both and the dear children; and, when overwhelmed with the thought of you all, I can only ease my full heart by crying to heaven in the language of the apostle, 'That the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ would bless you all with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ Jesus.' I know, and often say, our prayers are often reciprocal, for I feel assured you are asking for me; and the blessed access I feel tells me I am heard for you.

"But one thing, above all things, I would enforce—the necessity of teaching the dear children that the religion I am recommending is a thing not merely to be found in books, sermons, or knowledge, but at the throne of grace. It is a 'casting off the works of darkness, and putting on the armor of light,' it is 'putting off the old man, and putting on the new,' a 'crucifying the flesh with its affections and lusts;' it is set about by a knowledge of themselves; a repentance towards God; a faith in Christ; a passing through the straight gate; a new birth; Christ formed and brought forth in the soul, enabling the new creature to walk in Christ, with a knowledge of salvation by the remission of sins; a self-denying life.

"I tell my dear grandchildren that these are my views of religion, after sixty-four years of experience—for so long has my Saviour kept me; and now I know 'that neither life nor death' (nor any of the dangers in the catalogue) 'shall be able to separate me from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus my Lord.' I shall ever, while life remains, remember you in my prayers, night and day, and I trust you will do the same for me, for I am still in the field, and the wolf of the evening is still going about. But, after sixty-four years' conflict, the Sword of the Spirit is still bright; and oh, to have the promised land in view!

"This is what Bunyan calls the land of Beulah; or the prophet Isaiah, 'The land that is afar off, where the King is seen in his beauty.' I was reading of this to-day, the first of the year, and I trust, ere another year rolls round, that faith will be lost in sight. But, before I let the pen be dropped, again I would say, tell the dear children, in searching for religion, Jacob 'wrestled,' David 'wept and watered his couch with tears,' Paul prayed, the publican 'smote upon his breast,' the jailer cried, 'What shall I do?' and, above all, Jesus, when asking for us, rose a great while before day and went into a solitary place, and there prayed. Everything for life or death is to be got at the throne of grace; but the soul must be on the stretch for all we want.

"And now, my dear children, I have told you what I have to say before I leave this vale of tears.

"Meet me above, that I may say, 'Here am I, and the children Thou hast given me.'

"May the good Lord keep you all till we meet in 'a house not made with hands,' is the prayer for my dear son,

"Your affectionate,"
"MOTHER."

OPEN DOORS IN PEKIN.

[This article is from The Friend (London) of Seventh Month 22nd. We feel Henry T. Hodgkin will be glad for us to reprint it.—Eds.]

I am taking advantage of a few hours here to write about some of our experiences in Pekin. This seems to me the most worth while visit of any—but of course it is very hard to compare one place with another. First of all, I must tell you a little of the general situation in order that you may appreciate the atmosphere in which we are living and working.

The political and military situation is about as bad as it can be. The country is really ruled by these military governors—known as the Big Three. They each have huge armies and considerable wealth. The men under their command are attached to the generals personally rather than to the Central Government or to China. These men are in a real sense military dictators. One never knows when they may fall out among themselves, or when they may decide that the Government has to be changed, or when the students and others may decide to try a violent revolution to shake off their yoke. The particular point of dispute just now is over education. The Government is unwilling to supply the schools with the needed funds. The salaries of teachers are ever so much in arrears and the teachers are on strike. No regular classes are being held in Government schools and the University is locked up. It is not clear whether this is simply a symptom of the general disorder and financial stringency or a deliberate policy on the part of the Government looking to the retirement of the teachers and the substitution of other men or even to the general suppression of higher education. It might well be something like that, for the schools are the centre of disloyalty to the government, and the present teachers are writing and speaking constantly against the domination of the Big Three and the general policy followed by the Government.

The leaders in the movement, which is called the New Thought Movement, are men educated in America and a few in England. They are first-rate scholars, men able to hold their own against foreign scholars—and in some cases, men of fine principles and high moral life. These are the men who have brought Professor Dewey and Bertrand Russel to China. The ideals of the movement are complete freedom of thought, a challenge to the traditionalism of the past, especially the orthodox interpretation of the Chinese classics, a revolt against organization, a passion for social betterment. The movement seems to me to have much in common with the Frei Deutsche Jugend and to have much hope in it. The bias is distinctly anti-religious, and some of the leaders hold that religion is played out and that aestheticism must take its place. One or two of the leaders are Christians, however, and several are open-minded or even favorable. I have already had a long talk with its most brilliant leader, Hu Shih. He is a Ph.D. and a man of fine personal life. He has done a great deal for the simplification of Chinese writing and he is more open-minded than many others.

Another young leader has got me an invitation to give a course of lectures at the Higher Normal School (Government), where the students are still staying and working, although there is no regular teaching. These are on "China in the World of To-morrow;" and I am speaking on such questions as "China in the World of Industry" and "China in the World of Nations." These lectures are being written out in full, translated and published in the Chinese paper Seu Ming or The Life. I have been giving another course on the Christian Revolution in the Pekin University (Christian). This course has been rather closely followed, and I am having a group discussion with some of the men. This work can all be done in English. I have found that some of the students have been thinking along similar lines and I am very thankful to have this fine opportunity.

I cannot do more than hint at the other opportunities that are coming to me all the time. I have found a wide door for the discussion of Christianity and War and kindred topics. The missionary community were keenly discussing the question of peace in the Far East before I came here and I had at once two chances of speaking. Then I found a committee working on the problem, and with them I have had several discussions. I have addressed the Language School and am to speak there again to-morrow. I am to have a talk with the staff of the University. I have spoken at several Chinese and foreign services where I have had excellent opportunities for giving our message. I am also taking a considerable part in two student conferences, giving opening addresses and taking classes in the Bible and on social questions.

At this college I had a fine meeting last night. It is a Government College and is built by the indemnity money remitted by America. There are, I think, 600 students in all. I spoke to a very eager group on War and the Future of Humanity and explained fully Friends' position. The discussion and questions afterwards were very keen and turned even more to other aspects of Quaker teaching. At last one student said: "If you Friends believe all these things why are you not sending people all over the world to make more members? How can it be that there are so few of you?"

These questions are not easy to answer. I am sure that we have a word that is urgently needed here in Pekin. The air is full of eager questionings; many are seeking for truth, and the Quaker approach to the problem will appeal if it is adequately presented. We could open a Quaker embassy here with a staff of half-a-dozen of our best and have work enough for everyone, and I believe it would not be at all difficult for it to be self-supporting. My heart is full of the bigness of the opening here and the dead ripeness of this field. Why are we not entering it?

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

"THOSE MISSIONARY POTATOES."—It was not a very large church, nor was it nicely furnished; just a plain, square, bare building. Here James and Stephen Holt came every First-day of their lives.

One First-day they stood together over by the stove, waiting for the First-day school to begin, and talking about the missionary collection that was to be taken up. It was something new for that church; the people were not used to having collections. However, some of them thought it was about time for them to begin to give. But the Holt boys had not a cent to give that day.

"Pennies are as scarce at our house as hen's teeth," said Stephen, showing a pair of white, even teeth as he spoke. James looked doleful. It was hard on them, he thought, to be the only ones in the class who had nothing to give. He looked grumpy around the old church. What should he spy lying in one corner under a seat but a potato!

"How in the world did that potato get to church?" he said, nodding his head toward it. "Somebody must have dropped it that day we brought the things here for the folks. I say, Stephanie, we might give that potato. I suppose it belongs to us as much as to anybody."

Stephen turned and gave a long, thoughtful look at the potato.

"That's an idea," he said, eagerly. "Let's do it."

James expected to see a roguish look on his face, but his eyes and mouth said, "I'm in earnest."

"Honor bright?" asked James.

"Yes, honor bright."

"How, split it in two, and each put a half on a plate?"

"No," said Stephen, laughing; "we can't get it ready to give to-day, but suppose we carry it home and plant it in the nicest spot we can find, and take extra care of it, and give every potato it raises to the missionary cause? There will be another chance; this isn't the only collection the church will ever take up, and we can sell the potatoes to somebody."

Full of this new plan, they went into the class looking less sober than before; and though their faces were rather red when the box was passed to them, and they had to shake their heads, they thought of the potato, and looked at each other and smiled.

Somebody must have whispered to the earth and the dew and the sunshine about that potato. You never saw anything like it.

"Beats all," said Farmer Holt, who was let into the secret. "If I had a twenty-acre lot that would grow potatoes in that fashion I would make my fortune."

When harvesting came, would you believe that there were forty-one good, sound, splendid potatoes in that piece of ground? Another thing: while the boys were picking them up, they talked over the grand mass-meeting for missions that was to be held in the church next Fifth-day—an all-day meeting. The church had a taste of giving, and was prospering as she had not before. Now for the big meeting, to which speakers from Chicago were coming. James and Stephen had their plans made. They washed the forty-one potatoes carefully, and wrote out in their very best hand the following sentence forty-one times:

"This is a missionary potato. Its price is ten cents. It is from the best stock known. It will be sold to one who is willing to take a pledge that he will plant it in the spring, and give every one of its children to missions. Signed by James and Stephen Holt."

Every shining potato had one of these slips smoothly pasted to its plump side.

Didn't those potatoes go off, though! By three o'clock on Fifth-day afternoon not one was left, though a gentleman from Chicago offered to give a gold dollar for each one of them. Imagine the pleasure with which James and Stephen Holt each put two dollars and five cents into the collection that afternoon. Ever since then they have had a missionary garden, and both gardens thrive.—Regions Beyond [adapted.]

HER MOTHER'S PARTNER.—A sturdy little figure it was, trudging bravely with a pail of water. So many times it had passed our gate that morning that curiosity prompted us to remark:

"You're a busy little girl to-day."

"Yes'm."

The round face under the broad hat turned toward us. It was freckled and perspiring, but cheerful withal.

"Yes'm; it takes a heap of water to do a washin'."

"And do you bring it all from the brook down there?"

"Oh, we have it in the cistern mostly, only it's been such a dry time lately."

"And is there nobody else to carry the water?"

"Nobody but mother, an' she is washin'."

"Well, you are a good girl to help her."

It was a well-considered compliment, but the little water carrier did not consider it one at all, for there was a look of surprise in her gray eyes, and an almost indignant tone in her voice as she answered: "Why, of course I help her. I always help her to do things all the time. She hasn't anybody else. Mother'n me are partners."—Selected.

THE BIBLE OF A FAMOUS QUAKERESS.

WALTER IRVING CLARKE.

ELIZABETH AS A MANAGER.

Haddonfield, New Jersey, was the location of the plantations of John Haddon of England. He was a Friend, who lived at Rotherhithe, borough of Southwark, county of Surrey, then a suburb of London, on the east side of the Thames. John Haddon found himself unable to come to America to look after his estates, so his daughter, Elizabeth, came in his place, and proved a notable executive manager. What brave spirit must have actuated this girl, who, fresh from a home where she was sheltered by every solicitude, came to cast her lot in the midst of the then unbroken forest in the wilds of West Jersey.

Elizabeth Haddon's father suffered from the persecutions of that day against the Friends, or Quakers. In 1670, in Yorkshire, for attending a Quaker meeting at Anne Blackburn's, his first "offence," he was fined the equivalent of $11. As late as 1687, in London, he was bereft of goods totaling over $100, because of his fealty to his faith. He looked to West Jersey as an asylum from persecution.

Elizabeth came to West Jersey in 1701. She was then about twenty years of age. She was named Elizabeth for her mother. The records show that she administered well the affairs of her father, that she was zealous in the work of the Society of Friends, serving efficiently for fifty years as clerk to the women's meeting; that she ministered wisely to the afflicted; that in spite of the comparative affluence which she acquired through her energy and efficiency she was, nevertheless, a pattern of plainness and moderation; that with prudent cheerfulness she kept her heart and home open to her friends; that she was zealous and diligent in the church, a power for good in all the walks of life. She died in 1762, at the age of eighty-two, having survived her only sister, Sarah, as well as her parents and husband. Having no children of her own, she adopted her sister's son, Ebenezer Hopkins, who came to America and married Sarah Lord of Woodbury Creek, New Jersey. It was to their first-born, John Estaugh Hopkins, that she gave the Bible. Their second child was named Elizabeth Estaugh Hopkins, and became the wife of William Mickle.

ELIZABETH'S HUSBAND.

John Estaugh was born in 1676 in Kelvedon, a small town fifty miles northeast of London. He early became a minister of the Society of Friends and traveled in the interests of that ministry to Maryland, Virginia and North Carolina as well as Pennsylvania and West Jersey. He had skill in chemistry and medicine and used these arts to help the poor; in a way he may be said to have been a sort of medical missionary. His letters to Quaker meetings were among the religious inspirations of the day. Some of his writings were printed by Benjamin Franklin at Philadelphia. He died in the Island of Tortola in 1742, on a mission for the Quakers, and was buried there. His wife Elizabeth survived him twenty years. To the last she was active in good works and her home was the centre of entertainment for friends visiting the meetings. It is cited as a mark of her foresight, energy and liberality that in 1721 she had her father deed, for a new meeting house, the land on which, until 1818, stood the only place of religious worship in the village.

The romance of Elizabeth Haddon and John Estaugh is well read and considering. Prosaic chroniclers, always ready to rub some of the bloom off the joy of life, have sought to minimize the part played by Elizabeth in the courtship. Even these, however, admit that John, who was terribly serious, may have been diligent in this personal matter, or may have performed his part awkwardly, and that Elizabeth with her accustomed ready good sense and courage came to the rescue and precipitated matters. Close study of the facts of record, however, convinces the present writer that Longfellow stuck remarkably close to the truth throughout his tale.

AS TOLD BY LONGFELLOW.

As related by Longfellow in his "Tales of a Wayside Inn," under the title, "The Theologian's Tale, Elizabeth," it is a beautiful idyll with the Lord's hand visibly working out the destinies of human souls. The reader of this article is urged to turn at once to his or her treasured volume of Longfellow and re-read the poem in full. It is a rather long poem, but well worth the time. Its opening stanzas, with their homely household atmosphere in the settling down of cold weather, are redolent of the spices and sweetness and savor of Thanksgiving time. Then came the spring and the Friends' Quarterly Meeting.

Then Elizabeth said, though still with a certain reluctance,
As if impelled to reveal a secret she fain would have guarded;
"I will no longer conceal what is laid upon me to tell thee;
I have received from the Lord a charge to love thee, John Estaugh."

And John made answer, surprised by the words she had spoken.
"Pleasant to me are thy converse, thy ways, thy meekness of spirit;
Pleasant thy frankness of speech, and thy soul's immaculate whiteness,
Love without dissimulation, a holy and inward adorning,
But I have yet no light to lead me, no voice to direct me.
When the Lord's work is done, and the toil and the labor completed
He hath appointed to me, I will gather into the stillness
Of my own heart awhile, and listen and wait for his guidance."

Then Elizabeth said, not troubled or wounded in spirit:
"So it is best, John Estaugh. We will not speak of it further.
It hath been laid upon me to tell thee this, for to-morrow
Thou art going away, across the sea, and I know not
When I shall see thee more; but if the Lord hath decreed it,
Thou wilt return again to seek me here and to find me."
And they rode onward in silence, and entered the town with the others.

Ships that pass in the night, and speak each other in passing,
Only a signal shown and a distant voice in the darkness;
So on the ocean of life we pass and speak one another,
Only a look and a voice, then darkness again and a silence.

Patient and unrepining, Elizabeth took up again the old routine of life, busy with its manifold opportunities for Christian service. John went across the seas, and departing

Carried bid in his heart a secret sacred and precious,
Filling its chambers with fragrance. . . .
And at last came the voice, imperative, questionless, certain.

Then John Estaugh came back o'er the sea for the gift that was offered,
Better than houses and lands, the gift of a woman's affection.
And on the First-day that followed, he rose in the Silent Assembly,
Holding in his strong hand a hand that trembled a little,
Promising to be kind and true and faithful in all things.
Such were the marriage-rites of John and Elizabeth Estaugh.

Thus Longfellow. You may read, as I have read, in the annals of the Friends, the marriage certificate. The simple marriage took place at a public meeting at Elizabeth's house on the First-day of the Tenth Month, 1702. The names of the witnesses include Broomall, Collings, Collins, Cooper, Richardson, Jones, Estaugh, Jennings, Thorne, Morris, Fretwell, Evans, Puckle, Hunness, Wright, Adams, Spicer, Thackaray, Hanbury, Masters, Norris and Wills. The name Cooper reminds the narrator of these chronicles that James Fenimore Cooper, the great American novelist, was among the cousins of the Haddon-Estaugh kin.

A WIFE'S TRIUMPH.

Elizabeth Estaugh left in writing a considerable testimony to her husband: "Few, if any, in the married State, ever lived in sweeter Harmony than we did. Oh! he was a sweet Companion indeed! A loving, tender Husband; an humble, exemplary Man; a Pattern of Moderation in all things; not lifted up with Enjoyments, nor cast down at disappointment. For sure, few, if any Man, ever left sweeter Saviour both at home and abroad than he has done. And yet in the Midst of all, I have a Secret Satisfaction in that I was enabled to give him up (though so dear to me) unto the Service into which he was called. This is but just a hint for those who may be under the like Exercise and Tryal, that they may not hold back, but submit, and freely give up their All, leaving the Consequence to the wise disposing Hand who knows for what Cause it is He is pleased so nearly to try his People, some with Life itself, others near it, and the Cause yet hid."

John Estauagh and Elizabeth Haddon stand as models of happy, devoted, American Christian couples. He was buried in an island of the distant seas; she rests in an unmarked but hallowed spot in the Old Friends' Burying Ground at Haddonfield. Their mutual sublime faith, which so enriched the lives of so many, was founded on the teachings of that Bible which is still preserved by their kinfolk. John was a shining light in the propagation of his faith. Elizabeth, a model for her sex. Both were devotedly Christian, both human and helpful in wise and practical ways. Happy the homes that to-day are building a Christian heritage such as these two people, husband and wife, wondrously worshipful and wondrously loving, built around the home altar where rested and was read Elizabeth Haddon's Bible.

WHAT WESTTOWN HAS MEANT TO ME.*

[NOTE.—It is not unusual at Westtown School to have a dozen or more Yearly Meetings represented in the student body. The late Allen Jay used to point out the effect of this in unifying, in measure, the whole of our American Quakerism. The following article is solicited by us from a recent graduate from North Carolina. It reveals something of this unifying influence.—EDS.]

Four years ago, when I entered Westtown, my father, himself an old Westonian, tried to tell me what a great place Westtown was and what great opportunities it offered to its students. He did this because he wanted me to waste no time in taking advantage of those opportunities. But really it is useless for a parent to make this attempt. A boy has to plunge in and get experience for himself. This kind of lecture goes in at one ear and out at the other and so it was with that one. But now I have been at Westtown for four years, I am just beginning to realize what my father meant—and it's time for me to leave.

I want to classify the opportunities I have thought of under the headings of Education and Culture, of school life, of friendship, and of Quakerism.

Education teaches us to think, and therefore includes more than the mere subjects of the curriculum. Scholastically, it seems to me that the education Westtown offers is about as complete as could be made. It is greatly added to by the fine faculty of the School. The methods used in teaching are excellent, but that is not all. Usually we think of a teacher as an agent by whom knowledge is pounded into us, but here that is not the case. Westtown teachers are glad to be our friends. They sympathize with us, they talk to us freely and meet us in a man to man way.

Sometimes I have thought there is a lack in our time for reading, and for gaining information about current events, as well as in the amount of control we have over our leisure time. The day is somewhat closely programmed, but with a full curriculum perhaps that is hard to avoid.

The fresh air and daily exercise in games is an important part of Westtown life. Mental culture and physical culture must go together if either is to be satisfactory. The soccer, basketball, baseball and tennis are well organized and the teams are generally successful, but I think it would improve Westtown to have more of the natural athletics, such as the track provides. Skating and coasting in a good hard winter give a pleasant change from too monotonous team games.

Besides lessons and games the school societies fill a very important part in school life. While the Union, the Brightonian and I am told the Athenian, aim at supplying more general culture than the ordinary lesson courses can, Parliamentary and Cometa gives us our chief point of contact with current events and valuable practice in public speaking both prepared and impromptu. The Radio Club is a successful experiment in practical science and affords a practice ground for future electrical and radio engineers, and supplies general information for everybody interested, as all boys are, in the modern miracle of wireless. Rustic does the same for farmers and farming.

There is room perhaps for more societies of this kind representing special interests; for instance, a chemical society, a sketching club, a kodak club and the like.

The school life this year has seemed to me one of the most pleasant of my four years at Westtown, owing to our growing desire as students for co-operation with the faculty, but I realize the loss that we have suffered in not assuming enough responsibility, and I hope next year with fuller student government Westtown will discover and express a finer public spirit than it has yet known.

Probably the most valuable and lasting thing that most of us win and take away from Westtown is friendship. We can perhaps never realize all that our Westtown friends will mean to us. It is hard to express the inspiration that a good friend is to thought, to sympathy, to confidence, to jolliness, and, in fact, to everything worth while. A friend may start a good rough house with you one minute and be a real help in a serious matter the next. He not only teaches you to appreciate the good qualities you find in him, but succeeds in finding them in you and so develops the best that is in you. "As iron sharpeneth iron so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend."

All the things which I have mentioned could probably be found at other schools. But there is one great reason for Westtown's separate existence as a school which sets it apart from almost all others and that is, Westtown exists to express and teach Quakerism and to train members of the Society of Friends. The central part of this training in Quakerism is our meetings for worship on First and Fifth-days, and the Bible classes supplement this by lectures and discussions on personal problems and practical Quakerism. But the Quaker atmosphere pervades more than this.

One of the great reasons for student government at Westtown is that it will be in accord with Quaker principles of democracy and of personal responsibility.

I did not know much about Quaker principles before this last year, and the study of them in Ethics class has been most helpful and interesting.

The morning and evening collections ought to be part of this atmosphere and training, but for the most part I feel they are not. I know I often was quite unable to say right after collection what the reading had been about. I think this is because the constant reading of the Bible makes it a matter of routine and destroys the interest in it. During an average day we have the Bible read three times and on Scripture class days four times. We lose by this in two ways, one in having dull collections, and the other, more important, by the real interest in the Bible becoming lost to us and making it difficult for us to regain it later. I would suggest that in one of the collections, at all events, the reading be from some inspiring book other than the Bible, such as "By an Unknown Disciple," and that a short practical talk be given at least once a week, either by boys themselves or by members of the faculty.

I do not know what Westtown may do for others, but as for me, after being here, I feel that I can never be anything but a Quaker, and that I am keen to see the Society of Friends go ahead and become greater even than its great traditions, as a force for personal, social, national, and international good. That Westtown has taught me to think, it has taught me to work and to play; it has taught me some of the springs of right thinking and right living, and, above all, it has given me ideals.

REPORT OF PRESIDENT OF FRIENDS' STUDENT HOSTEL.

TO THE ANNUAL STOCKHOLDERS' MEETING, SEVENTH MONTH 20, 1921.

In making this report of the first year's operation of the Hostel, I think it an accurate statement that the experiment has on the whole been a decided success. A number of difficulties have been met that had to be overcome, but probably not more than should be expected in a new undertaking of this kind.

The house was opened with the starting of the college year 1920-1921. The average during the year of men living in the house has been about twenty-eight and about twenty-one taking meals. For the first four or five months a house-mother was in charge, who did excellent work in getting the house opened and under way. Since the beginning of the second semester, it has been conducted by the students, one of their number acting as caterer. Satisfactory meals have been provided at about the prevailing State College rate, $7.00 per week, and $2.50 per week has been charged for rooms. The receipts from operation of the house for the college year, over and above cost of food, coal, service, light, laundry, etc., have, with supplies on hand, amounted to approximately $2,000.00. The amount necessary to cover taxes, insurance, administration, depreciation, interest on loans, and a 5 per cent. dividend, etc., is in round numbers $1700.00. The year's experience would therefore seem to prove the possibility of operating the house on a self-supporting basis. With all rooms full, even a better showing may be made. Arrangement has been made for having the house open for teachers during the summer school term, through a rental agreement with two of the members of Friends' Union.

Of the authorized stock of $10,000.00, all has been subscribed except $50.00, but stock is available for transfer to those wishing to become stockholders, and it seems desirable to have as many as possible interested as stockholders.

The interest taken by the students in the enterprise has been most helpful. The house has served for a social centre for the group and their friends and a Friends' Meeting has been held there First-day evenings, attended by the students and other Friends living at State College. Through the Advancement Committee of Baltimore Yearly Meeting, there have been three visitors to the State College Meeting:—Elbert Russell, George A. Walton and Paul Jones.

Joseph Platt, Clarence E. Pickett, Maria Bishop and others have also visited the Meeting.

Your President has kept in touch with the group by correspondence and through two personal visits.

One year's experience seems to have demonstrated the wisdom of those who conceived the idea of starting this home.

(Signed) WILLIAM C. BIDDLE,

President.

[Since the above was received we have been notified that four new directors were elected this year, viz.: Arthur E. James, Francis R. Taylor, Arthur Sackett, dean of one of the departments of State College, and J. Bernard Walton. A small committee of the Representative Meeting at Arch Street is under appointment to foster this work. They and other Friends will be interested to direct intending students of State College to the Hostel. —Eds.]

FRAGMENTS.

For "THE FRIEND."

While contemplating the miracle recorded in St. John, chapter vi, verses 5-13, when a multitude was fed on five barley loaves and two small fishes, my mind recently has rested most especially on the words, "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost," and "there were taken up twelve baskets full."

The size of a basket is not mentioned, but the fact that stands clearly expressed is, that none of it was to be left to go to waste. To me there is a lesson in this which we should heed. When that which has been given to us supplies our need, costing us nothing, the remnants may seem of little value; yet it does not warrant our casting them away; gather them up for others if not for ourselves. The bounties of earth were never created to be wasted, even the smallest fraction.

No matter how ample our means may be, we cannot rightfully take that as an excuse for neglecting to care for aught that will benefit another.

During these times it is most urgent that we should always emphatically keep in mind an aim to use only what we actually need, and bestow the rest toward helping the crying wants of humanity. How can any stand clear who disregard the Master's injunction, "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost."

A FORCE MAKING FOR FRIENDSHIP.

Leyton Richards, a former editor of the Venturer, writes in Goodwill on the Society of Friends as one of three Christian forces making for international friendship in Norway (the others are the Lutheran Church and the Student Christian Movement).

He says, "In Norway, the Society is practically confined to the vicinity of Stavanger; but it inspires, even when it does not actually supply, the idealists of peace up and down the country. The Norwegian Quakers have a curious and interesting history; they date from the post-war period of a hundred years ago; when Great Britain seized the Danish fleet in Copenhagen during the Napoleonic war, Norway was an integral part of the Danish kingdom, and the fleet was largely manned by Norwegian sailors. These were interned in England as prisoners of war, and there they were visited by Elizabeth Fry. When, at the end of weary years, they were at last repatriated, a considerable number of them took back the Quaker faith to Norway, and among the sea-faring folk of the southwestern seaboard the Society of Friends began to flourish. It is a story which ought to give encouragement to every worker for international friendship: bread cast upon the waters sooner or later returns!"—The Friend (London).

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING.

Third-day morning, the 6th inst., opened bright and cool, an ideal day for the assembling of Concord Quarterly Meeting, held at Media.

Some Friends were away on vacations, though we were favored by the presence of a good many visitors, so that attendance was perhaps fully normal.

On assembling, the meeting was early dipped into the spirit of prayer which was expressed vocally.

There was a free flow of baptized ministry from members, as well as from those from other districts, and there were periods of silence; all combined to make a favored meeting. The testimony was uplifting in character; it had reference to the "Abundant Life" which comes by following the lead of our Divine Master: "Ready to serve" was well emphasized; this was the leading thought expressed by one; the apostle Paul being given as an example of a brave soldier for Christ, who feared not persecution or even death, so that he might stand acquitted in the final day of reckoning.

We were told that we should not only absorb spiritual values for ourselves, but that we should see to it that we were outlets thereof in order that others might be benefited spiritually.

The first item of business after the opening minute and response of Representatives, was the reading of the report of a Sub-Committee of Ministers and Elders, members of the Yearly Meeting Extension Committee, concerning the growth and exercise of the ministry in our religious Society. Members of that Committee supplemented the report with verbal explanations to the edification of the meeting. There was a full and sympathetic consideration of the matter. A vital point was touched when one Friend recommended that, young or old, we should not go to our meetings with a feeling that we would or would not give expression to a message which might be presented, but rather, that we should keep tender and be guided by the spirit of Truth in the matter at the time.

The quality of silence in our meetings was another one of numerous points brought out in the discussion: a dead, silent meeting is sorrowful to contemplate, but many can testify attendance at meetings where a living, worshipful silence is experienced; we need to cherish this.

A Quarterly Meeting Committee on the Extension of Christian fundamentals was appointed for two years; its functions will be to co-operate with the Yearly Meeting Committee as well as to perform the duties of the Committee to visit subordinate meetings which was released.

Pursuant to a concern expressed late in our last Quarterly Meeting, a Committee was appointed to look after certain educational interests within the limits of the Quarterly Meeting, which it was felt were not adequately cared for at present. An appropriation of $200 was granted for the use of this Committee.

The first four Queries were read, and answers approved.

Owing to the large volume of business which very properly seems to claim the care of the Quarterly Meeting at each session, it was decided that, until further notice, a recess would be taken before opening the business session at which time the luncheon would be served. The Meeting held for more than four hours, a long meeting, yet interest was maintained throughout; surely it was a privilege to be there.

ARE THERE ANY MORE REFUGEES?

The people who are returning to the district in which Hostynne is located do not get any official welcome home, and do not pass through any disinfecting station. We hear of them in various ways. Sometimes they bring a note from the priest, or the teacher, or the head man of the village, the "Solty's," or sometimes we find them huddled together by families in a hole in the ground or any rude shelter that is at hand. Few of those who return ever find the home which once was theirs still standing.

Hostynne is a village of dugouts and crudely made wattle houses in southern Poland. Nettles and swamps make it seem more destitute in summer than even when it is covered with the winter's snow.

One day, on our journey, we discovered three new "hayricks" in the most swampy part of the village. When we came closer to them we found that they were "homes" of three families who had just returned from exile the day before. In front of one of them stood a big, fine-looking man with his hand on the bridle of a horse attached to his furmanka. His wife came out as we stood there and called to her husband, "Biroza." Biroza turned, went in under the haystack and carried out three thin, white little children. "It is not only the long fifteen hundred mile journey across Russia during the winter which has made them look this way," he said, "but the wife as well as the children had typhus and it has not even yet left them."

We looked into the place in which they were living. There were two boxes and a rough bed, and these, with two sheepskin coats and three pots, seemed to be the total of their household goods. When we asked him about his land, Biroza replied, "I have four morgs of uncultivated land, but if I dig it I have nothing to put into it, and anyway it is too late for sowing. I have my wife and children and my horse to feed, and I have only one mark left. Shall I show it to you?"

We asked if seed-potatoes would be welcome. "Yes," he replied, "they would feed us during the coming winter."

So a card was given him, and the next day the thin, scraggy horse arrived with the cart at Malice for the potatoes. The horse did not have the strength to carry all the ration, and so half of it was loaded on and we promised Biroza to send the remainder over in the Mission cart. We also promised clothing to the man, and then he said wistfully, "Could I have a pair of trousers? These I have on are so hot to work in."

When later the potatoes were carried over and the clothing given, we waited while Biroza's wife proudly tied a little blue American frock on one of the small children.

We also visited the other hayricks, but in fact escape would have been impossible, for the women were ready to waylay us and the old story was true again here. Two brothers and their families had been nine months on the long way home and had found nothing upon which to begin the new life when they had arrived. Seed-potatoes, food and clothing were urgent needs here also to tide them over this period before anything could be grown and before a shelter for the winter could be built.

Yes, there are still refugees in the world. They are not being driven before armies, as they were in the first years of the war. They are families which have been scattered beyond the frontiers of their country and which now are slowly making the long, hard journey back to the place where once their life was so good and promising. The months of undernourishment while the weary miles were being covered has broken down all their reserve, and when they reach the ruins of their old house and the ground which is hard from not having been plowed for five years, life holds nothing except the one hope that the relief which has been sent by strangers who love God by loving men, will be given them to tide them over until the result of their work will support life.

THE MEANING OF QUAKER SERVICE.

In a letter received last week at the Service Committee headquarters the Head of the Department of German in Vassar College spoke of her belief in the actual contribution which the service of the Friends is making toward international good-will and peace. M. Whitney writes:

"I had the pleasure of visiting your work in Munich last summer and was greatly impressed by the value of what you are doing as well as by the excellent effect that the work was having in helping to do away with the bitterness against America which was stirred up in Germany by our entrance into the war. At least to the rising generation in Eastern Europe, America now means food and comfort, and this may have a strong influence in preventing future follies of the same sort.

"MARION P. WHITNEY."

JANE ADDAMS CALLED "THE KINDEST LOAN OF THE UNITED STATES" BY THE GERMAN PRESIDENT.

The official thanks of the German Republic were given to Jane Addams, who is now in Europe as a representative of the Friends' Service Committee, by President Ebert, for the contribution which J. Addams has made, in helping Germany to rebuild its life since the end of the war. Jane Addams went abroad in Sixth Month as an official representative of the Friends to visit the missions in Germany and Austria, by the request of the Service Committee, so that the missions and the workers might receive the invaluable aid of Jane Addams' mind, spirit and experience.

President Ebert expressed the feeling of the government and the people of Germany for the service which Jane Addams has rendered, both on a former visit and this one, to the people of Germany in the hour of their greatest need. He writes:

"MUCH REVERED MISS ADDAMS:—In the name of the German Government and people, I take advantage of your presence in Europe to express our deepest thanks for everything you have accomplished, in such warm love, for the reconciliation of nations, and for your big-hearted humanity. Shortly after hostilities ceased, you and a number of similarly-minded women visited Central Europe, which was suffering under the terrible consequences of war. Germany's condition then was nearly unknown in your country. I must thank you for your reports for the necessary understanding of these conditions and for the fact that many broadly conceived relief conditions, especially the relief work of the American Quakers to the children of Germany, were made available.

"Now you are untiringly active in relieving the suffering of mankind and as a leader of new relief organizations, public congresses and circles. The world now needs more than ever before minds which are sharp for the troubles of nations. Only through cessation of hatreds created by years of war, and through the determination of nations to join hands in the task of reconstruction, may we count upon extricating ourselves from the present condition.

"May these principles, always advocated by you, finally assert themselves, and social and national peace crown your work.

"EBERT."

SHIPMENTS received during week ending Eighth Month 6, 1921—124 packages; 1 marked German Relief; 1 from Menonites; 6 anonymous packages.

Contributions for week ending Eighth Month 8, 1921—$5,466.31.

THERE can be no return to the first century, steps once taken cannot be retraced, and our task is none the easier by the passage of nineteen centuries of trial, partial success, and much failure. Here then we must stand and face the issue. All around us we are conscious of a great army of seekers. Many whom we thought of as hostile or indifferent are turning with new hope to the Gospel of Jesus as the only guide out from the despondency and despair into which failure has cast us. The fact that, in spite of all setbacks, in spite of mistaken zeal and misinterpretation, the Spirit of God is breaking forth afresh in our midst is the surest proof that the living power of Christ is still amongst us. In this faith we can go forward.—ERNEST E. UNWIN.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

Is a letter from Germany to William B. Harvey requesting some copies of Stephen Grellet, Adolph Baumann says, after acknowledging the service of James Henderson in liberal measure, "Surely we dare not seek the honor of men, but of God, 'Soli Deo Gloria'. I hope therefore that if any of the Lord's servants amongst American Friends feel sure of their call there will be no restrictions made by the Society for the exercise of that call because the child-feeding is still going on.

"Jesus in His time gave both natural and heavenly bread; though of course we know that He is that bread Himself.

"In our little meeting here we are still witnessing a day of small things, but I trust that the heavenly power which makes itself manifest in our bosom will some day find its way to work the will of God more perfectly."

We learn from the Pacific Friend that George G. and Anna Rhoads Williams have the approval of California Yearly Meeting for foreign service to include Palestine and perhaps Egypt and to attend London and Dudding Yearly Meetings.

The appointed meeting at Barnegat, N. J., on the 7th brought a company of sixty together. Of these twenty-one were members with Friends. James M. Moon and Max I. Reich had vocal service. The latter was also at Tuckerton in the morning, where a company of forty gathered. The average attendance at Tuckerton this summer is about six.

A MEETING was held in the Chapel at Gardenview, Bucks County, Pa., on the afternoon of Seventh Month 31st by appointment of committee of Falls Monthly Meeting of Friends as the concern of James M. Moon.

A thunder and hail storm had passed through that section near the hour of gathering, preventing many from attendance, but a fair number were present and seemed interested in the earnest appeals for a more thorough preparedness to meet, from a true Christian standpoint, the many serious problems now confronting the American people. A life fully surrendered to the guidance of the Spirit of Christ, was dwelt upon as a sure means of combating all evil. The presence of so many children was an encouraging feature. James M. Moon and Max I. Reich each had service in testimony and prayer.

E. TOMLINSON.

THE following appeared on the front page of the Springfield Republican: Alfred Scattergood, head of the Quaker relief organization in Germany, which has provided 150,000,000 meals for poor children, has a family name that takes one back to the pages of "Pilgrim's Progress;" its appropriateness is ideal. The honors just bestowed on him at Berlin before his departure are a sincere expression of gratitude; the relief work of the Society of Friends has made a deep and lasting impression throughout Europe.

A PHILADELPHIA Friend, writing from California, says that there is fear in that quarter that in our Peace work we "are not awake enough" to the new situation expressed by General Smuts in these words: "For the world scene has shifted away from Europe to the Far East and to the Pacific, the problems of which would be the world problems of the next fifty years or more."

A BRIEF article in the Intelligencer says that about sixty Friends have been in attendance this year at the Summer School at Columbia University. The two meetings in New York City combined in efforts to turn this sojourn to good account. There have been four conferences on successive Fifth-days, followed by a Meeting for Worship. Anna F. Gifford, principal of the Downingtown Friends' School, has been chairman of the Conferences.

WE have often called attention to the possible service for peace of an international language. Several Friends are interested in this subject.

A gathering, which will rival the meetings of the League of Nations, for internationality, has been meeting at Prague during the first week of this month. It is the thirteenth Universal Congress of Esperantists. Intending visitors included representatives of thirty-nine nations (Japan, South Africa, North and South America, and Australia among them). The Czechoslovakian Government encouragingly patronizes the Congress by a fifty per cent. reduction in railway fares and passport visés to all foreign members attending the meetings. Well over 2,000 persons are expected.

WALKING BY FAITH.

We walk by faith, not by sight.—PAUL.

Life is like an amazing highway. Ofttimes it is smooth to our easy-treading feet, again it is cruel and rugged to every weary step. One moment we rejoice in the glowing sunlight, again we lament amid darkness and fears. We are glad when the scene is illumined before us, we are despondent when walls are around us and, like blind men, we grope for a gateway that is hidden from our view.

Yet is a great achievement to walk by faith. No financial or intellectual support can equal it. No philosophy or argument can become a substitute for it. No mental or physical equipment can excel it. Faith is in a class by itself. Faith transforms the unreal into the real. Faith is superlatively the willing co-operation of humanity with the graciousness of God.

Think of the men and women who have triumphed through faith. Think of the prophets and statesmen, the inventors and poets who have wrought and sung as they walked through the country of doubt toward the land of better things. Think of the countless millions of every generation who, whilst apparently helpless in the stress of their environments, have with unconquerable hope pressed toward their goal! These all enriched the world because they dared to believe—they proved that with all material or spiritual riches faith is supremely good!

Why then do we not cultivate faith more than we do? Why does it so often seem foolishness to us? Why do we only yearn for sight when sight is so frequently denied us? Why do we not ardently long for faith when it is profitable at noon-day or in the depth of the starless night? Why do we not consent to be refreshed with the serenity that comes from reliance on God as we tread the pathway of life?

There are different kinds of faith. There is a faith that overcomes the world and there is a faith that is overcome by the world. The first is the faith of Jesus—it is the abiding faith. Happy is the man or woman who lives a life made buoyant and strong by faith in the Son of God!

There is wonderful heart-ease in this trust. We learn that we deal with a Father of infinite forgiveness and love. When the clouds lower all about us and the storm breaks, and our sight is dim, we with faith valorously step into the darkness assured that we cannot fall. The abundant strength of God upholds us and His unseen hand guides us on our way. The highroad of faith leads to the wide-open portals of the Heavenly City. We walk by faith, not by sight, up to the eternal verities of God!

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

FINDING LIFE IN GOD.

It is impressive to examine the testimony of great souls, down through the ages, as they tell us of making this discovery. In the early Christian centuries we find this testimony. Augustine's spiritual experience was one of the marvels of that age. From his life of sin he was converted, and became a mystic of rare insight. As a bishop of the early Church he had great influence; but as a prophet of the spirit a greater influence. From his sin he made his journey into the Divine Presence. But who ever has told more simply the method of the journey? He says:

Thither one journeyeth not in ships, nor in chariots,
nor on foot;
for to journey thither,
nay, even to arrive there,
IS NOTHING ELSE BUT TO WILL TO GO.

Is his the earliest testimony to this truth of the obedient will which accomplishes the journey by its direct action? No, go back many centuries before even his time. As early as the era when the old book of Deuteronomy was written, one wrote of this truth:

And thou shalt find Him, when thou searchest after Him with all thy heart and with all thy soul.

And the same ancient writer, a mystic and a prophet, said:
The word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it.

To people who knew not the path to peace appeared another of the prophets with his amazing message:

In returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength.

It seems as if every age has to be reminded of this truth, but every age has its mystics who bear testimony to their discovery. A great poet of the spiritual life, still living, spans by his own testimony the gap of time from Deuteronomy to his own age:

Go not, my soul, in search of Him,
Thou wilt not find Him there,—
Or in the depths of shadow dim,
Or heights of upper air.

For not in far-off realms of space
The Spirit hath His throne;
In every heart it findeth place
And waiteth to be known.

Thought answereth alone to thought,
And Soul with soul hath kin;
The outward God he findeth not
Who finds not God within.

And if the vision come to thee
Revealed by inward sign,
Earth will be full of Deity
And with His glory shine!

Thou shalt not want for company,
Nor pitch thy tent alone;
The indwelling God will go with thee,
And show thee of His own.

Then go not thou in search of Him,
But to thyself repair;
Wait thou within the silence dim,
And thou shalt find Him there!

Jesus looked with infinite pity at restless, hurrying people, who were seeking peace and finding it not; people who judged their own prayers by the multitude of their words and not by the sincerity of their hearts. To His disciples he said:

But when ye pray, use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do: for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking. Be not ye therefore like unto them: for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of, before ye ask Him.

Prayer has reached the goal before the journey has begun. The need of the human heart has reached the Father's heart before the words are framed. The measure of prayer is its reverence. The worth of aspiration is in its sincerity. The judgment of the heart is its loyalty.

The soul which is really devout has found its life in God.—Churchman Afield.

THE PLAIN LANGUAGE.

[NOTE.—An esteemed subscriber has sent us the following article. We share with her the view that the plain language, even amongst Friends, seems to be a lost cause. Our general misuse of it in making an objective case nominative, leaves little to be said on the grammatical side. It is also undoubtedly true that the seventeenth century situation in English, where thee and thou were used to equals and inferiors, and you to superiors has entirely changed. The aristocratic form has become the common form even in our democracy. How many of the ills of democracy may lurk in this tendency to ape an aristocracy even in a form of speech is an interesting field for speculation. In any event the fact that the party of the "Young Democracy" in Germany has taken a positive stand for the singular pronoun is not without interest; it may have profound political significance.

There may be a point in this connection in reviving the ground of Friends' testimony in the seventeenth century on this and allied subjects. They are very ably put by our friend A. Neave Brayshaw in his invaluable little book, "The Quakers, Their Story and Message."

We quote a paragraph on page 42:—

"A striking feature of the infant Quaker church is the unanimity, achieved within a very short time, on various matters of practice, obviously not as the outcome of tradition, but as the natural result of belief in a Divine principle in the hearts of men. Mention has already been made of the way of worship practiced by Friends from their earliest days. Not as the result of any ecclesiastical direction, but naturally, throughout the fellowship, there prevailed a simplicity of attire, not the adoption of a specially designed costume, but of the dress of the period shorn of the superfluities with which it was usually decked. It was not the natural thing for men in the house to take off the hat, the worshippers and sometimes even the preacher wore it in church, taking it off in prayer and the singing of psalms. With unanimity Friends refused to give into the spirit which led judge or magistrate to demand its removal in his presence, and led social 'superiors' to demand the payment to them of an honor which they would not pay to 'inferiors.' With equal unanimity, refusing to admit the right of some to be addressed as 'you' while they themselves said 'thou' to those whom they counted beneath them, the Quaker used the 'plain language,' as he called it, saying 'thou' to all men as being the appropriate word in the single number. The suffering which his faithfulness in these matters brought upon him was not endured for any unessential or frivolous scruple, but because of his determination to dwell with the Truth, standing clear of sham and pretense while repudiating the charge of discourttesy. 'True civility stands in truth,' said Fox."

The question has often come up in my mind,—How much will the use of the plain language be practiced by our members, when those who are now children are grown?

Our minds are turned to many new things in this time in which we are living and Friends are being thrown more and more with those who have never been accustomed to the use of thee and thou, and to saying First-day and Twelfth Month. It is right for people of different views and beliefs and walks in life to mingle and work together. But, why, when we do live and work and play with those who are members of other religious societies; why can we not take with us the courage which will enable us to use the plain language?

If it is right to say thee to the plainest Friend in the gallery, why do we not say the same to our neighbor or business associate?

I know the use of thee and thou does not make our religion; and we might use these forms daily and still be very poor Christians; but I firmly believe that the use of this plain manner of speech will always help us to be stronger in ways which we cannot always see, and its use can never take away one atom from any influence for good which we may have.

Can there be any real reason for adopting the use of you, etc., when addressing one accustomed to its use? If there is a misunderstanding on the part of the one addressed as to our meaning, we can explain why we use this form of speech. If each of us could firmly decide in his or her own mind that we would on all occasions use the plain form, and when it was not understood, offer an explanation, then the time would come when this manner of speaking would come easily and naturally.

If we do not now take this firm stand for the plain way of speech, I believe the time will not be far off when its use will be very rare. I feel there are many in our Yearly Meeting who would feel sorry, indeed, to see our thee and thou dropped entirely. The half-way method seems the easier,—to use it when it seems most suitable and especially in the home circle; but that method cannot be lasting. We shall have to be strong in carrying out our beliefs or they will not survive.

MARY L. BALDERSTON.

LET SOMETHING GOOD BE SAID.

When over the fair fame of friend or foe
The shadow of disgrace shall fall, instead
Of words of blame, or proof of thus and so,
Let something good be said.

Forget not that no fellow-being yet
May fall so low but love may lift his head:
Even the cheek of shame with tears is wet
If something good be said.

No generous heart may vainly turn aside
In ways of sympathy; no soul so dead
But may awaken strong and glorified,
If something good be said.

And so I charge ye, by the thorny crown,
And by the cross on which the Saviour bled,
And by your own soul's hope of fair renown,
Let something good be said!

A UNIQUE SUMMER SCHOOL.

[With the above caption, the N. Y. Evening Post gives information of a most constructive item of peace work between our country and Mexico. We print the article just as it appears in the Post.—Eds.]

Our lack of knowledge of the cultural attainments of our neighbors in the Western Hemisphere would be laughable if it did not so often lead to serious misunderstanding. Especially do we need to know Mexico in other than the conventional way. The action of the University of Arizona this summer in sending a large party of teachers and students to Mexico City with the co-operation of the Mexican Government is therefore an excellent move.

This unique summer school—for it is duly organized as such—left Tucson June 21, stopped on the way at Mazatlan, "Queen City of the West Coast," a centre of Mexican culture and letters, and at Guadalajara, with its magnificent cathedral and Murillo's "Assumption," and finally reached its headquarters at the capital city, where it will remain in session until August 11. A course in Mexican archeology is now under way, participated in by Mexican authorities, the centre of study being the National Museum, with its marvellous collection of monoliths, the Aztec Calendar Stone and Sacrificial Stone, and the interesting Indian "Codices." There is also a course on the literature of Mexico and Spanish America, under the direction of an American professor of Spanish, supplemented by lectures by prominent Mexican men of letters. For their work the students have had placed at their disposal the 200,000 volumes of the National Library, besides the collections of the library of the University of Mexico. On the return trip the members of the summer school will visit Queretaro to see the cathedral and other churches containing some of the best work of Eduardo Tresguerras, "the Michael Angelo of Mexico," and Guanajuato, with a panteón often compared to the Campo Santo of Genoa.

All of this suggests a picture of Mexico rather different from that to which we are accustomed. It suggests, moreover, that if we take the trouble we may find in Mexico and other of the nations to the south of us intellectual and artistic values well worthy of any study we can give them.

A REMARKABLE CIRCUMSTANCE IN THE LIFE OF DAVID SANDS.

During the American war, an encampment of about five hundred men was stationed at West Point, near the dwelling of David Sands in North America. During their stay D. Sands and wife became very uneasy, particularly his wife, who felt a presentiment that some trial was approaching. In a short time afterwards she was alarmed one night by a voice, or noise, heard in the house, after they were gone to rest, which her husband apprehended might be only the rustling of the wind among the trees, in a few minutes they were more certain by finding some persons near their room door, and distinctly hearing them say, "some of the family are awake, we will shoot them." In this alarming situation, personal safety seemed the first object, and they soon determined to attempt an escape, which was the more easily affected by their chamber being on the ground floor. In getting out through the window one of the party stationed to keep guard on the outside, discharged his piece at them, the ball gras'd the head of David Sands. However, they did escape, but with very thin clothing, it being a very cold night & remaining out in the open air until break of day rendered it together with their painful anxiety a most suffering time. When they returned to their dwelling they found it plundered of all their cash, about £50, most of their bedding & much of their furniture, shop goods, &c., &c. A servant and two children who slept in another part of the house, were not disturbed. After considering what was best to be done, David Sands was most easy to ride to the encampment on his arrival he saw several officers conversing together, who said to him: "Mr. Sands, we have heard of the depredation committed at your house & desire to know what you think can be done to discover the offenders." After some solid consideration he informed them he had felt a belief that if he follow'd best direction & the men could be drawn up rank and file, about fifty in a company, he might be able in passing thro' them, to detect those concern'd in the robbery. The Officers wondered at his proposal, thinking it very impossible he could discover them in such a manner without any knowledge of their person; but they complied & gave the necessary orders. He walked up & down amongst them, feeling his way, at length on passing down the first rank he made a stop near the bottom but went on to the next, when he soon made a stand at one of the men and looking him full in the face, said to him: "Where wert thou last night." He answer'd: "Keeping guard, Sir, & a cold night it was." Didst thou find it so when at my house?" said David. Upon which the man trembled much, and shew'd evident signs of guilt; on which he was order'd out of the ranks. In like manner four others were discovered then he went to a young officer, whom he asked how he came to aid and assist the men in plundering his house; he positively deny'd the charge, but David Sands further interrogated him and said, "Let me feel thy heart & see if that does not accuse thee?" On putting his hand to it, it throbb'd up to his neck & so loud that D. Sands call'd to the other officers to come & hear how it accused him; therefore he was considered guilty. Two others which made eight concern'd deserted before the suit commenc'd & which accounted for the stop he made in the first rank. The Officers now desired to know what further should be done for him, he said he wanted his Bedding in particular, and should like to have his furniture &c., returned; upon which they brought back the greatest of the money assuring him the rest was lost. They were brought to trial before the civil power, but as David Sands declined appearing against them, they were of course acquitted. But this not exempting them from martial law and their guilt appearing beyond a doubt the Officers had them bound together and taken to D. Sands's house, informing him their lives were at his mercy; & he was to determine their sentence, upon which he gave them suitable advice and forgave them; they being weary with long traveling, he order'd them comfortable refreshments at the same time his wife observing one of the men said to him, "thou art he who shot at us," her husband made answer, "he has been told of it before." David Sands was told the Officer could not be pardon'd as it was death to him who should have set a better example to his men, but David being very solicitous to preserve his life ask'd if nothing could be done to relieve him from that punishment. They informed him, there was one way which was for him to desert his regiment, & which was permitted. They likewise said there must be some punishment inflicted on some of the men, to deter others from the like practice, therefore some of them underwent a slight floggin.

Several years after this occurrence David Sands was traveling in Ireland on a religious visit, and after a public meeting appointed on his account, a person came to him to beg his pardon & was going on his knees, which David prevented, saying he thought he was not the person which he meant, as he had no knowledge of him, but he confess'd he was one of those concerned in pillaging his house, & was one of the two who deserted to avoid discovery, & that he had not been easy in his mind since, but hoped he should meet with forgiveness. D. Sands told him it was out of his power to forgive sin, but hoped the Almighty would; he informed David that the other man lived at a short distance off, who soon came to him attired as a Friend, ask'd his excuse & confess'd his crime, desiring him as a confirmation of his forgiveness to go with him to his house, told him he was married to a young woman of the Society, but said he had not had any peace of mind since they had done him that injury. David consented to go home with him, & found it true as he had said, his wife had been reinstated in the Society & himself on the point of being received a member.—Copied Seventh Month 8, 1832, and submitted now by George Vaux, Jr.

THE DIGNITY OF HARD WORK.

A TRADES SCHOOL AND CLASS DISTINCTION ON MOUNT LEBANON.

During the time the Syria Palestine Relief Fund was functioning in Syria to meet the needs due to the war, a Trades School was started at Brummana. This has been continued by the Quaker Outpost on Mount Lebanon, under the direction of English, American and Syrian Friends, and others working with the Friends' Foreign Mission Association. One of the workers, Christopher G. Naish, writing recently, emphasizes the importance of the continuation of the School which has been closely watched for twelve months, both for its religious influences and its definite object of helping to train girls and boys for independent employment.

The curriculum in the Handwork Department is somewhat similar to that of the London Trade Schools, while that of the Educational Department includes instruction in Arabic, English, Arithmetic, Geography or Botany, and Geometrical Drawing. A very interesting correspondence is being carried on between girls of this and the Tottenham Trade School in London, while the School is also in touch with the Edu-craft Association Centre at Deptford, the new needlecraft being already taught as it is eminently suitable for the Eastern girls.

The School is also performing another useful social function. One of the needs of Syria, as of many other parts of the world, is a realization of the moral dignity of manual labor. In this country, where our Master Himself worked as a carpenter, it seems strange that it should ever be forgotten. The form in which the error shows itself is not so much a social barrier between classes whose work is mental and manual respectively; there is little of such distinction. On the chief feast days, cooks put on their best dresses and come round from the kitchen to the drawing-room to pay formal visits to their mistresses. Recently, before meeting, a man who combines the duties of cowman, mason, etc., to the Mission (the "handy man" in fact) came with his wife to call on us. This is a refreshing change from our English class division. But Syria suffers from a mistaken idea of the incompatibility of intellectual education and bodily labor. The boy at college does not think it an indignity that his mother should be a laundress, but he lets her stagger under a heavy basket to earn his fees, that his hands and clothes may remain unsoiled. One winter's day I was cutting a log for fuel when two men who were working on the property left their own job and ran up with a large saw to save me from the indignity, and went away almost crestfallen when I explained that I wanted to get warm.

This is another of the reasons why we think the Trades School one of the best pieces of educational work we have ever done in Syria. It is a practical lesson in the dignity of manual labor, and in the increase of that dignity with all intellectual development which is applied to it. A few days ago the cleaning woman complained of a strain due to pulling heavy buckets of water from the cistern. Later in the day two or three of the bigger girls, those who would be likely to consider themselves superior, were seen hauling up the water to save Saada, and this without any urging or even suggestion from the staff.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

WHEN THE BIRDS WIRE OUR GUESTS. That was a dry year in Australia. All through the winter months, except for a few light showers which barely laid the dust, there had been no rain; and when summer came, the fierce sun blazed down upon a bare red earth from which the parched herbage had long since been swept away by the strong north wind, leaving nothing but the dry stumps of the tufted grass. The sheep died in hundreds, and the cattle found scant nourishment by feeding upon the acrid leaves of the bush shrubs.

In the middle of winter a day came which was the climax of that awful summer. After a stifling, breathless night, the sun rose like a great red ball, growing hotter and fiercer as he ascended in the heavens, until at noon the air scorched the flesh like the blast from a furnace. Even the leaves of the hardy gum trees rustled and crackled and withered with the intense heat, while the sandalwood trees, the wattle and cassia bushes, with each smaller tree and shrub, drooped, their leaves hanging limp and lifeless.

The wild birds, open-mouthed and gasping, met in the giant gum tree, which in former years had afforded them grateful shade; but now it gave no shelter, for its leaves stood on edge and the burning sun's rays filtered through. Even the eagle hawk was subdued. With parted beak and outspread wings, he balanced his body on a stout bough, and glanced uncaring at his feathered prey; for well he knew the hot blood of birds would not ease this raging thirst.

Following the eagle hawk's eye, the crow looked down with a sinister smile upon the birds panting on every branch. All were there: Laughing Jack in his brown coat, his boisterous merriment stilled. The magpie, his black and white dress, usually so spick and span, now dingy and ruffled, for what bird could care how he looked in such weather? At dawn he had tried a note or two of his glorious morning song, but soon quavered off into silence. Perched on a twig in his pretty garment of soft, eucalyptus green, was little Silvereye, the daring bird who persistently refused to be scared away when a gun was fired, but kept his place in the branches, trusting to his coat's concealing him among the leaves which he resembled so closely; instead, he would turn a merry, silver rimmed eye toward the hunter as though inviting another shot.

Seated near their brown cousins of the plains, were the pretty blue wrens, their lovely dress, brilliant azure on the male, more somber on the female, making a bright spot of color. The "coolooly," a smaller and less aggressive copy of Laughing Jack, was perched beside the dull coated but musical thrush. The black and white flycatcher was there, the friend of the cows, on whose backs he often perches when hunting for his food and their torment, the flies. The whole parrot family was represented, from the great red and yellow crested cockatoos, the screaming pink and grey galas, the large, gorgeously plumaged parrots, down to the tiny soft green parakeets. Besides these, there were the ground lark and his silver voiced brother of the sky, the bronze-wing pigeon, the tiny crested dove, and many other birds of the bush too numerous to mention severally.

All the birds were suffering terribly from thirst, and there seemed no hope of any alleviation of their agony unless rain should come. All the water holes were dried up. Even the supply of water in the wells appeared to be getting low, and the day before, my father had ordered the troughs where the animals watered, to be covered, to prevent evaporation. Previous to the covering of the troughs, the birds had been accustomed to drink and bathe there in the early morning and in the evening.

For me and my brothers and sisters, this terrible day had been a trying one. We were not allowed to go out of doors for fear of sunstroke; and, restless and tortured by the heat, we had wandered from room to room, unable to lie still as we were bidden, and with no heart for our usual indoor amusements. The only thing which made us forget our discomfort, for even one moment, was the sight of our friends, the wild birds, collected in the big gum tree in front of the house. We knew that their sufferings were greater than our own, and we grieved that we could not help them.

About four o'clock we were all together at the window, looking out, when we noticed a commotion among the dispirited and gasping birds. They seemed simultaneously to have agreed upon some plan, for they all dropped to the ground, and slowly, with outspread wings and open mouths, painfully crossed the hot earth between the tree and the house, and presently we saw the marvelous sight of the whole troop, headed by little Silvereye, trailing up to the veranda. In amazement and delight, we called to our mother:

"Oh! Mamma, Mamma! The birds—the birds!"

"Open wide the windows," she instantly ordered; "perhaps they will come in. See, children, the poor things are perishing with thirst!"

We obeyed at once, and the birds came panting in their wings drooping, their beaks apart. Oh! the wonder and the joy of it! Our hearts swelled and almost burst with delight at the thought that the birds—our dear wild birds whom we loved so much—of their own accord had come to us for aid in their extremity.

The heat was forgotten in the great happiness of ministering to the needs of our guests. We ran to the kitchen for all the shallow dishes we could find. These were filled with water and placed on the parlor floor. The birds were not slow to understand. They crowded around the pans, and drank and drank, dipping in their beaks again and again, and lifting their heads to allow the cool fluid to trickle refreshingly down their parched throats. When their thirst was quenched they made no attempt to get out, but perched in various attitudes about the room.

The crow flew to the mantelpiece, stood on the corner of the shelf, uttered a weak caw, and looked around with an air of great dignity. The eagle hawk perched upon the arm of the sofa, while the magpie chose a shelf in the corner as a resting place. Most of the small birds found perches on the fresh boughs father had cut in the early morning, and which mamma had arranged in the big open fireplace so as to give the room an appearance of coolness. Laughing Jack looked comical, seated silently and gravely on the back of a chair. The prettiest picture was made by a number of parakeets, who sat in a row on the fender. The pigeons, larks, and most of the ground birds crept under the furniture, remained on the floor, or perched on the rungs of chairs.

For a long time we children could do little but gaze in rapture at the birds. That our wild feathered friends should have come to visit us seemed like a bit out of fairyland, and every few minutes we would rub our eyes and look again to see if it were really true.

If we went near, the birds did not move away, but allowed us to touch them, and Silvereye even hopped onto Arthur's finger, and sat there contentedly for quite a while. It was a rare pleasure to take a little unresisting parakeet, honey bird, crested dove, or blue wren in our hands, hold it up to our ears and listen to the quick beating of the tiny heart, or stroke the soft feathers with our smooth cheeks. But mamma said we must not handle the tender creatures much, lest we make them ill. So we satisfied ourselves by watching them, and by going every few minutes to bring fresh water, also bread, which we crumbled on the floor, hoping that our guests might be tempted to eat. But the birds did not care for food. Water and shade were all they craved.

All too short was that happy afternoon. The night closed in hot and stifling, and the birds made no move to go. We were allowed to stay up later than usual, but at ten o'clock were sent to bed. After tossing restlessly for an hour or more, I sank into a troubled sleep, from which I was awakened by flashes of distant lightning and the rumbling of a coming storm. Each moment the flashes were brighter and the thunderclaps louder. My brothers and sisters were also awake, and in the intervals of stillness I called to them across the hall. The storm was traveling at a rapid pace, and it was not long before it burst in all its fury over the house. The wind howled around the corners, the thunder roared, blinding flashes of lightning illumined our rooms, and the rain and hail beat upon the roof. It lasted longer than most summer storms, but at length passed, leaving quietness behind it, and in the hush of the dawn we heard a stir in the parlor.

We did not wait to put on even our shoes, but in bare feet and nightgowns ran down, to find our parents already dressed, and the birds, awake, alive, fully recovered from the suffering of the previous day, collected at the windows, eager to get out.

"Oh! Mamma, can't we keep them?" we asked eagerly.

"No."

"Not even one?"

But our dear mother was firm. She had the strongest sense of the rights of animals, and she knew that no matter how kind we might be to these birds, they would never be so happy in captivity as in the wild freedom of the bush. Half reluctantly, we opened wide the windows, and with coos and caws, and various notes of ecstasy, they flew joyfully forth into the sweet-smelling, rain-freshened world. We, too, felt glad with them, and rejoiced that they were free.

Though ever after on each hot summer day we hoped they might, the birds never again visited us; but I think they recognized our greater friendliness, and after that day were more tame, especially as father gave orders that no bird was to be shot near our house. Among all the sweet memories of my childhood, the day when the birds were our guests stands out as the most exquisite of all.—F. E. Hawson, in St. Nicholas.

BOOK REVIEW.

THE STORY OF A SPIRITUAL PILGRIMAGE.

[We have received this review from England and with slight abbreviation we are pleased to print it. Converts to peace of this kind in the newspaper fraternity are of incalculable value.—E.D.S.]

"Can any good thing come out of Fleet Street?" is a common plaint of the average optimist, who in journalistic matters is usually a pessimist. Such a state of mind is confirmed by the recent book "From Fleet Street to Downing Street," by Kennedy Jones, where Lord Northcliffe's colleague pooh-poohs the idea that journalism is anything but a money-making agency, but that there is hope that even Carmelites may again don a white robe is evident from the frank confession of H. Hamilton Fyfe, one of the best known of The Daily Mail special commissioners, which he gives us in his new book.*

I first met the author when he was editor of The Daily Mirror, just after it had emerged from its inauspicious beginnings as a woman's journal into the success of a picture paper. It is a far cry between the thoughts outlined in his new book and his attitude to life some sixteen years back, and indeed as lately as 1914 when, as he says, he went out as the Mail's war correspondent "as one who held the usual comfortable class opinions, who did not question the ordering of society, who believed the war inevitable" and now admits that the method of reasoning he used "helped to cause it."

"All these miseries," he says in his closing chapters, "have sprung, not from intention to do evil, but from a false tradition, a bad system, a cultivation of fear and suspicion and hatred, instead of trust and fellowship and Love. . . . Not until the war forced me to search painfully for that common ground of fellowship and practice which had almost dropped out of my thoughts, did I begin to understand that in the life and works of Christ, accepted as those of a man striving with all his might to understand and help his fellow-men, were inspiration and guidance for all nations and all ages." And on the last page of the book—"If Love is God, . . . if that was indeed Christ's teaching, what follows? Why, that the existence of God and the Divine government of the world depend on us; that God is not far off in Heaven, but that He is, if He exist for us at all, in our hearts; that we can make His kingdom on earth here and now."

Some may take exception to the "soundness" of the theological definition. None who have read the book, or who know the writer to-day can doubt the new Spirit that has led him on this war-time pilgrimage from fear and belief in force to a whole-hearted trust in the supreme power of Love. "Call it loving-kindness and its nature will perhaps be made clearer than it can be by calling it Love."

The book as a whole is eminently readable quite apart from its value as a human document. Its plain speaking regarding the background of the war, not only in France where he was one of the earliest correspondents and had the narrowest escape from capture, but also in neutral countries, and in Russia and America (where he was attached to the British War Mission under Lord Northcliffe), has all the brightness and grip of his journalistic articles. He tells amusingly of the glamor of uniform and of the potency of an Earl's Court Season ticket as a magic pass in awkward corners; he doesn't hesitate to say "many of the charges of cruelty appeared, word for word, the same, in allied and in enemy countries."

I suspected then and believe still that news-mongers in Holland and Switzerland were supplying identical inventions to both sides; and he has some caustic criticisms of the standard of mentality of leaders and politicians of all countries. Indeed, he saw so much behind the scenes that the wonder is that the book he felt called upon to write was not "The Making of a Cynic" instead of an optimist.

He may be sneered at by certain old associates or patronized by those who are inclined to agree with him now, but did not have the courage to say they held similar views during the war. He can render us all a great service by continuing to preach in quarters closed to others, but to which he is likely to have access, this belief that "the more we expect of human nature, the more capable of nobility we find it." It is because we have lowered our expectations, because lying and trickery are looked upon as the politicians' art, that the standard of public life has dropped to so low a level.

Again, in his own words, "We can raise that level by taking care first of all that we are not dishonest ourselves and by giving support always to men and women of principle and conviction, especially to those who believe that the New Spirit of generosity, comradeship, helpfulness, sincerity, trust and love is capable of making a better world than the old spirit of selfishness, trickery, violence, suspicion and fear."

THE STRUGGLE FOR FREEDOM IN HOLLAND.

H. Runham Brown, a C. O. who was closely associated with Friends during the war and is a member of the Committee of the No More War International Movement, writes:—

"I have spent twenty-four hours in Holland on my way into Germany. On leaving the train at Utrecht in the early morning of the 1st (ultimo.) I was at once plunged into the atmosphere of the English C. O. Movement of 1916.

"The city is placarded with little orange bills demanding the release of a conscientious objector who is on hunger strike—Herman Groenendaal. There are forty still in prison; over six hundred have been through prison, while many homes have been sold to pay the military taxes, which are fifty-one per cent. of the whole taxes in Holland. De Light, the President of the International Anti-Militarist Bureau, has been arrested to prevent his propaganda.

"The police came to my bed-room door within five minutes of my arrival at the hotel; all day we walked about Utrecht with the demand on our hats 'Herman Groenendaal must go free.' A grand placard depicting a Dutch soldier standing over the prostrate body of Groenendaal, with Christ in the background asking 'Are you doing this in my name?' was being carried through the streets.

"In the evening five hundred people met in the Corn Exchange (in Rotterdam the night before there were two thousand). We breathed the No-Conscription atmosphere in the days of the Conscription Acts. Boeke, Giesen, Eckhard and Harinch demanded Groenendaal's release, and the liberation of De Light and the other thirty-nine.

"Only once when I said, for I had to speak in English, Giesen translated, that we were out against a system and not individuals, did the stern row of police officers unfold their arms, and turn to each other with approval.

"The enthusiasm was unbounded. Holland is entering into a big struggle, and they are looking to the English C. O.'s to help them. What are we going to do about it?"

HERBERT W. PEET.

FROM "THE FAITH OF A QUAKER."*

[In the reviews of John William Graham's book, printed in THE FRIEND some months ago, very few quotations were included. As there is so much quotable in the book, it was suggested then that we might print a selection of such passages. In the following this has been done.—Eds.]

The only true thought of God must be so simple that He cannot be escaped in the experience of ordinary human life, something close to elementary needs, and not to be banished by intellectual eccentricity, or by lack of knowledge, or of a perfect balance of character; it must be the very antithesis of that typical ecclesiastical utterance, rising again and again from the long procession of orthodoxies, "This people that knoweth not the law are accursed." There must be no law to be learnt before beginning to know the blessedness of the Divine touch. It must be revealed unto babes.—(Page 21.)

Quakerism was the last step in the great movement of liberation and illumination which began with the revolt from Rome.—(Page 80.)

Of all the great voices of the seventeenth century few, except that of George Fox, have grown stronger when faced with evolution and with modern scientific conceptions. We Friends meet these with joy. No destructive criticism of externals can really destroy a faith whose home is within, and a God from whom we cannot escape till we escape from ourselves.—(Page 98.)

The "Kingdom" of Christ is composed of Kings and Priests of the Church militant; and that Church is not an organization, nor a building. Its census is beyond our data, and its roll-call sounds further than Christendom itself to every race among whom the Holy Spirit vibrates.—(Page 117.)

The whole matter of luxury deserves continuous, earnest care on the part of Friends, particularly of the well-to-do. From that way lies the downward path, past many a primrose.—(Page 131.)

Self-reliance is attractive, but it is taxing also, and most people do not care to pay the tax. Think what it means to have no one to be relied upon to preach to you, no one to sing to you, no music in your worship, no aesthetic help in carved column or stained glass, no one to tell you what to believe, no creed to cling to, no sacrament to solemnize you, no clergyman to look after you in pastoral fashion. Every Friend has to take a share in all these things for himself. You must be ready to preach if inwardly called; to teach if you can, to visit the sick and the poor, to attend to all the extensive business of the Society. And a Friend's inward exercise makes no less demand. Silence must not be to him a time of idle vacancy, but of communion with perhaps no outward aid. The majority of men do not enjoy this. If there be excellences in Quakerism, let it be remembered that no excellence is cheap and not many kinds are common. The Quaker temperament is not the creation of a day in anybody. Pulpit oratory is impossible in a Friends' meeting, though our spontaneous and amateur ministry has about it a timbre which is all its own and makes a mighty appeal to what is good in the soul.—(Pages 165-166.)

The art of conducting life, the craft of conduct, has always had the first place in Friends' practice. For there is a fine art of living. It is achieved as other art is, by careful selection among possibilities. Low motives have to be eliminated, inferior ones put into cold shadow. The central subject, the meaning and purpose of it, must not be obscured. There is composition, light and shade, emphasis and careful detail.—(Page 171.)

The effect of lovely organ music, of anthems sung by white-robed boys and men, under glowing glass and carved organ screen, topped by trumpeting angels,—all this produces the kind of effect that nowadays loosely but inaccurately is called hypnotic. It raises the tension of the feelings; it draws away from the dull daily round of detail; it is beautiful and restful.

*"God is in all that liberates and lifts,
In all that humbles, sweetens and consoles."

*"The Faith of a Quaker," by John William Graham, A. M. Cambridge, at the University Press

But it stops there. One's favorite sins retain their hold. Render unto beauty of sense the things that are hers, but the things are not known by their fruits to be the same as the things that are God's.—(Page 179.)

We may [under Quaker practice] become narrow in sympathy, dull in intellect and feeling, harsh in judgment, bigoted in opinion, and victims to spiritual pride; more and more despising the judgment of the world over which we have less and less influence. Or, on the other hand, we may acquire a sensitiveness of perception, a delicacy of feeling, which comes from the sedulous purity of the ascetic who has refused to be charmed by the actress, or to build his amusement on the damaged life of a chorus girl. We may have an acute and direct sympathy with actual pain and need, because our instincts have not been blunted by too frequent vicarious sympathy with fictitious tragedy. We may preserve a clear eye for truth, because we have never allowed ourselves to get comfort from religious forms which meant nothing to us, and religious teachings which were incredible. We may be able to maintain a conscience void of offence, inasmuch as neither the drunkard nor (with some) the slaughtered beasts owe any part of their suffering to our actions.—(Page 184.)

Wherein lies the proper beauty of worship, the beauty of a simple Friends' meeting? It lies in fellowship, in communion in God, felt and authentically known, but disturbed rather than evoked by the organ pipes. Beauty is not put into the Quaker service; it comes out of it.—(Page 186.)

It is, again, costly and difficult to be an active and faithful Friend, and much cheaper to join in the elaborate ecclesiastical machinery which is provided for the public; but we claim that it wears well, and that it has for us a charm that we would not abandon, in comparison with which the ordinary worship of the churches is as moonlight unto sunlight and as water unto wine.—(Page 186.)

There is, therefore, no difficulty in seeing that the earliest Christian form of worship was, in manner and form, a Friends' meeting of the early enthusiastic type. (1 Cor. xiv.)—(Page 189.)

I think we had better divide the 250 years into two equal periods and say that up to A. D. 125 or thereabouts the Christian Society was Quaker in organization, and in the latter half—from 125 to 250—was non-conformist.—(Page 209.)

They [the early Friends] knew of a ministry whose outflow came so directly from God, reached from the deep in one heart to the deep in another, was so considerably independent of the will or purpose of the speaker for its initiative, and had so little to do with academic preparation, that for the preservation and exercise of that ministry they would arrange for meetings on a basis of silence, give liberty to all to speak, and wait for the result. The result has been the production for 270 years of a ministry which at its best, is the most potent weapon for good that I know of. It is like no other preaching in its combination of fervor and restraint, its complete absence of artificial eloquence, its possession of the weight that comes with sincerity. This is the ideal; but Quakers are no more ideal than other people, so that weak and even foolish ministry has always existed among us; cases in which men have not been able to forget themselves, and have given way to the airing of opinions; or have thought that the inward impulse to speak freed them from the intellectual trouble of speaking clearly and connectedly, and sitting down when they have done. Considering the wholly amateur character of our preaching, and that it is open to everyone under the impulse of the moment, it is marvellous that we have not fallen more than we have into weak rhapsody, wild theorizing, or mere garrulous boredom. That we have been preserved so much as we have, is due to the sense of discipline in our meetings, to the influence of a reverent and intensely critical congregation; in fact, to the restraining power of the Holy Spirit over the gathering.—(Pages 227-228.)

If we cease to expect the shy angel of inspiration to come and trouble the waters, and do not wait for her coming, she is apt to give us up, and cease her visits; yet congregations which are not happy without a sermon are likely to get what they want, in spite of that, as a matter of expediency.—(Page 234.)

When the souls of many sitting in silence are being oriented together the effect of the communion may be felt. The souls are in chorus if the voices are not. Each spirit collects itself, polarizes the scattered activities of the week, gathering the disturbed consciousness to one point, inward to the trusting place with the Eternal. Revaluation takes place. Trifles are seen to be trifles, though they may have excited us at the time. We take stock spiritually—throw away the rubbish, check our estimates, and gain peace at the end, it may be after stiff conflict with the natural man. Grudges and hatreds come up for judgment; and prayers for patience are put up. Often humility and penitence cover the whole man. We make contact each for himself with the Real and the Eternal, and thereby gain strength over temptation and sin. In the distractions of daily life, in the crowded multiplicity of detail, we may fail to see the wood for the trees. Here we are able to look at ourselves and look from ourselves. How superficial is the view that in silence there is nothing going on. This is what Friends call a living silence. Few can usefully practice such athletics of the soul for longer than half an hour. In a good meeting ministry often intervenes about that time—sometimes a prayer very early on is helpfully stimulating—and with intervals of silence the ministry of three or four may follow, often in unexpected unison of thought. Out of the silence rises the ministry.—(Pages 241-242.)

We do not know what the landscape may be on the further side of this bright gate into the eternal; we know little of His fronded palms, His golden pavements or the city set four-square; I reckon not much of these; but I mean just the same as those apocalyptic seers meant, when by their lips the sense of the Divine glory had to be told in such words and metaphors as they kept in store. Enough for me to know the beginning of the way; to hold one end of the golden thread reaching up to the Eternal Unity; to find that we have a faculty, an actual organ it may be, where God meets man—the one Holy Place or shrine which ever was or can be.—(Page 243.)

Our meetings are much more than a convenient plan by which the ministry of several may be substituted for the ministry of one; they are a well-considered provision for the silence of the outward, inasmuch as that is a condition for the inward to find a voice. Friends' meetings have never been a failure when there has been activity of the Inward Man.—(Page 244.)

Again and again, from all branches of Quakerism which retain its character, there is the testimony of ministers who go into meeting in physical weakness and weariness and mental helplessness, totally unable to produce a thought-out speech or address, only to find that they were made mouth-pieces of the trumpet calls of the Lord. How explain this if there is not a reserve within us, whence ministry comes?—(Pages 244-245.)

Words then [in vocal ministry] may easily run on beyond the range of the tidal wave, and then they only cast up broken and useless wreckage on the shore—second-hand material, old well-used utensils; they are offence to us. In mid-life and after, our danger is to speak too much, not too little. The elderly minister who remains brief and to the point is a glorious product of disciplined and chastened humanity. The instrument has been kept in place. There may be a man who speaks at great length, whose length is a measure of the greatness of this inspiration; but I have never met him in England or in America.—(Page 248.)

Personal success is poison if enjoyed at all. "Thou preached a fine sermon to-day," said the kind Friend in the old story, thinking to please. "Yes, the devil told me so before I got out of the gallery," replied the wise minister. The rather unthinking, though kindly remarks, often tendered after meeting, of "pleasure in what thou hast said," half compliment and too much in the outward, go through one like a stab. If they are acceptable to our intrusive self-love, they become dangerous. This desire for success, and for its tokens in acceptability and preferment, is the bane of all to whom preaching is a profession. But we Friends also need to be on our continual guard. I do not plead against grave, thoughtful, discriminating encouragement to faithfulness, and testimony to the value of the service rendered, offered to the man as a faithful steward. The minister must never try to make a fine sermon, or think that he has made one, or that he will not speak at all unless he can speak well. He must be a fool for Christ's sake. He will do no good till he comes to that and stays there. That is the expulsion of ego that the Lord may come in, and I believe we shall most of us have to keep watch on this till our lives end. We are emptied of self, but self returns.—(Pages 249-250.)

Let it not be supposed that any special intonation or mannerism accompanied ministry from the deeper source. To give or to intend to give impressiveness by intonation is a besetment of the Quaker minister. But not of him only. It has been frankly adopted by the users of liturgies; and is actually, in the form of organ and anthem and intoned prayers, a principal attraction to the churches around. Among us it is often due to mere nervousness. Sing-song rules the voice when the will cannot. This is probably why women to whom preaching is a greater effort than to men, often fall into it. It means a weakening of the instrument, we may all drop into it when saying a particularly difficult thing.—(Page 252.)

One soon learns to recognize the sensation that bids us rise, and with a prayer for selflessness, we rise and speak the words of the Father, our share of the apostolate of Jesus. Let us give no place to the fear of man, the public opinion of us personally. From man we have nothing to gain and nothing to fear. To some who read this I would say, put your strength into the ministry; let the life-blood of your spirits flow that way. The quality of our ministry cannot rise higher than the quality of our life and experience, but it may rise as high.—(Page 253.)

Pressed in the wine-press of trouble, it may be ours to pour out the wine of His consolation; the flame of our love may light other torches, and out of the tangled skein of our own doubts it may be given us to spin the clear golden thread by which our fellows may find their way to the feet of God.—(Page 253.)

Our disuse of sacraments is due to our distrust of the spiritual value of all ritual. The outward and visible sign which begins by promising to make more real and vivid an inward and spiritual grace, ends by obscuring it, by limiting it to the range of the outward sign, and finally by asserting that it cannot be enjoyed without the due ceremonial. We obtain in fact the conception of the validity of a sacrament.—(Page 254.)

The Lord's Supper as practised by Protestant Churches in the cases in which Protestantism has been able to develop itself fully, has been purified from any claim to be able to produce in a unique manner the presence of God. It is therefore free from all magical taint, as it is practised among English Nonconformists, and to some extent in the Church of England. It has become merely a memorial service, valued because of its historic continuity with the past, and because it is believed to have been ordained by our Lord. Doubtless it will continue to exist on these lines, even if the conviction that it has not been so ordained became general. Probably the strong words of the Apostle Paul about being "one body" with Christ and "discerning the body," would hardly be felt to be appropriate to this purified and simple ceremonial. Experience has shown that the line between the memorial service and the Eucharistic celebration has not always been easy to maintain, or even to draw, so that Friends still feel glad that they have inherited no such function at all, which, even with mild formalism, is alien to the inwardness of their faith. (Page 275.)

Our method of coming to a decision in a business meeting is that of a perfected and disciplined democracy, and I see no reason why it should not be imitated by other companies of people who trust one another. We take no vote. A subject is discussed, generally after a deliberate preliminary pause, and the "sense of the meeting," as revealed by the speakers, is then registered by the clerk, that is the chairman, as the decision of the meeting, and submitted by him as a Minute for approval or criticism. As all meetings are open to all members, this is, to begin with, undiluted democracy, but it is far from the counting of heads. The weight of the speaker is an important factor in the clerk's mind and so is his or her representative character. Thus the advantages of an aristocracy are obtained and the weight of leadership is felt. Where the speaking is about equally divided the discussion is further continued, so long as time allows, until some upshot emerges. Of course this plan cannot be worked without frequent recourse to compromise, and still more often to delay. Sometimes the issue is shelved on to the shoulders of a committee appointed to consider it, elected in open meeting, and therefore dependent for its representative character upon the sense of justice of those who call out names. This strangely simple plan works with a remarkable absence of friction and is a feature greatly prized among us.—(Page 295.)

It would be safe to say that the number of Friends who use their wealth for the purposes of display or of tyranny, or of excessive luxury, is few; and it may still more safely be said that in these few cases the time is not far away when these people or their children will leave the Society and nominally join the Church of England, as so many of the wealthiest Friends have done in the past.—(Pages 309-310.)

Proud separatist nationalism it was that killed Jesus. "He said He would destroy this temple in three days." To declare that God was revealed, not in any oracle, hoary and remunerative, but in the life of a working-man in Nazareth, a city which had never been named as holy, was indeed to bring light and freedom into a dim and oppressed world; and the oppressors felt it.—(Pages 325-326.)

Nevertheless, as surely as Christianity has so accelerated the growth of a moral sense, that it has very largely put down slavery, polygamy, torture, cruelty to the insane, to the criminal, to the child, to the woman, so surely we have Christ on our side in the war against war.—(Page 333.)

A Friend of the present day, faced with the outward suggestion and its inward echo that it is his duty to help to save his country from the danger of defeat, or even of conquest, has a long Quaker tradition behind him. He is no pioneer. We are deeply indebted to the insight of our forefathers in taking the initiative for us. But no tradition, however honored, will really be enough to resist the pressure of living conviction. Refusal to enlist must be based upon something more intimate than a Quaker or a Christian tradition. Men will take liberties with a tradition. Fading words of Greek manuscripts handed down through perilous centuries and copied into modern print, have not proved strong enough to withstand the flood of military feeling. We see that every day in the voluminous pulpit apologetic which defends war from the Christian standpoint, and in the strange refusal to grant validity to the teaching of Christ about the conduct of a man as a citizen, while admitting it in his private relationships. We must have something living to meet the living foe and happily we have that Living Presence. God has not left Himself without a witness. It is because we cannot defile the living Christ within that we cannot join in war. Our personality would be desecrated by its murderous servitude, because that personality has its birth and its home in the Indwelling God.—(Pages 302-303.)

I hold that Quakerism is nearer the beginning than the end of its special mission. There will always remain, and I believe there will in the days before us rapidly increase, a number of men and women who are religious, who believe in God, and know something of His communion, which they rightly identify with the love of man, who love Christ and wish to obey His commandments, but who see through every ecclesiastical claim, who are too sincere and original to appreciate a religion of routine, to whom theology has become extremely simple, but correspondingly penetrating in its appeal, whose religion must needs survive, if it is to survive at all, in friendly contact with history and science. The type of man I am thinking of is also ethically sensitive and original; he considers war a form of collective mental disease, and has transferred his reverence from all holy places to those temples of the living God, whom he sees, puny and dirty, and hungry, crowding the purlieus of our cities, or in weary dullness sitting all bound in the village public house.—(Page 417.)

A Friends' meeting well held remains the most interesting and stimulating form of worship yet devised by man. To one accustomed to the savor has gone out of any other similar function.—(Page 417.)

There is always at the fountain of my thoughts a picture of an ideal Society of Friends, such as I think indeed, with the faithfulness of many, might be seen in America and in England—quiet in ordered peace, permeating in unseen influence—working with the wisdom of the serpent the harmless plots of the dove's goodwill, but at times with a voice too that can be heard in the people's ears, not only persuading men to all good ends, but doing it with golden words—words of moderation toward opponents, and charity, even to ancient evils—a charity born, not of muddled good feeling, but of clear and sympathetic vision.—(Page 418.)

REPORT OF RUFUS M. JONES AND WILBUR K. THOMAS TO THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE, SEVENTH MONTH 28, 1921 (CONCLUDED).

FRIENDS' INTERNATIONAL TRANSPORT RESERVE.

We find that the Friends' International Transport Reserve is being run on a very satisfactory basis and that it is meeting our transportation needs in Vienna in a remarkable way.

(a) Conditions are becoming more normal in all the countries.

(b) The Friends' Unit must look toward withdrawing from the fields in the course of the next twelve to twenty-four months.

(c) The cars are all old and gradually decreasing in value.

We recommend that:

(1) The Vienna Mission estimate, as soon as the negotiations with the American Relief Administration are completed, the amount of transport required for next winter, and to select same, in consultation with the head of the F. I. T. R. this transport to remain the property of the F. I. T. R. and to be under the control of the Vienna Mission, the latter paying all running expenses, etc. The present repair shop will be retained for the upkeep of these cars.

(2) Charles Emlen Harris be head of the Vienna Mission Transport as well as of the F. I. T. R. and supervise the liquidation of surplus cars and spare parts.

(3) All proceeds from the liquidation to be placed on deposit in Pounds sterling or dollars, and retained at the disposition of the Home Committees.

(4) No more transport to be supplied to the other fields by the F. I. T. R.

(5) That Serbia, Russia, Poland and Frankfurt-am-Main be instructed to sell any cars they have at present belonging to the F. I. T. R., when finished with, and to remit the proceeds to the F. I. T. R. in Vienna.

COMMISSIONERSHIP.

(1) We are agreed that the present plan of Commissionership be dropped and that each Home Committee send an official delegation of at least two from each Committee to visit the fields and confer with the Field Workers. The next visits should be sometime early in 1922 and at least every six months after. These delegates should be thoroughly conversant with the problems of their respective Home Committees and thus able to advise with the Field Committees in regard to the future of the work, and to exercise such power as is delegated to them by their Home Committees.

(2) In view of the above we are agreed and have arranged that the Commissioner's Office at Frankfurt-am-Main be closed on Seventh Month 1, 1921. This, of necessity, means that the paper International Service must be discontinued, we therefore recommend that the London Committee begin publishing a news sheet of service work similar to the one now being published by Philadelphia, and that both news sheets be mailed to all field workers and all returned workers in both countries.

We recommend that the head of each field accompanied with one other worker be encouraged to visit other fields of our work as way opens for it. We believe that this plan would do much to promote the inter-relationship of the fields and would bring clearer insight and enlarged breadth of view to the work of each field.

We are deeply grateful for the many blessings that have attended us on this trip. We feel that our Heavenly Father has blessed us in the work. We feel that the friendships formed between us as we have worked together are part of the great blessings which have come to us personally.

With the hope that we may be better able to help in the directing of the Relief Work,

Sincerely,

(Signed) HARRISON W. BARROW,

CHILD KEPT SMALL TO FIT HER CLOTHES.

"I cannot allow my little girl to grow so fast. She is outgrowing her clothes and I cannot buy any more."

With these words a mother in the industrial district of Essen recently withdrew her small daughter of ten from the "Quaker feeding." She was one of the million children in Germany who are being rescued from serious undernourishment by the American food, sent over by generous contributions of Friends and distributed to the most serious cases.

She gained seven pounds! She needed those seven pounds badly. The doctor said she needed a few pounds more. But the mother said she couldn't have them. She simply couldn't afford the cloth to expand the clothes.

Cloth is very expensive in Germany when reckoned in German money. For the German mark, which used to be worth twenty-four cents, is now worth less than a cent-and-a-half. A cent-and-a-half simply doesn't count, when it comes to clothing a growing child.

The family lives in a high hill-town in the Essen district, where the big guns were once manufactured, but where now the implements of peace are being turned out. The little girl can look from her home and see the beautiful lights of the great industrial valley come on at night. The hill-top is fine for views; but it is a cold place to live in. It is a place where clothes are decidedly needed.

So the mother made her choice. She couldn't do anything else. She was very thankful to the good Americans for the food they offered. She was glad to see the little cheeks rosy and the little thin body fill out. But—there was no more cloth in the family, and if they could not fit clothes to the child, they would have to fit the child to the clothes!

The terrible need of clothes throughout all of Central Europe, due to poverty and the break-down of currency, has led the Friends' Society and the American Red Cross to combine in a clothing drive throughout the United States. Austria, Poland and Russia are even worse off than Germany. It is hoped that by winter time enough clothes will be forthcoming so that children who need food may not have to refuse it—for fear of growing too fast.

TRACTORS RECLAIM DEVASTATED AREAS.

Moving from place to place, and camping out by night in the fields where not so long ago the Russian and German armies camped facing each other,—the Tractor Unit of the Friends' Service in Poland has brought a whole war-ravaged district to self-support in one season.

And now that the harvest is practically come, and is plentiful in all the ploughed areas, this little band of eight chauffeurs, one cook and four tractors is going farther east to still more needy regions, carrying their message of peace and brotherhood over the trench-scarred land.

The new section chosen is the Volhynia district,—once the most fruitful part of the fruitful Ukraine, the granary of old Russia. But now this district has been crossed and recrossed by armies, and each army has taken the live stock, the implements and the ready food.

In one typical village, for instance, where 450 families live, the number of houses has been reduced from 240 to 10, and the pine forests in the neighborhood have been so splintered by heavy artillery that they cannot be used as timber. Horses have been reduced from 1300 to 40, and cows from 1800 to 60; and only 12 per cent. of the land is in crops, for there are no implements left to farm with.

How do they live? Well, some of them don't. But those who are hardest are still existing, in holes in the ground and in the abandoned dug-outs of the trenches. They eat potatoes when they can get them, and grass when they can't; and they starve. Yet only a little help with implements and seeds and this district may again become one of the most fruitful in Europe. The work which has just been completed by the Friends in the nearby district of Hrubieszow has shown that a whole countryside may be raised to self-support in only a few months.

When the Tractor Unit moved into Hrubieszow last spring on its mission of help, it announced its policy of ploughing first for the neediest peasants, three acres per man. This was planted with garden seed, oats and potatoes.

As soon as the emergencies of the poorest families were met, a conference of the larger farmers was held and a more extensive ploughing scheme was launched in which it was required that the land be planted to bread-crops to relieve the bread shortage. It was planned that the district should pay what it could afford. The peasants paid for the benzine used, sometimes in cash, but often in eggs. The larger farmers paid about twice as much as the peasants. Thousands of sickles and scythes were distributed, at about one-third the actual cost, while ploughs and harrows were loaned to townships and are now being bought with the proceeds of the harvest. Seed was also given, to be paid for by a return in equal amount at the harvest. This is now coming in and will be used to help the next needy district. By the policy of partial self-support the Friends aim to avoid pauperizing the neighborhood and also to make a little money go a long way! But with the Polish currency at such a low standard, none of these districts can really pay more than a portion of the amount required to reclaim them.

SHIPMENTS received during week ending Eighth Month 13, 1921—111 boxes.

Contributions for week ending Eighth Month 15, 1921—$8,850.43.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

THREE Friends of the Representative Meeting, Annie H. Barton, Walter J. Buzby and J. Henry Bartlett, were in Ocean Grove on the 18th to participate in a Conference of Ministers, and other representatives of those interested in the preservation of good morals, in favor of law enforcement (or new law, if necessary) against prize-fighting. Apparently there are laws enough to cover the case already in the code. The difficulty is in a weakened executive authority. If every Friends' family in the State of New Jersey would at once write a letter of firm protest against such evasions of good laws to Attorney-General McCann, Trenton, N. J., it would not be without effect. Another fight is planned (announced in fact) for Labor Day. The organizations represented at Ocean Grove are using every available legal instrument to prevent this. The time is ripe for an outburst of outraged public opinion. The governor may scout this, but chancellors and other executive officers may not do so.

The effort at Ocean Grove included public meetings afternoon and evening to marshal the facts and arguments and to arm righteous citizens against the sweep of the present tide of degradation. Dr. Robert Watson of New York City and Wilbur F. Crafts of Washington of the International Reform Bureau, were prominent speakers.

THE celebration of the centennial of Indiana Yearly Meeting on the 16th inst. has had wide-spread publicity in the newspaper press. The Bulletin of this city had a column and a half devoted to historical matter connected with the emigration of Friends to Ohio and Indiana. We propose to reprint parts of that article next week.

THE Public Ledger is offering prizes for essays on the most admired woman character of each writer. It is known that Elizabeth Fry has been chosen for one essay, and other Quaker women might very properly claim a place in such a classification.

FROM the Year Book we observe that Ohio Yearly Meeting will be held at Barnesville in regular course beginning Ninth Month 10th. We have heard of several Friends who have it in mind to be present. Edward T. Binns of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting has a minute of that meeting liberating him to attend.

NOTICES.

If the statesmen in conference (the proposed disarmament conference) will listen to something beyond the sound of their own voices, they will hear the murmur of spiritual waves beating in upon their council chamber and coming from the hearts of humanity. For all history, in its struggle forward through wars and racial rivalries, leads up to that conference and the future human family will be shaped for good or for ill by its decision of wisdom or folly.— Sir Philip Gibbs.

CRITICISM.

Archbishop Trench in that fascinating book of his (fascinating at least to a former generation), "The Study of Words," shows how easy it is for words to be degraded in their meaning by misuse, very much like "the depreciation of the true coin of the realm," until there is confusion "in the commerce of thought," and multiplied misunderstandings of the meanings and motives of speech. It is against such a depreciation in this good word criticism that we would record a protest. Not in the Society of Friends alone, but throughout the religious world one hears now with much frequency and fervor that "untold harm" is done by the habit of criticism, that the sensitive are repelled by it in their efforts for good, and that society in general is disrupted and the progress of the best causes hindered because so many yield to the seductive charm of so dangerous a practice. The results named in these pleas are real enough, sad enough, serious enough, but they are due to something that by no means deserves the noble name of criticism. The framers of our discipline called this baneful influence "tale bearing and detraction;" in a recent editorial by F. T. R. in THE FRIEND the expressions "shallows of gossip or sharp rocks of sarcasm" give a vivid description of what is really meant by the Quaker phrase and of what is so objectionable. This combination may further suggest to some George Meredith's observation that "gossip is a beast of prey who does not wait for the death of the victim he devours." Evidently in the recesses of depraved human nature (and perhaps more of us have such recesses than willingly confess to it) there is a tendency to defame our fellows, and to cast a shadow on good in which we are not personally concerned. Let us find the right name for such a sore malady even though our refined ears revolt at the resulting "plainness of speech."

What, on the other hand, is the real meaning of criticism which should put it apart from this abnormal sphere of human nature? Since the time of Aristotle, famed as the father of criticism, the meaning has been well defined. It is the art of appreciation. Its object is to discover excellences. If it discloses defects, it does so to emphasize excellences. No other one of the fine arts has so important and so necessary a function

In the domain of literature it is a well-known saying that a decline of criticism is co-incident with a condition of mediocrity. Strong, vigorous production in any field of art welcomes even the castigation to the "point of ten times perfect accuracy," to borrow an oft-quoted expression of the poet Horace. The golden age of English literature did homage to a school of critics, Dean Swift, Steele, Sterne, and others who were able even to use the sharper instruments of sarcasm and satire to good purposes. Certainly, we hear it said, but art and life are widely separated entities. Human beings even in their necessary relations to one another are not able to stand up and express themselves in whole-hearted service unless they are protected even from the expectation of criticism. We return to our original contention. It is fault-finding—the art of finding defects, not the art of finding excellences that does the lamented damage.

Even the most important and most refined of human relationships—that of friendship, demands criticism. Thus a recent writer has said with much force, "Friendship, to be worthy, must have place for criticism. Indeed, it is frequently the case that from our friends alone can we bear it. We know then that they are more interested in us than in our faults. It is because we are worth so much to them that they endeavor to make us still more worthy. It is no sign of friendship to slur over our shortcomings." Honesty of judgment in dealing with men is certainly one of the basic principles of success and progress in human society. The writer just quoted puts this point also in clear relief, "That due estimate is what is meant by real honesty of judgment. Too many people suppose that honesty implies fault-finding or constant insistence upon weakness and failure. It requires the really honest judgment to enable us to value the good qualities and the bad in the right proportion and to deal wisely as well as faithfully with our friends." Have we not all had some refreshing experiences with those who are capable of the "due estimate?" How under the light of their searching criticism, unsuspected qualities blossom out in those we have known well, and we are convinced that they have abundant resources for service! The real critic has justified the art of appreciation!

It would seem quite easy to specify two difficulties in the way of the exercise of the real critical faculty. First, it is an art—a high and difficult art. The average man and woman will not take the pains to learn even the first principles of the art. They practice it without knowledge or preparation. They have no skill, and do undoubtedly illustrate the danger of edged tools in untrained hands. But, secondly, most of us also do not appreciate how much we need criticism, how much we might be improved by it, how much our service might be enlarged if we accepted it in the right spirit. In a period of vigorous growth and progress when great motives impel us, when great aims lure us on, we welcome even the pruning knife. On the other hand, in a period of decadence we develop new nerves of sensitiveness, we become touchy and can go forward if at all only when the wind blows our way. In life as in art we must conclude an intelligent, deep-searching, but high motivated criticism is a most valuable instrument of progress. In this sense the great prophets of the Scriptures were critics, indeed in this sense our Lord was the greatest and best critic of all. He showed how the ax must be laid at the root of every corrupt tree. But He did much more than that—does for us now much more than that. He gives us the spirit of restoring love. If He wounds He does it but to heal. Nay more, if we in our thoughtlessness, our clumsiness, wound those we would serve, He will help us acquire a different method,—a method that will not belie our good motive, and will not grieve His good spirit.

CYRUS COOPER

J. H. B.

SINCE the above was written the following article on "The Call to the Ministry" has come to hand. Its concluding portion expresses very ably the need of considerate criticism in the highest service.

THE CALL TO THE MINISTRY.

JANET PAYNE WHITNEY.

The strength and the weakness of the Society of Friends lies in the Meetings for Worship. They are at once its inspiration, its pitfall, and its raison d'être.

The Peace Testimony is bound up with the roots of our belief. But we are not merely a peace society. Plainness and simplicity are dear to us, but so they are to all lovers of true beauty. The difficulty is to attain them, in these days of curt fashions, high prices, and hurried, jolly manners.

We are eager to be at work on the reform of the social order on Christian lines. But equally so are numbers of our fellow Christians, in other denominations and in none.

What have we that is different, individual, our very own, to offer?

It seems to me that it is our Meetings for Worship, with their deep wells of silence, their simple up-rushing of the Divine Spring through this imperfect fountain and that, their abandonment of self in a great corporate unity of search for Truth, of search for God, and in the humble endeavor to serve and obey that is the inevitable result of the Great Discovery.

Now there are those in membership with us, in mutual allegiance with us to George Fox in his return to the first principles of our Master, Jesus Christ, who hold that our Meetings for Worship are out-of-date. They call them "Silent Meetings" or "Free for All."

Both these names show that they have tremendously missed the point.

But it is not only missing the point that lies behind their mental and practical revolt from the Quaker tradition of worship, while still cherishing the name of Quaker.

It is that they find something lacking in the quiet meetings, an absence of fire, of freedom, of life. And they have blamed the letter instead of the spirit, the method instead of the soul.

They have therefore taken the easy way of changing the method, and call the result "modern" or "progressive"

Quakerism. It is, however, not a breaking away from tradition, but the substitution of a non-Quaker tradition for a Quaker tradition.

The fault they find with those who follow at once the Quaker tradition and that of the very earliest church is by no means to be lightly set aside. Neither can we convince them by words. They know the Quaker ideal. They know, even while they use the ambiguous phrase "silent meeting," that silence is not the aim but merely a circumstance of the pursuit of the aim. The aim is openness, like an open door. "Lift up your heads, oh ye Gates, and be ye lifted up, ye Everlasting Doors, and the King of Glory shall come in."

We want no barrier of arrangement, programme or ritual in the way of that great Entrance.

The words that from time to time break the silence of a live meeting should be the visible sign that the King has come in.

The higher the ideal the greater the fall from it. Critics say that the silence in the meetings is a flatness, the speaking uninspired, monotonous, and confined to a few. They charge that often one Friend, speaking regularly, will practically act as "pastor" to a meeting. Is it not better, therefore, they argue, to have one definitely set apart for this service and paid for his time, so that he can give thought, study and preparation to his sermons and produce a much more finished and taking discourse?

The Friend who speaks with unflinching regularity is not uncommon in our meetings at the present time. It is an individual mistake, the responsibility of which is partly shared by the meeting. Pastoralism organizes this mistake.

But the failure of the free worship, in as far as it fails, is a failure of the free ministry.

For this great practice to attain success, three things at least are necessary. The first is a wide-spread individual intensity of religious life; the second is a wise eldership; and the third a universal conviction of "a call to the ministry." The last I would translate as a conviction at every meeting attended by the individual that it is possible that they may be chosen that day to transmit, according to their poor ability, some message from God to the meeting, and that it is their business to be ready.

Some Friends go to meeting determined to speak, or at any rate that impression is conveyed by the regularity with which they feel themselves chosen to transmit some general truth—often the same one, from slightly different viewpoints—to the rest.

Some Friends go to meeting determined not to speak.

Each of these is a stumbling-block in the way of the other, and also to the Quaker ideal of the free worship. For each has made for himself a fixed ritual, the one of speech, the other of silence.

Neither of these can prove by the living present that the quiet meeting is not out of date.

"Are all apostles? Are all teachers? Do all speak with tongues? Do all interpret?" No. There are diversities of gifts. But the same spirit.

Speaking in meeting as such does not seem to me to be "a gift," any more than it seems to me credible that the "call to the ministry" comes only to the few.

To some, words come easily. Would it be right to consider that these were always more gifted, in the spiritual sense, than others to whom words come hard? Surely not. The gift merely of words is the least of gifts, the bottom of Paul's great crescendo in praise of charity—"though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal!"

The words that express a message in meeting must come not only from the head but from the heart. They must come indeed from the depth of the heart, from the deepest experience of the speaker.

Some may lack education, or time to read books. But where does God so meet and speak to the seeking soul as in life itself?

Were not the twelve apostles unlearned and ignorant men?

"Whoso has felt the Spirit of the Highest

Cannot confound, nor doubt Him nor deny:

Yea, with one voice, O world, tho' thou deniest,

Stand thou on that side, for on this am I."

Out of that experience, learned and unlearned, stand on the same level, ready-tongued and slow of speech, as possible channels for the message of God in meeting as well as in life.

"I would that ye all spake with tongues," says Paul, "but rather that ye prophesied."

His definition of prophecy in this context, as tendered in Moffatt's translation, is to address men in words that "edify, encourage and console them."

"I would that ye all."

"Scarcely I catch the words of His revealing,

Hardly I hear Him, dimly understand,

Only the Power that is within me pealing

Lives on my lips and beckons to my hand."

But suppose some day one tries to follow a dimly-apprehended call to speak and makes a great failure—fails to catch the words of His revealing, or to convey them to others in any coherent shape?

Is it so terrible to fail in a good cause? Should it make us fearful of trying again? Are we likely, weak and imperfect as we are, to follow the hard road of obedience to Christ without ever making a mistake?

Why are we so afraid of each other that it should feel worse to make a fool of oneself in meeting trying to obey the Master than to sit in quiet safety refusing to listen to the Inward Voice? Our forefathers went to physical torment through derivative multitudes. We are afraid even to risk a little criticism from our friends.

Is not this somewhere near the root of the matter? Do not our meetings need a change of heart rather than a change of method?

We have a responsibility and a message to our brothers who have tried the change of method. But it is a matter not of definition but of demonstration.

Would it help us to a richer and more widespread ministry if we eliminated the dreaded criticism from our midst? To remove a difficulty is not always to overcome it. But in this case it seems to me that the difficulty is irremovable.

We remind ourselves that the root meaning of to criticize is to examine carefully and minutely. Intelligent attention to what is said in meeting involves such examination. A natural social instinct involves the expression of the conclusions we arrive at to our friends and family.

It is absolutely necessary to our spiritual welfare that we separate the wheat from the chaff. Where is the message so perfect as to be pure grain?

By criticism we help each other to test the validity of our leadings, and to discover the faults of delivery which obstruct the channel of the Water of Life. Among the latter, wordiness is perhaps the chief. What a loss to the servant who desires to serve if his fellow-servants will not point out for his correction the faults they perceive in his service!

It seems to me that it would help our meetings more, not if we criticized less, but if we criticized more frankly and more lovingly. Criticism both given and received in the spirit of humility engendered by the sense of common service of the same Master would be bereft of its sting.

It is the final test of our democracy in worship. The individual is nothing. The welfare of the group, and the freedom of the Spirit, is all.

WESTTOWN, Pa.

INDIANA FRIENDS.

CENTENARY OF THEIR YEARLY MEETING.

[This is a portion of the article in The Bulletin mentioned in our last number. Evidently it is written by one well versed in Quaker history.—Eds.]

In memorial celebration of one of the most interesting migrations recorded in the early history of the United States the numerous body of Quakers in the eastern part of Indiana are engaged this week [the week of Eighth Month 14th] in marking the centenary of a denominational association which may be considered as a lineal descendant of Philadelphia's Yearly Meetings. Contrary to a common belief that the largest number of American Friends are to be found in Pennsylvania and particularly in and around this city, the largest aggregation credited to any State is contained in Indiana. There, according to recent estimates, about thirty thousand of the faith reside in small towns and rural regions, the valleys of the Wabash, Whitewater and Mississinewa containing the chief settlements.

These Indiana Friends are Orthodox, but, although they are not aligned with the Hicksites, they are perhaps the most liberal of all the Orthodox. They have a paid ministry, while music and song figure as part of their religious exercises, even though such evidences of churchly pretense and ceremony would have been held in abhorrence by the Colonial elders. Save for these outward differences, however, the Indiana Friends subscribe to the fundamentals of the Orthodox belief much as it is known and practiced here.

In Richmond, the county seat of Wayne County, where the centenary celebration is being conducted, many references will be made this week to the part which the eastern Pennsylvania Friends played in settling this part of Indiana. Their migration there was not made directly, but by way of Carolina, "the old North State" of Quakerdom, which was populated in part, prior to the Revolution, by immigrants from Pennsylvania. The rule of the Penns had hardly ended in this State before the movement southward began. From Germantown, Chester, Bucks County, Kennett Square and other nearby Quaker communities, as well as from the old city proper, emigrants made their way southward. Some settled in Virginia, while others crossed the line into Carolina and a few even went as far South as Georgia in search of fertile fields for cultivation.

The North Carolina group of Friends furnished the later migration that moved up the rough trails through the Cumberland valley, crossed the Alleghenies and moved westward through Ohio to settle in the new State that had been formed out of the Indian Territory shortly after the close of the War of 1812.

In the South and Middle West one may note the transplanted names carried by these migrating Quakers who braved the dangers of the frontier and succeeded in making a peaceful penetration into the forest lands of warrior tribes of redskins. The oldest settlement in Bladen County, North Carolina, is named Carver's Creek, after a Bucks County Friend who settled there in 1740. Names like New Garden and Springfield in North Carolina commemorate earlier settlements in Pennsylvania. The same names are found again in the regions settled by the Friends in Indiana, and in the neighborhood of the prosperous and well-kept city of Richmond, just across the Ohio border, place names such as Germantown, Abington, Quakertown and Chester carry a familiar sound to Philadelphia ears. Other names, like Raleigh and Randolph, serve to commemorate the Carolina migration which moved westward in search of a new Canaan. The immediate cause of that movement was the deep-seated antipathy to slavery which has always characterized the Friends in this country and which was manifested by the resolution adopted by a Germantown group within six years after William Penn's arrival in this country. As the foremost Meeting of the early American Friends, the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting controlled the development in the South, and some meeting places, such as their place of worship in Charleston, were owned by the Friends in this city.

"To root our being in Christ is worship to the uttermost; and yet that is what we must needs do if He indeed proves Himself the root of our truest life."—W. BLAIR NEATBY, in "The Message of Jesus."

Years before the Quaker pioneers had penetrated the Middle West. Thomas Beales, one of the Pennsylvanians who had been the first settler at New Garden, in North Carolina, had made an adventurous journey westward and gained the distinction of being the first white emigrant to settle in Ohio. Later on another Pennsylvanian, David Hoover, traveling from the South, had crossed the Indiana line, and was the first white man to settle in the section north of the present town of Richmond.

First as a small trickling stream, and later as a flood tide that swept whole communities of Quakers from the South to the West, the migration from the South, in search of a new land where slavery was unknown, began. Old Quaker names like those of the Yarnall, Evans, Jenkins, Barrett, Pugh and Ballinger households were introduced into the family nomenclature of the new frontier, and in 1821 the first Yearly Meeting of the Indiana Friends was held. Since that year Quakerism has grown steadily in that State and in numerous well-kept communities of substantial and prosperous appearance are now red brick meeting houses not unlike those in the East, save for such innovations in matters of worship which the Westerners have introduced to meet the wave of evangelism which swept over the State as other denominations set up their houses of worship.

Probably the best known of their works in Indiana is the establishment of Earlham College which, with Guilford, in North Carolina, and Penn College, in Iowa, now ranks next to Haverford among the higher institutions of learning conducted by the Orthodox branch of the sect.

From this Indiana colony, John Woody went West to found the flourishing Quaker settlement at Whittier, California, named after John Greenleaf Whittier, which forms the centre of the largest local Quaker Meeting in America. To-day only a few scattered bands of Friends are to be found in the Southern States, where a number of institutions founded for the education and relief of the blacks are supported and directed largely by Philadelphians. New England's colonies of Quakers, once prominent on Nantucket Island and throughout New Hampshire and Vermont, have also dwindled greatly in numbers. But the sons and daughters of Pennsylvania who made the round-about journey to the Middle West now represent the largest body of Friends in any State with off-shoots reaching into Iowa, Kansas and Nebraska, and far-flung branches on Puget Sound, so that when Indiana's Five Year Meeting assembles it brings together Friends from Maine to Oregon, representatives of thirteen widely scattered States, assembling as descendants of the pioneers who started two centuries ago from the shores of the Delaware to blaze new trails to the South and West.

SILENCE AS A MEANS OF GRACE.

GEORGE HODGES.

Late Dean of the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass.

My soul is silent unto God; of Him cometh my salvation. (Ps. lxxi: 1.)

[NOTE.—By way of Toronto, Canada, the article with the above caption has come into our hands. It appeared in The Churchman of Sixth Month 25th. Dr. Hodges is known to some of our readers as an inspiring teacher. We shall copy enough of his article to show how he illuminates the subject of silence. He is not, however, an authority on some points of Quaker history. The paragraph exonerating churchmen from the seventeenth century persecution, is only true within very narrow limits.—EDS.]

The word salvation, so often connected in religion with escape from the pains of hell, is here used in a much larger meaning. It signifies the good health of the body, the mind, and the soul, the fit condition of the whole man. He who is saved, in this sense, is physically sound, mentally clear, and spiritually responsive to the presence of God.

This salvation, as the text says, comes from God; that is, from our association with the unseen order. We derive strength from invisible sources of supply. "They who wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength." The writer of the psalm found in his own experience that his strength was renewed by waiting upon the Lord in silence. "My soul is silent unto God; of Him cometh my salvation."

This truth, which has been in the souls of the saints since the world began, was re-discovered a few years ago by a group in New Zealand.

A clergyman of the Church of England had gone there to conduct a mission, to hold a revival. He was surprised to find church people fraternizing with Quakers. Up to that time he had been of the opinion that church people ought to fraternize only with Catholics, Roman, or Greek. It is a curiously perverse opinion, because Roman Catholics resent any such approach to brotherhood, and Greek Catholics are too far away to be brotherly with. Our logical and proper fraternization and co-operation is with Protestants.

As for Quakers in particular, there is no traditional hostility between Quakers and churchmen. The "priests," against whom George Fox shook his fist, were Presbyterians, and the Puritans who in 1660, in Boston, hanged William Stevenson, Marmaduke Robinson, William Leddra, and Mary Dyer for being Quakers, were Congregationalists.

Anyhow, for good or ill, there they were in New Zealand holding Quaker meetings in the Episcopal Church. The visiting parson from the Church of England attended the meetings and was converted. After long experiences of services crowded with sound, filled to overflowing with the unceasing voice of organ, choir and minister, he entered into this serene silence, and discovered for himself, with all saints, that silence is a means of grace.

He returned to England and preached the saving power of silence. They began to have silent meetings in London; then in other places. The missionary of silence came over here and preached in Boston, in the cathedral. He took his text from the book of Job: "There was silence, and I heard a voice." Quaker meetings began to be held in the Cathedral, in the gallery over the west door, conducted for the most part by Quakers, but attended not by Quakers only, but by church people who found that silence—social silence—is a high privilege, and sought to share it with their brethren. A book was written called "The Fellowship of Silence;" and, a few months ago, another, called "Fruits of Silence." In Lent, in Los Angeles, the bishop distributed one of these books among his clergy. Thus the impulse crossed the continent, and moved the souls of churchmen on the coast of the Pacific.

The devout custom is commended to our use by the fact that it is the further application of a spiritual exercise with which we are acquainted. It has long been taught in our Communion, in the observance of Quiet Days, in the habit of meditation, in the privilege of the open church, and in the spaces of silence which enter into the service of the Lord's Supper. It is an old truth with a new emphasis. Our brethren in many places, in the midst of a world never so filled as now with discordant noises, are finding peace in silence, and not peace only, but strength. In a social silence, not as individuals, but as members of silent groups, in a fellowship of silence, they are finding refreshment for their souls.

It was early discovered in the progress of the movement that it offered a new approach to Christian unity.

Endeavors have been made in the past to arrive at Christian unity by the way of controversy; but without the least success. Endeavors are now being made, much more hopefully, to attain to Christian unity by the way of conference. But conference will prove no more effective than controversy, unless it is entered into in a right spirit.

The history of our ecclesiastical divisions discloses the fact that the differences—especially at the beginning—were not so much ecclesiastical or doctrinal as psychological. The progressives could not get along with the conservatives, because the conservatives were so arrogant; they were scornfully contented, and persisted in denying that there was anything to arbitrate. The conservatives, on the other hand, could not get along with the progressives because the progressives were so impudent; they irritated their opponents by claiming to be their intellectual superiors, they implied that all conservatives were either obstinate or ignorant. In the critical period of every division of the Churches the two sides were prevented from agreeing, not so much by irreconcilable difference of opinion as by personal dislike. There is some truth in the saying that no man was ever condemned for being a heretic, but only for making himself disagreeable.

The advantage of silence as an approach to unity is that it minimizes the hindering differences of temperament, and leaves no room for the annoyances of speech, and magnifies the necessary things. All that divides is set aside. All the pride of controversy, all the eagerness of conference, all the bonds of old tradition, all the lesser loyalties, fall for the moment into the oblivion of this blessed silence, and they who by infirmity or temper or by imperfection of speech have disagreed meet in sympathetic brotherhood in the presence of the Divine Father. They are spiritually prepared to come in a better understanding.

It was found also that the silent meeting not only opened a new approach to unity, but widened and deepened the definition of grace.

Grace has often been so defined as to seem an ecclesiastical blessing, which is to be had only in the Church—only in the "True Church;" that is, by means of the Sacraments which are administered by those whose authority is by apostolic succession. This is the theory which found expression in the famous formula: "No salvation outside the visible Church."

The difficulty with this definition is that it is contradicted by the facts. If by grace we mean the blessing of God, the help of God, we know by experience that it comes not only in the Sacraments of the Church, but in a thousand other ways. God helps and blesses us by the benediction of good books and good friends, by all the uplifting influences which affect our lives. All our endeavors to live aright bring us into sacramental privileges. He who is baptized is born of God, yes, and St. John says: "He that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God." If we come devoutly to the Holy Communion, the Lord dwelleth in us, yes, and St. John says: "If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and His love is perfected in us." We perceive also by observation that the grace of God is independent of all our ecclesiastical arrangements. It can no more be confined by rubrics and canons than the universal air can be confined by doors and windows. Shut the church doors, provide the church with windows which cannot be opened, and the effect is not to keep the good air in but to keep the good air out.

To some of the church people who entered into the use of silence as a means of grace these obvious facts came as a surprise. They had honestly believed—in the sense in which we believe things without thinking much about them—that the Sacraments are not only generally but particularly and individually necessary to salvation. And as they were so thinking they came into acquaintance with the Quakers, who have no Sacraments at all. Without Sacraments, they were living lives of grace. The fact necessitated a larger definition of grace, and a wider understanding of what is meant by the family of God.

This does not mean any belittling of either Sacraments or orders. It means an enlarging of our understanding of the free and universal grace of God. God ministers to the souls of men in many ways. Praying helps, and preaching helps, and Sacraments help; so also does silence help, wherein prayer and preaching, and sacraments, and ministers, and churches are for the moment set aside, and the soul enters devoutly into the Divine presence.

Another result has followed the use of silence as a means of grace. Not only has it offered a new approach to Christian unity, not only has it widened the definition of grace, but it has quickened the sense of the spiritual value of the church building.

Let us confess that we have been too eager to occupy the time. We have been too desirous to have something happening every minute, from the entrance of the first worshipper to the exit of the last. The organ must be playing, the choir must be singing, the clergy must be reading, or praying, or preaching, every minute. We have driven silence out. We have left no place among our rubrics for the word: "Be still, and know that I am God." We have made it difficult for anybody to say: "My soul is silent unto God: of Him cometh my salvation."

QUAKER PERSECUTION.

No denomination so amazed and perplexed the authorities as the Quakers. It was their boast that their worship could not be stopped "by men or devils."

In a meeting of Lutherans or Episcopalians or in a meeting of Presbyterians, or Independents or Baptists or Socinians, there is always some implement or set of implements on which all depends, be it the liturgy, the gown or surplice, the Bible or the hour-glass, remove these and make noise enough and there can be no service. Not so with a Quaker meeting. There men and women worship with their hearts without implements, in silence as well as by speech.

You may break in upon them, roar at them, drag them about, the meeting, if it is of any size, essentially still goes on till all the component parts are murdered.

Throw them out at the doors in twos or threes, and they but re-enter at the window and quietly resume their places. Pull their meeting-house down, and they re-assemble next day most punctually amid the broken walls and rafters.

Shovel sand or earth down upon them, and there they sit, a sight to see, musing immovably among the rubbish.

This is no description from fancy, it was the actual practice of the Quakers all over the country. They held their meetings regularly, perseveringly, and without the least concealment, keeping the doors of their meeting-houses open purposely, that all might enter, informers, constables or soldiers, and do whatever they chose.

In fact the Quakers behaved magnificently. By their peculiar method of open violation of the law, and passive resistance only, they rendered a service to the common cause of all the Nonconformist sects, which has never been sufficiently acknowledged.

DAVID MASSON.

O LET ME STILL BELIEVE.

O let me still believe that love will win
The last redoubts of evil! Passions rise
Like mists to shut away the tranquil skies;
Fear walks the verdant earth and strews therein
With every step the dragon teeth of sin:
The righteous perish; honor in dungeons lies;
Greed spreads her net of subtle treacheries
Wherein the wars that rend the world begin.
Still will my heart believe, in spite of these Corruptions and calamities, that man
Moves on to truth and ever-widening good,
Winning by scarce perceptible degrees
His soul's purgation, till the heavens span
A universe of peace and brotherhood.

—LESLIE PINCKNEY HILL, in the Public Ledger.

This is why we sometimes find more honest appreciation of Jesus outside the ranks of His professed followers than within them. As of old He appeals to the multitude. To-day as then they may say to those who arrogate to themselves the right to judge because of official position or of learning, "Well, this is astonishing! You do not know where he comes from, and yet he has opened my eyes!" If this man were not from God he could do nothing. That must ever be the real test. When He has opened our eyes, we know. Our testimony should then be directed to letting the whole world know His power.—G. CURRIE MARTIN.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

SALOONS hurt all good business and help all bad business. Prohibition helps all good business and hurts all bad business.—W. E. JOHNSON.

IN my opinion alcohol is not needed in the treatment of any disease, says Dr. Victor C. Vaughn, Dean of the Medical School, University of Michigan.

I BELIEVE that alcohol has no important use in medicine, says Dr. Richard C. Cabot, Harvard Medical School, Boston, Mass.

BEER has no medicinal value, says Dr. C. W. Saleeby of England. He says also, "Prohibition is making America safe for motherhood and children."

MORE persons bitten by snakes die of acute alcoholism, because of the alcohol they take to offset the bite, than die of snake-bite, says Dr. Horatio C. Wood, Jr., of Philadelphia.

TWO HUNDRED physicians of the United States attached their signatures to the following declaration which was presented at a hearing before the House Judiciary Committee in Washington:—

"To Whom It May Concern: The undersigned physicians of the United States desire to place on record their conviction that the manufacture and sale of beer and other malt liquors for medicinal purposes should not be permitted. Malt liquors never have been listed in the United States Pharmacopoeia as official medicinal remedies. They serve no medicinal purpose which cannot be satisfactorily met in other ways and that without the danger of cultivating the beverage use of an alcoholic li., or."

WHAT THE DRUGGISTS SAY.—"The executive committee of the National Association of the Retail Druggists of the United States desire to place on record their conviction that the manufacture and sale of beer and other malt liquors for medicinal purposes should not be permitted. Malt liquors have never been listed in the United States Pharmacopoeia as official medicinal remedies."—ATTEST. SAMUEL C. HENRY, Secretary.

THE Anheuser-Busch Brewing Company, Inc., of St. Louis, Mo., prior to the passage of the Prohibition Law, was the largest brewing concern in America, if not in the world. Under a somewhat different name the Company is now engaged in other lines of business. Some impressive statements were made before the House Judiciary Committee by their official representative, Oliver T. Rummors, in connection with the Supplementary Dry Bill. He said, "You know, and I know, that the interpretation of the law permitting the sale of beer for medicinal purposes will result principally in the sale of beer at outrageously high prices through restricted channels to the healthy and not the sick. We deny that there is any emergency demand for beer for the sick. The cereal beverages manufactured by Anheuser-Busch in strict compliance with the law, contain 20 per cent. more of the soluble substances from which they are manufactured than the average good beer brewed in the United States. If beer is good for the sick, our cereal beverages are better. There is, therefore, no excuse for the manufacture or sale of beer for medicinal purposes. If the patient needs alcohol, the physician can prescribe it. If he needs a tonic he can get that without alcohol. All this can be done and the dignity and sanctity of the law preserved."

A BUSINESS man from Sheffield, England, Alfred Peters by name, after visiting this country "with eyes wide open," according to his own statement, says, in citing reasons for this country's success, "Whatever the new-papers or letter writers say, I found Prohibition a very real thing. I talked with the heads of works who had bitterly opposed Prohibition and fought it tooth and nail. Now that it has come and they see their work people better dressed and with more comfortable homes, with better food and more happiness, these employers are strong believers in Prohibition."

"BREEDING PROSPERITY" is the heading of an article in Forbes Magazine by our distinguished statistician, Roger W. Babson. In his list of ten reasons why he considers this country to be fundamentally in good condition, his second reason refers to Prohibition as follows:—

"Prohibition is a great factor for prosperity, the importance of which is not fully realized. Previous to July, 1919, about three billion dollars a year was being spent by people of this country for drink. About 20 per cent. of this money has gone into the savings banks; but the balance has gone into building homes, buying merchandise—raising the standard of living. Whether 100 per cent. Prohibition has come to stay indefinitely I do not know, but it surely must be as much a factor for good business during the next few years as it has been during the past two years."

MORE INSPIRING AS TIME PASSES.—Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes assures us that the law will be enforced with increasing success. He says, "Picturesque stories can and are being written about the activities of what the reporters call 'rum runners.' But the truth is that prohibition now is pretty tight throughout the United States considering that enforcing the Volstead Law involves helping the American people put across the most gigantic moral reform ever attempted. I am perfectly aware that it is sometimes not difficult to buy what passes for liquor. Nevertheless, those who believe in and are helping to enforce the prohibition laws are justified in feeling the glow of satisfaction that comes from success. That success is going to be more and more inspiring as time passes."

SENATOR PENROSE is quoted as saying emphatically that the Prohibition Law will be enforced in Pennsylvania.

IT is the enforcement of the law, not the lack of enforcement, that is worrying our "wet" friends.

DEATHS from alcoholism will soon be a thing of the past, according to the statistics compiled from the weekly reports of the Board of Health of the city of New York by the Scientific Temperance Federation of Boston. The published data shows that deaths attributed to this cause have fallen off quite regularly from 687 in the year 1916 to a total of only 98 in 1920.

THE CAMPBELL-WILLIS BILL, prohibiting the prescribing of beer as medicine and otherwise amending the Volstead Act, passed the Senate by a vote of 38 to 20. The wet forces, however, succeeded in compelling the adoption of an amendment providing a fine and imprisonment of one year for any agent engaged in the enforcement of Prohibition who shall search or attempt to search premises without a warrant. Opinion differs among prohibitionists as to the wisdom or danger of this provision. Representative Volstead, author of the original bill, is not opposed to it. He said, "Federal officers can get evidence in other ways. The section of the original act prohibiting the manufacture of liquor with alcoholic content of more than one-half of one per cent. is still in force."

The daily press of Philadelphia, excepting only The North American, publishes little that is favorable to Prohibition and much that is unfavorable. Public sentiment grows in the direction of public attention. It is lamentable that such organs of great influence as the paper most read by Friends should present this important subject from the viewpoint of Lord Northcliffe rather than that of forward-looking Americans who know that Prohibition is succeeding, and are helping the movement rather than throwing obstacles in the way of its greater success.

EXTRACTS FROM AN EDITORIAL IN The North American OF EIGHTH MONTH 17TH.—You talk of the nullification of these laws as though it were something of small importance, rather admirable, in fact; whereas it's about as deadly a move toward national disorder as could be thought of. . . . There are no reservations about these laws. They are just as sacred as those that protect life and property and the orderly existence of society. They are backed by the same power and have the same validity. In your little scheme of nullifying Prohibition you've got to nullify first the authority of the commonwealth, its laws and its courts. . . . Now you may think you can pick out one law to defy, and leave the rest unimpaired, but I don't. And you won't either if you take a horizontal look at the proposition. In repudiating and discrediting one law, you cast discredit on all laws, for if one part of the population sees fit to break a law it doesn't like, it won't be long before other classes assume the same right. . . . A systematic defiance of law strikes at the very heart of government. . . . Popularize the idea that dislike of a law justifies defiance of it, and where are you heading? Pretty dangerous doctrine!

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

IDLE WORDS.—"I want to tell you something that happened at school to-day, Cousin Sue," said Nettie; "although I know you won't approve of it, and will say it was unkind."

"There is a girl whose name is Jane Hustin, who is one of the greatest flatterers I ever knew, but who always has something disagreeable to say about you if you are out of sight; and so the girls determined to give her a lesson, and four of those she is in the habit of making the most fuss with hid themselves in a closet, and the others stood just beside the door of it waiting for her to come downstairs."

"When she did they called her to join them, and began talking about the girls that were hidden, and then I just wish you could have heard her abuse them."

"Mary was proud and stuck up, and Susie was deceitful and not to be depended upon, and Kate was rude and unladylike, and Clara was selfish and mean."

"She did not say all of these things at once, you know, but little by little as they led her on by questions, and she had ever so many little anecdotes to tell to prove what she said; when, just as she was in the middle of one of them, the closet door opened, and first Mary, and then Susie, and then Kate, and then Clara came quickly out, each making her a low curtsy as they passed."

"Nobody said one word, but her face was a sight to look at; it turned, first white and then red. I never saw anyone so embarrassed in my life."

"I really pitied her, although I thought it served her right. Now, don't you think it did?"

"It was a severe lesson," answered Cousin Sue, "and I trust it will do her good, although, as you supposed, I cannot approve of the way it was taught."

"I think it was a mean trick. But I hope the lesson will not be to her alone. Have you, my darling, never spoken words of another you would not wish her to hear?"

Nettie blushed a little. "Well, yes, of course, sometimes; everybody does."

"Then, in condemning Jane, remember, 'With what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged'; and remember, too, that we are to give account for every idle word. Both thoughts should make us very careful how we speak."

"But I thought that idle words meant the words that were not religious, careless talk about everyday affairs."

"No; there is much conversation that is not really useful, that may be perfectly innocent. Idle words are the unkind words that wound another—words that convey a wrong impression of another; words that dwell upon the faults of another; irrelevant words; deceitful words; words that hold up another to ridicule, or are calculated to sow discord. These are the words of which we are to give an account, and every one is recorded on God's book of remembrance, and will be revealed at the last day."

"If poor Jane was so overwhelmed with shame and mortification to-day, when suddenly confronted with her playmates, what will be our state of mind when all the evil we have wrought to others by the thoughtless, idle words we have spoken is brought to view in the presence of God and all the holy angels?"

"We have need, dear Nettie, to pray very earnestly the Psalmist's prayer: 'Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth; keep the door of my lips.'"

BARBARA FRIETCHIE'S BIBLE.—One associates with the name of Barbara Fietchie the tattered flag that was allowed to flaunt over the Confederate host passing through Frederick, Md. There was another relic treasured with the flag by the dauntless woman till her death, her Bible. In fact, the Bible was the chosen resting place of her precious flag, kept there during her lifetime, folded carefully to the size of the volume. This Bible was first owned by her father, Nicholas Hauer, and was printed in German by Christopher Sauer—one of the first five Bibles printed in this country. In the front of the book is a record of the birth in Germany, arrival in America, and residence of her father in Frederick, Md., written in German.

The present owner of this Bible, Wilhelmina Mergardt, lived in the house next to B. Fietchie, and was often over there, so that she had many opportunities to observe her at work with her Bible open before her. She would lean forward to read a few verses and turn to her work again, and later stop to scan the open page, with work suspended for a moment, and so through the afternoon. Plainly visible were the folds of the silk flag folded and placed carefully between the leaves.

W. Mergardt recalls that memorable day, Ninth Month 6, 1862, when Stonewall Jackson, turning and riding back to the little bridge, gave the order to spare the flag, and that two soldiers on foot were so excitedly trying to reach the flag that they did not hear the command until they had fired several shots at it.—Exchange.

HUMAN RELATIONSHIPS.

A MESSAGE FROM THE CHURCHES.

With two Social Order Queries claiming their attention this year Friends will feel more than usual interest in the following message from the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America.

"In an industrial age there can be no real brotherhood of man unless there is a brotherhood in industry. The relations of persons to one another is always a moral and religious question."

"The economic and industrial factors that condition the lives of men and women, and help to make them what they become, are therefore as much a concern of the church as any phase of their moral environment. An industrial practice that cramps and dehumanizes human things is a foe of religion."

"In the administration of a large industry, policies are frequently inaugurated which would not have been determined upon if their full human consequences could have been instantly visualized. The investors in an industry expect its managers, first and principally, to produce profits. The directors scrutinize the records, but rarely visit the workshops. In consequence, men and material are lumped together as commodities, labor is bought in the market like goods, and the personal equation is lost in a mechanical system."

PERSONAL RELATIONSHIP WISE.

"Democratic relationships in large scale industry do not necessarily pre-suppose a restoration of the early intimacy between employer and employee. Such intimacy is impossible in large plants, and where it actually obtains, it is by no means a guarantee of a square deal. Democracy requires rather that every individual shall have his point of view represented and shall have an opportunity effectively to register his will. What really matters is that the life interests of the workers should be the first consideration; not that they should be called by their first names. But where there can be added relationships of personal friendship between employer and employee the human possibilities of the situation are greatly increased. Significant in this connection is the fact, not widely realized, that, according to the most recently available figures, more than one-third of the factory workers of America are still employed in plants having fewer than 100 employees. The employers of these small groups of workers have superior advantages too little utilized for the promotion of fellowship.

"Political democracy leads to industrial democracy because a nation trained in school and church and state to democratic relationships, will inevitably carry these same principles into industry. The growing sense of manhood, and responsibility in the workers, tends in the same direction. There can no longer be satisfactory relationships under an autocratic shop rule, any more than in an autocratic state. Arbitrary control leads to class war, which is as contrary to Christian principles as any other war.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING.

"Democracy in industry must be realized progressively and is being steadily approached to-day in an increasing number of industrial establishments; collective bargaining with labor unions is an expression of the democratic ideal, so also are some of the various forms of Labor representation in shop councils. There are also democratic forms of co-operation by which Labor relations within a plant are handled as in a town meeting or a family circle. It is quite possible to develop such forms of association, without prejudice to those vital interests of Labor which are conserved by its own regular forms of organization, and to secure the real partnership between employer and employees.

"In order that the family of the laboring man may have fair opportunity, not only must life be safeguarded, but wages must be sufficient to guarantee a higher standard of living for the workers and to justify their aspirations for a larger life. There can be no doubt that our working people should receive a relatively larger share of the product of industry.

"Of course business cannot be run without an adequate financial return. The services of physicians, teachers and even of ministers, require compensation. But the primary motive in these professions is assumed to be service. A Christian society will try to put business under the same motive; it will purge itself of all ruinous competition and substitute for it a co-operation that preserves initiative and all the stimulus of competitive enterprise without its warlike methods.

SERVICE, NOT PROFIT.

"And the motive of service is not only entirely practicable, but it is the only salvation of business itself. The service motive will bring a spirit into industry that will minimize strife and selfishness and magnify fraternity and good-will. It will inspire production and tend to eliminate waste.

"With the profit motive controlling both employer and employee, each seeks to exploit the other, each looks upon the other with suspicion, friction grows between them instead of confidence, and industry assumes the aspect of war broken only by periods of truce.

"The operation of the profit motive defeats the practical purpose of industry—continuous, efficient production. If the service motive can be made mutual, employer and employee will learn to work together in mutual good-will and the wastage of strife will be turned into mutual advantage.

"The Golden Rule is the classic expression of all these ideas and of the spirit in which alone they can ever be made real. Without that spirit, the most careful system of organized relationships will be ineffective. It is a rule to be observed day by day, especially as new situations arise, and to be used equally by manager and men. These principles are as binding upon one group in industry as upon the other, and only in so far as they are recognized can industry achieve permanency and security. They will be found at last to underlie the social structure."

THE LONG PILGRIMAGE *

This is the title of the 1921 Swarthmore Lecture preceding the sessions of London Yearly Meeting. It is number fifteen in the series. These volumes make an impressive compendium of the Quaker message and mission in its available service to modern life. From the educational viewpoint they might properly be considered to "cover the requirements of admission" to a full understanding of our heritage. How superficial our understanding of this heritage is might be somewhat painfully revealed were we to ask for a show of hands of those who have read and pondered all of the fifteen. Sure it is that those who have done so would confess to one thing more. They would tell exultantly that they felt it a privilege to read some of the volumes frequently, and to pass them on to "seekers." Without wishing to indulge any invidious comparison, "The Communion of Life," "Human Progress and the Inward Light," "The Day of Our Visitation" and "Silent Worship: The Way of Wonder," would be in this high potency list. Two of the fifteen numbers are by non-Friends. With a discrimination and delicacy quite extraordinary they disclose some of the most important of the implications and possibilities of Quakerism. Truly it is shown as a goodly heritage! Were there no other evidence this series of books would convince the honest inquirer that Quakerism is not limited to a heroic past. It has a present and future.

The author of "The Long Pilgrimage" brings a rare equipment for his task. As warden for some years of Toynbee Hall he touched human life at all of its most elementary springs—saw the problems of poverty, of labor, of inter-racial commingling—knew the despair of the poor and the carelessness of the rich. As member of the London County Council he was obliged to face in a practical way the multifarious problems of the life of the greatest city in the world. As member of Parliament for some years, he had his hand on world affairs, and kept his mind and heart alert to the greatness of this responsibility. When all this opportunity is set against a background of thorough university training and pure Quaker conviction, when by nature as well as by training one has the best of ascetic and aesthetic gifts, there is little left to be said for equipment for the treatment of the subject, "Human Progress in the Light of the Christian Hope." The generalized form of the caption, "The Long Pilgrimage," at once suggests what might be mistaken for a pessimistic outlook. One reviewer has accepted this as the logic of the title. Nothing can be more definitely said of the essay, however, than that it is an admirable critique of the pessimism of Dean Inge and Professor Bury. It shows clearly that they have both used materialistic measures in their assessment of human progress. But the criticism is of the constructive type. It exalts the realities of a spiritual faith and life. There is one form in which this conclusion is expressed, "There still remain at work in the world the same forces of selfishness, cruelty and lust which marred the ancient civilizations of Greece and Rome; the battle against them goes on through all the ages. They may destroy again, as in the past, the fabric of material progress, but their waves beat in vain against the walls of the eternal city, the home of all those who strive to live by the light of its laws. In so far as there enters into our thought of progress some approximation to this idea of a gradual development on the plane of our existence, of the life of the unseen eternal world, the thought of progress is a true and helpful one, which mankind must hold fast so long as man is man."

Turning back from this conclusion, which is near the end, to the impressive pages of the book there are outstanding sentences and passages which our readers may like to have quoted.

"The good man's value to the community is out of all proportion to the numerical ratio of good men to bad. . . .

*"The Long Pilgrimage: Human Progress in the Light of the Christian Hope," by T. Edmund Harvey, M. A. To be had at Friends' Book Store.

In the long run the only human progress which is of ultimate value is that which expresses itself in the growth and unfolding of personality, and this is a progress in which the idea of time is an accident."—(Page 24.)

"But in the loneliness of human spirits there gleams a spark of Divine light, revealing not only our own weakness and our wrong, but the longing for what is better and higher, the hope of another and juster world. We are not left to be helpless in the dark. For those of us who dare to call ourselves Christians there shines forth the great light of the personality of Jesus Christ as the central fact of human history and for each of our lives."—(Page 20.)

"The prayer of true discipleship is present in the dedication of man's will to the Highest, in the unspoken cry of his deepest need, as he hungers for goodness and for right, which is to hunger for God Himself. Consciously or unconsciously all who put up this prayer share one common life. 'The seekers of the Light are one.'"—(Page 36.)

"In man is indeed a sacrament for good or ill for his fellows, drawing them down to evil or lifting them upwards towards the good, transforming them by the contact of spirit with spirit revealed through human personality. In this contact of personality with personality the barriers of time and space are transcended. We pass beyond the world of sense, and at moments at least we may be given a vision of some of the fore-courts of the eternal house, wherein dwell the enduring presence of those who live, because they live unto God."—(Page 40.)

"Thus Christ Himself is the message which we are seeking, and in the light of His personality our own lives and all life about us take on a new meaning. The face of nature is no longer dead and dumb, but lives and speaks to us in our need. Our fellows have a new dignity of infinite worth, for we have before us a vision of what man is meant to be, a saving presence at work in the world, redeeming us, as we turn to seek Him, from our baser natures, from the wrongs and failures of the past, that have left their impress so deeply upon us. His presence is there, like that of a great magnet, which polarizes the little fragments of iron around it, influencing and changing them even when still separated from it, but working upon them still more powerfully as they are placed nearer and come into actual touch with it."—(Page 45.)

"We need something more than to know the right and approve it. We need a cleansing, a renewing of our wills, which will affect the very centre of our being. This it is that the disciple finds, as he comes into the presence of Christ; and that transforming influence, supremely and uniquely realized thus, is present to some extent at least wherever any disciple who has entered into this communion lives and works."—(Pages 45-46.)

"The lives of those who are called Christians are to-day the only commentary upon the Gospels which many read. Can we wonder they look elsewhere for guidance? But the visible and undivided Church or fellowship of followers of Christ is not to be identified with any ecclesiastical organization or denomination. Its members are found in all of them and also outside any church or sect. Their unity is only imperfectly expressed when they try to realize their faith in thought forms, in creeds and formularies. It is seen in the lives they live, in the service of others, in the search for truth, in reverence for the as yet unrealized ideal, in that worship of spirit which alone makes prayer possible, whether it be found through form and liturgy or altogether without them. The true disciples are in fellowship with each other because they share a common life and, consciously or unconsciously, have communion with the spirit of their Master, who is the centre and source of that life; and their fellowship with one another will be deeper and stronger as that communion becomes more conscious."—(Pages 48-49.)

In addition to the above several other notable quotations are grouped under the title, "Toward the Divine Commonwealth." These will appear as a separate article. They reflect something of the view of the former warden of Toynbee Hall on the "Social Order."

RUSSIA'S FLEEING HORDE OF REFUGEES.

Nancy Babb has written from Germany telling of the conditions existing among the hordes of refugees from Russia which flood all the countries of northern Europe. In speaking of these helpless and hopeless people, the Literary Digest states, "A great army of Russians, a million and a-half strong, has invaded Europe, and a few stray battalions have even reached our shores. It is not Trotzky's "Red" host, bent on conquest, but a scattered army of refugees driven from their native land by successive revolutions and disorders, and seeking shelter in nearly every capital of Europe. Yet they are nearly as dangerous to the lands they have reached as an army of invaders would be. For the concentration of such large numbers of people, without proper food and clothing, is almost certain to lead to epidemics that may threaten the entire world. No existing relief organization or governmental agency seems to be responsible for these Russians.

"The exodus from Russia began with the rise of the Bolsheviks in 1917, and has increased in volume each year. There are now 300,000 Russian exiles in Germany alone, 65,000 of whom are concentrated in Berlin. Close to 200,000 are near Constantinople. There are 100,000 in Poland, 15,000 in France, and 15,000 in England, with scattering groups in other countries. A pitiful feature of the situation is the large number of children among them who are destitute and without hope for the future."

"It is not a time now to blame these poor unfortunates for their condition," writes Nancy Babb from Germany, in describing the refugee camps that surround Berlin. "During the past six weeks I have visited the Russians in their barracks, in their boarding-houses, in their schools and workshops and sweat-shops. But these refugees do not need the usual relief of food and clothing, but, instead, they are unanimous in asking for employment. 'We want employment and not charity,' is the popular cry. People of the nobility, officers of the army and peasants may be seen seated side by side in the workrooms and shops painting little souvenirs, making lace, carving woodwork, while in the lobbies there is an endless line of applicants for work.

"Not one-tenth of them can hope to get employment. Those that do work receive less than twenty-five cents per day, and live mostly on black bread and margarine, and a scant supply of vegetables. Their one room, if they are lucky enough to have it, must serve as the entire home for the family.

"Most of the peasants are housed in barracks, with sometimes as many as thirty-five sleeping in one room. Many of them have been refugees since the beginning of the war in 1914 and have gone back again and again to Russia only to be forced out by some new army. They have no regular occupation and are only a burden to the Germans, who are making a desperate struggle to feed thousands of them. But with most of the German men themselves out of work it is impossible to find employment for these wretched hordes. But employment of some kind is what these refugees must have. They have plenty of time to work on individual work, but can find no raw materials. Idleness is eating into their souls as much as starvation is eating into their bodies.

"The little children excite the most sympathy. They have been dragged from place to place for four or five years and some who are even eight and nine years old have had no schooling of any kind.

"I went away distressed but wondered if there were not many Americans who, having once understood this sad condition, would not be willing to have some of their funds used to make employment for these people as well as for food and clothing."

THE PLIGHT OF RUSSIAN REFUGEES.

"While I was in Poland I saw a good deal of the tragedy of the refugees from Russia," writes Emily Seaman in a recent letter. "Their plight is terrible, much worse, I think, than that of the Polish refugees, for these people have no country, no home, and apparently no future. There are a hundred thousand of these unfortunates in Poland, and their numbers are increasing since the coming of the famine in Russia. This is the greatest problem, outside of Russia, in Europe today. The relief must be taken up in a big way, for the suffering is very great."

THREE BABIES ARE BORN AND DIE IN A DUGOUT.

"In this place my three babies died," said a Polish peasant woman to the Housing Director of the Friends' Mission in Poland, according to a report just received in Philadelphia. She pointed to the dugout near which she stood, a piece of an old trench roofed over with poles and straw and mud, which for six years had been the only shelter for her family.

The Director inquired the age of the children. He was investigating the district in the hope of being able to help in the rebuilding of houses.

"One year, nine months and seven months," answered the mother. "They were born and they died here."

It was a filthy hole in the ground. The wonder is that the mother and father and one child were still living. But the family was moving out of it. For the Polish Government had supplied wood and the Friends' Mission had supplied nails and cement and bricks, and the peasant had sawed the logs into boards and had built himself a house. They will be moving into it before fall.

This district of Sochaczew was in the direct path of the German advance upon Moscow, and the fighting raged over this district, destroying practically every village. When the peasants returned to it they had no implements, no money, no seed, no houses.

Little by little the district has rebuilt itself. Many of the peasants have been unable to build houses and barns, and have had to make mud houses with thatched roofs do for their families. The Government and the Friends together aid in supplying the peasant with the material with which he may build a lasting habitation, and in this way, the peasants of Poland are escaping little by little from their dugouts.

BREAD FROM PINE-NEEDLES AND NETTLES.

"Refugees here are chopping up pine-needles with potato peelings and nettles, mixing this with water, and thus baking their bread," writes Mary Middlemore under date of Sixth Month 22nd. "All the food the refugees have left now is potatoes. Two-thirds of the population of the district of Drohiczyn can be said to be starving, and the country is saturated with malaria. The few horses are weak also from continued starvation. The population fled into Russia in 1916, and are only now returning to the land they were forced to leave. There are few children left alive, and in three weeks I have seen only one child under the age of one year.

"The walls of the old homes were in some cases left standing by the invaders, but near the railway along the road there is only here and there a grassy mound to mark for the returned refugee the spot that was once his home. In many of the fields there is a growth of brushwood four feet high to be removed before anything can be done. Few plows are left in the district, and the peasants use spades in their efforts to put the land into condition. One lad of eighteen I saw vainly struggling to dig up his land with a spade, though he had only the part of one hand left to do it with, having lost a hand and part of the other from frost-bite."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

In an article on North Carolina Yearly Meeting, held at Guilford College, the American Friend has this item:

Dr. L. L. Hobbs served the meeting again as Clerk and his presence in the chair aroused afresh a feeling of gratitude as we recalled that a year ago he was in a London Hospital in a most critical condition.

This item is clipped from The Friend (London). Gordon Bowles will be remembered in the Westown circle.

Gordon Bowles, son of Gilbert Bowles, of the American Friends' Mission in Japan, has been awarded a "diploma" from the American School in Tokio entitling him to enter an American University. The occasion was of special interest, as the four diplomas awarded were won by an American, a Russian, a Briton and a Japanese respectively. In the school sports, out of ten items, Gordon Bowles won first place in seven events and third in another.

SERVICE AND COST

PROBABLY no characteristic of Tannate is so outstanding as its durability and long life in service at hard work. The Tannate tannage produces a tough, pliable, elastic leather that withstands hard belting conditions considerably longer than oak tanned belting.

Longer service—enough longer to make the first cost unimportant—is the experience of a host of users of Rhoads Tannate Belting.

"... I do not believe that we have any really clear, convincing, dynamic word for to-day if we can only say that God is speaking in the hearts of all men, and leave it at that. There is One, even Jesus Christ, who has spoken to our condition."—Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin.

A MORTAL TO HIS SOUL.

Like a frail bird, shut in behind the bars,
My soul looks out, with wonder and with dread,
Upon the fair green earth, the sun, o'erhead,
The shades of evening, and the shining stars,
Observing man, and all he makes or mars;
So quick with life, so cold and still when dead,
Lofty and lowly sharing the same bed,
Careless alike of triumphs and of scars.

"Strange little Soul, why art thou singing so?
Where hast thou found the music of thy song?
Whence comes the spirit of thy noble rage?
And canst thou look upon Man's joy and woe,
And solve the mystery of right and wrong,
Thou, who hast always lived within this cage?"

THE SOUL'S REPLY.

"Poor Mortal, thou hast but a little span,
Soon thou shalt be among forgotten things,
But I am fed from far, by deeper springs,
That had their source before the earth began,
Set high above thy vision and thy plan.
Wondrous the message that my music brings.
There comes an hour when I shall use my wings,
And leave the vanities that trouble man.

"Death, who shall slay thee, shall but set me free.
Swift as the dew-drop rises to the sun,
Sure as the river floweth to the sea,
I shall rise upward till the goal is won
Whence this mysterious music comes to me,
Of God, and Love, and Immortality."

BUT ONCE I PASS THIS WAY.

A little sketch of Marcia Doan, entitled "In the Shadow," published in the "Conference Number" of The American Friend, concludes with the following little poem, written by Marcia Doan herself, and read at her funeral.—F. T. R.

"But once I pass this way,
And then—no more;
But once, and then the silent door
Swings on its hinges—
Opens—closes—
And no more.

"I pass this way,
So while I may,
With all my might
I will essay
Sweet comfort and delight
To all I meet upon the Pdgrim Way.
For no man travels twice
The great highway
That climbs through darkness up to light
Through night—
Today."

A HALF-FORGOTTEN PROPHET WITH A MESSAGE FOR THE HOUR.

After an extended period of corporate quietism, during which the only real activity was that of "concerned" individuals, there has come a time of stirring. Our "corporate responsibility" is to-day resting weightily upon many minds. We long to "share our message," and to be more efficient messengers. Committees are under appointment for studying every aspect of this problem and encouraging every effort that promises to be fruit-bearing. The "Yorkshire 1905 Committee," the "Council for International Service" and the "Central Literature Council" of London Yearly Meeting, our Philadelphia "Extension Committee," and the "Advancement Committee" of Friends' General Conference (Race Street) have their counterparts in other branches of the Society of Friends. The various Young Friends' Committees envisage a similar goal. That this movement is gathering momentum can scarcely be questioned by one cognizant of conditions.

In the deliberations of one of the newest of these special committees, it has often been encouraging to be aware of this high longing to serve better, to spread our message wider. We have been reminded again and again of the ardor of those "First Publishers of Truth" who went up and down in England two hundred and fifty years ago. But sometimes there has seemed a vagueness as to just what "our message" is, or just what our modern "publishers" should publish. Were each member of the committee asked to prepare a written statement on this subject, we should have a varied assortment, indeed. Certain ones of us would stress disproportionately some special matter in which we are particularly interested. Other replies would undoubtedly be rather intangible and vague. One is sometimes reminded of the zealous Ahimaaz, who to Joab's question, "Wherefore wilt thou run, seeing thou hast no tidings?" replied, "Nevertheless, let me run!"

Those who become "interested in Friends" frequently approach from widely different angles, and from widely differing motives. The present problem in Germany owes much of its complexity to this fact. Some welcome the quiet worship, with its absence of form and ritual. Others find in the peace position of Friends, both during the war and since, a powerful appeal. Some have come out of the churches, others from without the churches. Some have passed through a definite and profound religious experience, which seems to parallel, even in details, that of seventeenth century Quakers. For still others it is the spiritual liberty and the absence of credal formulæ and dogma that chiefly matter. I have named but the main categories.

As we face our responsibilities and problems, two things are obvious. A man who, for instance, is a conscientious objector to all war but who has nothing else in common with the Society of Friends, is scarcely ready to be received into active membership. In other words, with all our freedom from creed and dogma, there must be some large common ground for membership, or there can be no fellowship. Second, the First Publishers must have had a definite message to deliver, or their ardor would have set nothing afire but tinder, to flare up for an instant and leave things darker than before. What was their message then, and what is ours to-day?

This brings me at last to my real subject.

To say of a book, "it is a classic," is, we know, to rank it among the really best, and to put it, at the same time, on a high shelf to gather dust. We should all, if asked to mention the ten greatest names in literature, put Dante on our list—but have you ever actually read the Divine Comedy?

Similarly, in our Quaker microcosm, we acknowledge Isaac Penington to be one of the greater luminaries—but how many of us ever read him? To most of us the name recalls first the peaceful graveyard at Jordans, and then four bulky, dusty, octavo tomes, bound in full calf, with that half-pleasant, half-forbidding, musty, grand(athery) smell, which, in turn, connotes dim libraries, with a coal fire in the grate and a stack of paper "lamp-lighters" on the mantel, broadcloth "plain" coats with velvet facings, and cocoanut pie at Yearly Meeting time. Indeed, to read Isaac Penington aright, one would almost need to have a pair of eight-sided, iron-rimmed spectacles!

But is this estimate of him deserved? Try him, and you will see. A man who felt and emphasized the tremendous importance of "individual faithfulness" and who had a horror of all activity "out of the Life," i. e., performed in God's name but in our own strength, he still recognized so perfectly the need and place for group work, that I feel there is no one who, in this present period of group consciousness and group responsibility, can more clearly, deeply, and with more Divine authority, formulate for us the message that we long so much to spread.

Let us grant at the outset that the four volumes are forbidding. But we need not begin with them at all. Do you know the little book "Isaac Penington: Selections," edited by Henry Bryan Binns, and published by Headley Brothers, London? It is most attractively got up (in entirely unfor- bidding blue cloth), and its cost is inconsiderable.

Included in its modest 117 pages is, first, a most readable introduction, telling us a little of the man himself and of that "people" [the early Friends] "gathered from many sects into the freedom of the Spirit," whose was "the catholic communion of participation in the Divine Life and Substance" and in whose midst was "power, the Power which makes all things new and 'does away' the old Heavens as well as the old Earth."

There follows a valuable page and a half of "Chronological Notes," enabling us to understand Isaac Penington's life with reference to the times in which he lived. Then come the 93 pages of "Selections," mostly of half a page or less, only one, on "Bible Reading," being at all lengthy (thirteen pages). They are taken from the essays and letters, and grouped under the following nine headings

Concerning Himself and His Friends; Concerning Life and Power, Faith and Truth; Concerning Christ Within, the Light of Life; Concerning the Scriptures; Concerning the Seed; Concerning Love and the Way to God; Concerning the Church; Concerning Silent Meetings; Concerning the New Order.

Each selection bears the date of writing, also the volume and page of the Works (Third Edition, 1784), so that the interested reader may search more fully some subject that especially attracts him.

Isaac Penington, as H. B. Binns describes him, was one who "had looked for 'a mighty appearance,' 'a great manifest power;' and instead, had come to know the paradox of almightiness in that which seemed to him but folly and weakness—the little weak stirrings of life in the heart." "One long before had told of 'the sense of the power of an endless life being often upon him, which did affect many, breaking them down in great tenderness,'" and of himself he was able to say that "the life that I live is by the springing up of life in me, . . . for indeed I live not of myself, but by a continual gift and quickening of life in my heart;" and in another place, "this I wanted, the issuings forth of his fresh life, and lovingly to know where to wait for it, and lovingly to know it when it appeared."

For our message to-day we must have something simple, direct, clear, humble, profound and universal. All of these qualities Penington possesses. His lucid expression serves to clarify our own nebulous thoughts and views. He goes to the very heart of things: "Now our work in the world is . . . to live like God" and "the end of words (even of Christ's own directions in the days of his flesh) is to turn men to the holy life and power from whence the words came. . . ." He possesses the sword of the Spirit, a power of discernment which is rare enough to-day: "they [the Quakers] have found the benefit of keeping the conscience tender towards God, and so prize it above all things; and this mercy they have received from the Lord, sensibly to distinguish (in this tenderness towards God, and in the fear of his name) between the dictates of conscience, and the voice of his spirit there." He is really humble: "It is true, Christ was the light, he had the fulness of light, and the apostles a very great proportion; but, blessed be the Lord, I have received some, and am changed by it, . . . and walk with God." He goes to the bottom of things: "How may I know that there is a God?" By sinking down into the principle of his own life, wherein he revealeth himself to the creature. There the soul receiveth such tastes and knowledge of him, as cannot be questioned by him that abideth there, . . . He is catholic: "The property of the true church-government is to leave the conscience to its full liberty in the Lord, to preserve it single and entire for the Lord to exercise and to seek unity in the light and in the Spirit, walking sweetly and harmoniously together in the midst of different practices." He looks ahead to the new social order. "Who would strive to keep the old heavens and the old earth standing, which must be dissolved before the new heavens and the new earth (wherein dwells righteousness) can be formed and brought forth?" And again: "This blessed state . . . must begin in particulars" (i. e., in individuals).

We read of "Easy Lessons in Einstein." Might not this little volume of arranged selections be styled "Easy Lessons in Penington?" To all who have the spreading of the message of Friends at heart, I would bespeak the careful reading of this book. But in Penington's own words: "He that readeth these things, let him not strive to comprehend them; but be content with what he feeleth thereof suitable to his own present state; and as the life grows in him, and he is in the life, and he comes to meet with the things and exercises spoken of, the words and experiences concerning them will of themselves open to him, and be useful and serviceable to him so far as the Lord pleaseth, he keeping to the leadings, savour, and principle of life in himself, wherein alone his knowledge, sight, growth, and experiences are safe."

TOWARD THE DIVINE COMMONWEALTH.

[The following quotations from T. Edmund Harvey's Swarthmore Lecture, "The Long Pilgrimage," indicate something of his views on the Social Order. Like Jane Addams at Hull House, he at Toynbee Hall had exceptional opportunities to observe the reactions of human society in its whole sweep from noblemen to (modern) serf.—Eds.]

"The whole fabric of human society is wrought of strangely mingled threads of good and bad. Little by little, here and there, the ideal of service has spread and the spirit of brotherhood grown. It must be our task to help to spread them everywhere, in the economic structure of society, in its internal social and political regulations, and in the relationship of the nations with each other and with half organized and more primitive races. We must seek to remodel our educational system under the inspiration of this ideal, to bring fresh thought and energy to reconstruct the faulty and too often wrongly conceived machinery of our penal and prison system."—(Pages 52-53.)

"The methods and spirit at work in the national system [of education] will depend, not only on the personality of the teachers within these schools and on that of the administration and committee members who have charge of them, but on the ideals maintained and the experiments worked out in schools largely independent of the state system. And here, quite apart from other reasons, we see that there is more than ever [Friends should note this particularly] need to-day for schools with a distinctive ideal of their own, which cannot be provided by any national machinery."—(Page 54.)

"The Christian ideal involves revolution for the individual, sometimes a sudden one, in which there is an abrupt transition from a self-centered to a Christ-centered life, sometimes a silent and gradual one, in which the same change comes consciously or unconsciously to pass. How can it be that this ideal will not also lead to a revolution in social and industrial life, in some cases gradual and silent, in some cases sudden? Yet this does not mean that the whole fellowship of Christian disciples should be identified with any one political party. Certain types of mind and personality are as naturally conservative as others are radical or revolutionary; and both are needed to complete each other. The conservative Christian tends to emphasize the good elements amongst the mingled good and ill of the existing Social Order and to see in them the outcome of the eternal and enduring principles of the Divine kingdom; and his work will be directed towards the quiet and silent transformation of life about him within this already existing frame work. The other type of Christian sees clearly how much there is in the world order out of harmony with Christ's ideal and tries to sweep away these unworthy and anti-social relationships, that they may be replaced by the order of the Divine commonwealth. It is not for the whole group of Christian disciples to impose upon its members a single way of action, or to bar out either method or type of mind from its communion. But the Christian community must hold them both together and help them to realize their common aim in the establishment of God's commonwealth, checking and guiding their thoughts and actions in the light of the ideal given them by Christ."—(Pages 54-55.)

"'Things will remain as they have been, while human nature remains the same,' say many. But this cannot suffice for the disciple of Christ. For the Christian community is there to alter human nature, and every member of it must be able to bear witness to some alteration of human nature in his own personal experience. The alteration which is thus sought is one of character, of personality; and the community of disciples must therefore urge its members to work to bring about such conditions of life as can give fullest opportunity to the development of personality, and each of them to strive in family and home life, in their work and in industrial and social relationships to be free to serve and to set others free to serve and at the same time to develop their personalities. This implies a willingness to make experiments involving risk and sacrifice, and a loving sympathy for others who are engaged in different experiments, which may not have our approval. The whole group of Christian disciples must help each member to realize that in his contact with life about him there must be a constant subordination of the seen and material to the unseen and spiritual. Happiness ought never to be sought by such a man in the maintaining or increasing of possessions. The ideal of discipleship which he shares with his fellows involves indeed a continual willingness to renounce things which are not in themselves evil, but good, for the sake of a higher good, affecting other lives than his own. He must be on constant guard against the danger to true freedom for himself and for others which possessions and the desire to acquire possessions bring. The Christian community must advocate simplicity of life for its members, not by imposing any arbitrary external standard upon them, but by urging the need to place the life of the spirit in command of the lower life, so that possessions may always be servants which we may at any time dismiss, and not masters which hold us fast tied to them and dependent upon them. We are still all too far removed from the wonderful spirit which animated those Greek Christians of the second century, of whom Aristides writes in his Apology that when some were in want, the congregation was wont to fast for one or two days to supply their needs."—(Pages 56-57.)

"Not that there should be a levelling down of anything which makes for the true development of the spirit and increased power to help and to serve; but there must rather be such a voluntary simplification of life as will set at liberty for better use the energy and labor now spent on ministering to the luxuries of those who would be better and happier without them. We need not all live in houses of the same size; but certainly the man who lives in a large house needs a big heart and a humble mind. The great house may become something of an idol, claiming its owner's time and thoughts and needing a company of temple servants to tend it. . . . Yet it is not merely possessions which make men their prisoners. The thirst for possessions goes sometimes along with wealth, but sometimes along with poverty. Some who are indifferent to the luxuries wealth may purchase find it harder to give up the power, and especially the power for good, which riches seem to offer."—(Page 58.)

"CHRIST is presented to us in the Gospel story and in the experience of Christians as the perfect revelation of the Father, and the one Way to Him."—W. BLAIR NEATBY, in "The Message of Jesus."

THINK OF THE NEXT GENERATION.

A descendant of an early missionary to the Hawaiian Islands not long ago remarked: "Our grandfathers were men possessed of a great religious passion; our fathers had a great social vision; we are great sports." Whilst he may have partly spoken in jest, he was in a measure speaking the truth. The wealth that has gone into the possession of the third and fourth generations of some of the early missionary families of Hawaii has been accompanied by a change on the part of at least some of them with respect to their interest in souls. Is there danger that Friends of every kind be similarly diverted from some of the zeal manifested by our fathers years ago?

Is there danger, in the midst of the temptations to worldliness that at present abound, that our members too frequently substitute the privileges of membership for the holy communion with God, the baptism of the Holy Spirit, the reverent Bible-study and reading that characterized their predecessors years ago?

A passion for souls is indispensable to the maintenance of any church organization. If a church is numerically going to increase it must preserve that paramount passion. Two or three generations of failure to keep burning the fires of revival within its own borders or in other fields will be succeeded by loss of spiritual vitality or decrease in numbers. The issue cannot be escaped. The first evidence of decay may be found in giving first place—note I say first place—to social service or benefactions, both the inevitable accompaniments of the genuine Christian life, whereas social service or benefactions should be subservient to the spiritual vision that has prompted them. Is it not fair to ask our members to see to it that our Yearly Meetings, in the midst of the splendid and Christ-given opportunity to serve humanity that has been thrust upon them, do not become so busy in the relief of others that we neglect the old-time heart-tenderness, the old-time communion with God, the old-time enjoyment of the hour of worship, the old-time faith that carried our fathers to spiritual victories and yielded them abundant peace?

I do not minimize the loyalty to Christ and the spiritual contact with God of many of our young people. I would not have us relinquish one iota of our activities on behalf of humanity. But the danger, so tersely expressed by the Hawaiian gentleman, is also our danger.

Do not let us forget the spiritual power-house whence our commission and ability to serve others originated. Do not let us, through a weakness of our spiritual strength, pass on to the generation that is to follow less ability to cope with the problems of their day. If we do this their time and money may be more largely used than ours have been in seeking pleasures that will rob them of desires to help others and which will not bring them satisfaction in the end.

But, on the other hand, if we are tremendously concerned to keep our spiritual contact with God through daily communion with Him, if we yearn after souls at home and abroad that they through us may be brought to the foot of the Cross, then shall we unimpair pass to the succeeding generation of Friends a delightful revelation of the beauty of the Christian life associated with the ability to continue the moral and financial contributions to the world which we have been offering to it. The temptation of the present day to misplace emphasis is large, the choice is ours, our children's children will largely follow the path we take. How shall we lead them?

"REDUCTION, NOT 'DISARMAMENT.'"

The New York Sun of recent date printed, under the title, "Reduction, Not Disarmament," an editorial from The Herald of the same date, approving the appointment of Senator Lodge as a member of the American delegation to the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments, and saying:

"It is a misnomer to style the coming conference a 'disarmament' conference. There can be no such thing as disarmament while human nature and national interests remain what they are at present. There can be, and should be, a profitable discussion of co-operative measures among the several nations concerned, of voluntary and concerted action for the considerable reduction of armaments and the consequent relief of the economic overstrain all around, which full military preparation for every contingency involves."

It then goes on to say that such reductions must be voluntary. "There can be no 'limitation' of armaments in the sense of a restraint put upon national preparedness by a superior, supernatural, supergovernmental organization." "No arbitrary limit can be equally applicable to two or more powers widely differing as to their geographical position and their governmental responsibilities. In the matter of the balance of sea-power, for example, the principle upon which America can safely acquiesce was stated in this column several months ago, using the case of the United States and Japan as an illustration.

"The crux of the matter lies in the proper balance of strength between our navy and that of Japan rather than in their actual strength. And this balance of strength must be determined by the relative vulnerability of the two countries with their colonial dependencies and the value and extent of the commerce of each. Japan in her comparatively compact position is much more favorably situated for defense than the United States. Moreover, our wealth is incomparably greater and our population approximately double that of Japan. What, then, should be the balance of strength between the naval forces of the United States and Japan? If it should be proportionate to the interests our nation is called upon to protect, as compared with the interests Japan is called upon to protect, it is clear we cannot wisely enter into an agreement to limit our new construction of naval tonnage to anything like the measure of Japan's new construction."

The United States, by refusing to join the League of Nations, and so bringing to naught, for the time being, all efforts to make disarmament obligatory upon all nations, our possible rivals as well as ourselves, has seen to it that any reduction now achieved shall be voluntary—so much of the article is true, and true.

The new and interesting material is in the principle established for the determination of the proper "balance of strength," a phrase which by very little escapes being "balance of power," of which the efficacy, as a guarantor of peace, is now, after 1914, generally admitted to be null. "This balance of strength must be determined by the relative vulnerability of the two countries with their colonial dependencies, and the value and extent of the commerce of each." "Moreover, our wealth is incomparably greater and our population approximately double that of Japan. What, then, should be the balance of strength between the naval forces of the United States and Japan? If it should be proportionate to the interests our nation is called upon to protect, as compared with the interests Japan is called upon to protect, it is clear we cannot wisely enter into an agreement to limit our new construction of naval tonnage to anything like the measure of Japan's new construction."

This is interestingly new doctrine, arousing curiosity and speculation. It implies that poverty and feebleness are assets, that resources and numbers are handicaps, in the struggle for self-preservation. We are not used to being told that our economic resources and our 115,000,000 fairly sturdy people increase our need of protection; we have hitherto assumed that they served as a protection, by guaranteeing us strength to hold out long enough to conquer eventually any nation that might assault us.

But admitting the peril in which we find ourselves, let us for the moment try to consider the situation from the Japanese point of view, or, since Japan was taken only as an example, from the point of view of any other nation less wealthy than ourselves. Does the principle The Herald lays down meet the requirements for the defense of any less wealthy nation?

The only test of adequate military preparation is whether it is sufficient to give the nation a fair chance to defend itself should it be drawn into a conflict with any other. This has hitherto been accepted. But if our wealth is incomparably greater than Japan's, and if, in accordance with The Herald's principle, our forces are likewise incomparably stronger than Japan's, Japan's preparedness is not adequate, for it does not give Japan a chance to defend itself in case Japan is drawn into a conflict with this country; Japan, therefore, exists at our sufferance, and Japan's armaments are useless, as useless as if they were one-half, or one-hundredth, as large as they may be. If we expect Japan to agree to any such principle, we are expecting her to agree to a principle we would not agree to, were the situation different, a principle to which no nation except the most wealthy would agree. Navies are not like diamond necklaces, whose size and splendor indicate the wealth and dignity of the wearer. They are treated as necessities of life by writers on the subject, and the poor man needs as much bread and potatoes to keep him in good shape as the millionaire does. In fact, the poor nation needs the effective force more than its richer neighbor does, because the poor nation has not the resources to carry it through a long war of attrition.

It follows evidently from these considerations that the principle laid down by The Herald will be accepted by the most wealthy nation only, the United States in this case, and that if our naval-construction program is based upon that principle, we become instantly a menace to all other nations, who must arm in self-defense. The Herald, therefore, while saying that it approves of a reduction of armaments, is actually advocating a policy for this nation that leads inevitably, not to a reduction, but to an armament rivalry which can have but one outcome, war.

But aside from this technical fallacy, which we have thus far considered from the point of view of the dispassionate student of military affairs, who assumes self-interest as the fundamental motive, force as the ultimate resort, the editorial we are discussing contains an hypothesis which leads inevitably to trouble. Anyone reading the quotations from it will be struck with the number of times the word "interests" appears in it—we must protect our interests; not our liberty, not our principles, but our interests. Interests are strong actuating motives, in individuals and in nations; but the individual has learned to subordinate more or less his own interests to the interests of the group of which he is a member. Until the individuals who compose nations learn to subordinate likewise their group interests to the greater interests of the whole group of nations, there will always be opportunities for serious international trouble. Limitation of armaments can reduce the resulting damage; but the final solution of the problem depends upon this change of emphasis, which the progress actually made toward mutual fair dealing among individuals makes appear not altogether unattainable.

RICHARD R. WOOD.

THE QUAKERS AND DISARMAMENT.

[This article is taken from the Boston Transcript. Apart from its intrinsic interest, Friends will be glad to see how worthily one of Boston's great dailies treats the Society. It is unlike seventeenth century hospitality in that quarter!—Eds.]

Rows of men and women sat in silence beneath the oaks and poplars of Columbia College Green on a recent evening, as the sky behind the grey walls of Union Seminary glowed, then paled, and lights from Horace Mann School and Teachers' College, one by one, pierced the dusk. It was a period of Quaker worship, the last of four gatherings arranged for Friends attending the Columbia Summer Session. The quiet custom was observed a few yards from the scene of a lively talk given several hours earlier, when an expert in pedagogy had demonstrated the use in the Sunday School of modern psychological tests, and when youthful enthusiasts had worked out "accomplishment quotients" for the Sunday School by statistical procedures.

A band played in the distance, and the Broadway street-cars rambled along their way; but only two worshippers broke the stillness of the Quaker meeting. Through the darkness a man's voice spoke of the duty of letting one's light shine, and of the impossibility of the Christian's shining thus unless he is connected with the central light. From beneath a maple tree, in a woman's tones, came Whittier's words:

Dear Lord and Father of mankind,
Forgive our feverish ways!
Reclothe us in our rightful mind;
In purer lives Thy service find,
In deeper reverence, praise.

Drop Thy still dews of quietness,
Till all our strivings cease,
Take from our souls the strain and stress;
And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of Thy peace.

The period of worship followed an address on "The Problem of Disarmament," by Elbert Russell, director of the Woolman School, Swarthmore, Pa.; and his talk had been preceded by many a cordial meeting, as Friend sought fellowship with Friend. "I certainly am glad to see thee," I hear thee has passed examination." "Will thee teach in public school next year?" These greetings differed somewhat in tone from the customary casual exchanges on the College Green.

Elbert Russell took the traditional ground of his people on the question of disarmament, citing the folly and the fate of the Czar as a warning to America.

"The Hague Conference failed to arrange for disarmament," he said. "Russia was the nation to have begun it, for her potential resources were greatest. She could have given the world an example. But, under the advice of his statesmen, Nicholas played safe. How safe did he play? Russia is now a prey to revolutionaries. Nicholas and his family are dead, for all we know. What price has been paid in men killed in battle or dying of wounds and starvation! That was playing safe."

"No patriot would leave his nation unprotected, but no patriot should play safe as Nicholas did. We stand to-day in Russia's old position of dominance. If we disarm, the world will disarm. When President Harding's disarmament conference assembles, what comes of it will depend on what the people of this country want. Have we faith in good-will and brotherhood? Will we risk something on it? We've got to sacrifice something or we'll go on with the mad race to Armageddon. The obligation to be first rests on our country. If we'll play fair and will not treat alien nations as our inferiors, it will go a long way toward making us safe."

In closing, Elbert Russell suggested a governmental agency for reducing friction and averting danger. He said:

"Our President's Cabinet should include a Secretary of Peace. America has achieved works of peace in the Philippines, in Nicaragua, in San Domingo. What a pity these have had to be done by men in military uniform. The Secretary of Peace should have under his control men to carry on beneficent works in all the world. Friction of all kinds, injustices, plagues, all our Red Cross work, these should be his business. To see that causes of war do not arise should be his greatest task."

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE LITTLE BROWN DRESS TALKS.—After that eventful morning when the coat and I learned that we were to be sent to Russia the weeks following were filled with interest and excitement for us. First, Betty carried us around to the Red Cross rooms. And there we discovered that we were not the only little brown dress and coat being sent to the children of Russia. Why, I never saw as many dresses in my life as were piled up in those rooms, waiting to be packed! And besides the dresses, there were boxes and boxes of toys, and shoes, and canned foods, all going with us! We became quite well acquainted before we reached the end of our trip.

At last the day came when we were comfortably, though very snugly, packed in great wooden boxes, all ready to start. I was right next to the top, and was very much worried for fear there would not be room for the coat, too, but just at the last moment they laid it down on top of me. We were so happy to be together we just squeezed each other hard and laughed to ourselves.

For days and weeks it seemed to us that nothing interesting happened. We just seemed to be going, going, going—jouncing along, now very slowly and then again at such a rate that, packed together as closely as we were, we still felt the jar. Then one day I heard some strange voices talking over the top of our box. One man said: "This is the Red Cross shipment to Archangel, Russia. Put it on the ship Wrenchsome."

"Goodness," I whispered to the little brown coat, "I do hope that name doesn't mean we are to be wrecked!"

Wasn't it strange that I should have said that, for the very next day, after we had all been stowed away in the dark hold of the big ship—my first experience on a real vessel—something happened to us. With no warning at all the ship gave a dreadful lurch, and the boxes tumbled all around. We could hear the sailors shouting and running up and down the decks overhead, but no one seemed to pay any attention to the huge pile of boxes in the hold. Then there was a long silence. And the next thing we knew little pools of water came through the cracks of our boxes and at last we knew that we had been shipwrecked and had sunk to the bottom of the great White Sea!

Have you ever spent a month or so on the bed of the ocean? Well, we did, and it wasn't a bit interesting. We didn't see a single mermaid, nor a white seahorse, nor the King of the Deep-Sea Palace, nor any of the wonderful things we hoped to. Perhaps it was because the cracks in our packing boxes weren't wide enough to peep through.

All that we could do was to submit to our fate and try to be as brave as possible, for we were sent by the little Red Cross Juniors, and were they not all brave? So we, too, would prove worthy. But at last we became so water-soaked and salted that we just lost consciousness and silently lay there in our watery box as though dead.

The next sensation I felt was that of a hot, reviving warmth being rubbed over me. Where was I? Where had I been? I struggled to remember, and then I opened my eyes.

The little brown coat was gone!

I gasped with dismay when I found I had been parted from the coat, for it wasn't much fun to find one's self alone in a strange land.

But, as the hot steam of the iron warmed me into life once more, I began to take a new interest in my surroundings, and decided to make the best of whatever happened. When I looked up, my heart was set at rest, for I was looking straight into the smiling face of an American Red Cross worker—my kind rescuer, pressing me back to life. My, but it's good to meet an American when you're alone in Russia, and especially when you have just been rescued from the bottom of the sea!

Still, I did not know what my destination was to be, until I heard the Red Cross lady say: "The clothes are all pressed and dried now, so we can start distributing them."

And some one answered: "Why, they look as good as new. What will the children say when they hear that their dresses were under the water for three months and that the Red Cross had the big boxes pulled out?"

That is how I learned that the Red Cross had saved our lives. I still wondered what had happened to my little friend, the coat. Hadn't they saved it, too? I didn't have time to wonder long, for that very day the Red Cross lady carried me to another home, and there I was given to my new mistress.

I wish you could have seen her! Such a clear little, black-eyed girl she was! Just the size of Betty, but, oh, so ragged and pinched and cold-looking! But how her dark eyes sparkled as the Red Cross lady gave me to her, and what a warm thrill I felt shooting through her as she snuggled into me for the first time.

As soon as she had looked at me and patted me lovingly, almost fearfully—as though she could hardly believe I was really hers—she ran outside and proudly showed me to some other little girls. They, too, were running about excitedly, warm and happy in other little American dresses—the same ones that had come with me on that long, eventful journey.

If Betty could have seen my little Russian Anne—for that was her name—she would have been more than happy that she sent me away across the sea, and I was glad that I had come—glad even that I had been shipwrecked. It was worth everything just to feel the warm joy of my new mistress.

But the greatest and happiest surprise of my big adventure was still in store for me. Imagine my unbounded delight when, two days later, the same Red Cross lady slipped the little Brown Coat of those good old school days in America over my shoulders! We whispered our happiness to each other so loudly that I am sure Anne must have heard us!

Since that day we have always been together. Once more we go to school, this time in a quaint little school-house that the Juniors of America are providing for those boys and girls of far-away Russia. And here, in our new home, we feel that at last we are of real service. We are needed more here, because in America, Betty has many other little brown dresses and coats.

POLISH REFUGEES.

The first sight that greeted me was crowds of people, piles of boxes, samovars, stoves, queer furniture, bedding. Then I saw that some people had cut boughs to cover their treasures and their children with. Have you ever been to Ellis Island, Have you ever seen people in herds after a disaster? Have you ever seen the furniture rescued from a burning house? Have you ever been camping? Little camp-fires were dotted around, and by each were pots of all kinds. No one seemed ill-humored. They were just resigned, men, women and children everywhere, babies only here and there. I stayed away from the barracks, anyhow I know just what they are like inside, I feel like an intruder. There is no privacy, but why should I intrude? There were, I should judge, about a thousand refugee children lined up on a huge athletic field, waiting in lines. I'd have been glad if every playground worker in America could have seen three Polish girls to-day, making these children play. The leader looked about eighteen. She had reddish hair, bobbed. She was dressed in a blue sweater, short skirt, and old white shoes. Her word was law. She led all the girls, in twos, away from the A. S. C. tents across the drill grounds, marched right, then right again. The girls then divided up into huge circles and played fox and goose. The boys did the same under another leader. In order to catch one another's hands they were forced to put their mugs in a huge pile in the centre of each ring. The scramble to get their mugs back was great to watch.

THE SADHU.

A Study in Mysticism and Practical Religion.

B. H. STRUTER AND A. J. APPASAMY.

This sympathetic yet critical sketch of the life and work of Sundar Singh comes at a time when our souls are greatly in need of refreshment. It seems like a clear pure spring in a desert land, giving tonic and even life when one had grown faint on the journey. Our spirits are faint because Christ is left out of the many methods suggested for the "salvation of humanity." This is to be achieved by "The New Society" by adequate education, by a fresh grasp of human values, by understanding that "men are men," "time-binders, not space-binders," but never a place for Christ's dynamic power in these reform schemes.

Into the midst of this earnest theorizing the Sadhu comes. Into his life Christ suddenly came and "Henceforth the discordant elements which had been striving within him for mastery were composed into a new harmony, a new equilibrium was set up, a new scale of values was established and from that hour he became a new man." Here is a key for those who can find it and use it.

Sundar Singh was born in the north of India in 1889. His family was wealthy and he was reared in luxury. His mother was devoutly religious and trained her son according to her understanding of religion. He memorized and read great portions of the sacred books of India. From boyhood there had been within him a consuming longing for the Peace of God. His soul was pathetically sad in its lonely quest until it found its home in the heart of Christ.

His mother died when he was fourteen years old, which added to the weight upon his spirit. He is still devoted to her blessed memory through all of his labors and seasons of communion with God.

Like Paul of Tarsus, he thought he was doing God's service when he persecuted any Christians with whom he came in contact. He burned their Bibles and other books. Finally, he resolved if no peace came to him after prolonged prayer and fasting he would commit suicide and seek in the next world what he had not found in this.

The following morning, after making this decision, he awakened early, took a cold bath and began his final agonizing prayer for the Peace of God. His own account is:—

"At 4.30 I saw something of which I had no idea at all previously. In the room where I was praying I saw a great light. I thought the place was on fire. I looked around, but could find nothing. Then the thought came to me that this might be an answer that God had sent to me. Then as I prayed I looked into the light, I saw the form of the Lord Jesus Christ. It had such an appearance of glory and love. If it had been some Hindu incarnation I would have prostrated myself before it. But it was the Lord Jesus Christ whom I had been insulting a few days before. I felt that a vision like this could not come out of my own imagination. I heard a voice say in Hindustani: 'How long will you persecute me?' I have come to save you, you were praying to know the right way, why do you not take it?' The thought then came to me, Jesus Christ is not dead, but living and it must be He, Himself. So I fell at His feet and got this wonderful Peace, which I could not get anywhere else." This Peace he has never lost.

His family disowned him and turned him out of his beautiful home. Then he decided to be a Christian Sadhu or "holy man," living on alms and wearing the saffron robe as he went on his missionary journeys. While there are many Sadhus in India, they are not Christians. When Sundar Singh preached Christianity his disappointed and angry hearers stoned and starved, beat and persecuted him almost to the death.

He preaches in Tibet in summer, where his message is peculiarly unwelcome. Once he only escaped death by a miracle. In the winter he travels over India when the climate is not so forbidding. With his labors he intersperses times of solitude and refreshment of soul amidst the solemn beauty of the snow-clad Himalayas.

There is no need to tell of his great fast or of his visions, helpful as they are. It is the singular purity and sweetness of his Christ-filled life, the wonderful influence of such a life on the people of India, the practical interpretation of spiritual conceptions and vice-versa and his genuine hold on the precious Peace of God through Jesus Christ, which bring such an inspiration to those who read this book sympathetically. It is full of practical lessons for the seeking heart and balm for the troubled spirits of those who mourn.

It is difficult to make only one selection with which to end. The Sadhu's ideas of a religious life are so simple and appealing that one would like to quote passages of wisdom on many aspects of the life here and hereafter. Perhaps what he says about prayer is as vital as any part of his teaching.

"Prayer is not begging, it is communion with God—it is conversing with God. How our life is transformed when we are in the company of a noble friend! Then how much more will the communion with the One who is good beyond all measure transform us. Often we do not spend enough time in prayer. Scientists often spend years, sometimes a whole life-time, in making an important scientific discovery. Then how can we expect to discover spiritual beauties by spending only five minutes every day in quiet prayer. Some people become tired at the end of ten minutes or half an hour of prayer. What would they do when they have to spend Eternity in the presence of God? We must begin the habit here and become used to being with God."

"There are several strings to a violin. They must be tightened if they are to produce a melody. Different thoughts are like the different strings, they must be tightened, that is, brought into subjection to Christ, and then the bow of prayer will produce wonderful songs."

Without self-sacrificing service prayer is, in the Sadhu's view, of small account. Self-sacrificing service, then, is the first and last word of his exhortation.

LIBERATING FINANCIAL CAPITAL.

[Two large meeting-house properties in Leeds, England, have recently been sold. The following comment is not without point in Philadelphia. Meetings in central places do make public our testimony, but with more than one valuable central property in hand actual needs should be nicely balanced with possible service of what the writer of this extract calls liberated capital.—Eps.]

At the first meeting for worship held there in 1868, an address was given on the text "The House that is to be builded for the Lord must be exceeding magnificent, of fame and of glory throughout all countries." Whether the house in which he spoke quite achieved fame or not, the incident suggests that the possession of good buildings was thought more of in those days than is the case to-day. Under the changed conditions, with a less wealthy membership, the possession and cost of upkeep of two large meeting-houses and other buildings has meant the tying up of a large sum of money which will now be liberated to meet the demands of education and of other objects which minister to growing life. Many Friends feel that the future of Quakerism in cities like Leeds lies in the establishment of smaller suburban groups amongst the homes of the people, and the step now taken will probably give a lead in that direction. In the meantime, the school-room block at the rear of the premises will serve existing needs, and the first meeting for worship held under the new conditions in the Library illustrated the advantages of a smaller room freed from the drawbacks of empty forms and large vacant spaces.

BURLINGTON AND BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING.

Burlington and Bucks Quarterly Meeting was held on the 29th and 30th ult.

The meeting of Ministers and Elders gathered as usual at the little Meeting-house on Mercer Street in Trenton on Second-day. The members were generally out and also three Friends representing the Yearly Meeting Extension Committee. The minute adopted by that committee at its meeting, held Seventh Month 27th was read and called forth helpful suggestions from several; it being felt that the broad and basic question referred to in it should receive the consideration of the meeting next day, the minute was referred to that meeting.

The names of three Friends for the station of Elder having been forwarded by one of the Monthly Meetings received a final endorsement.

The Quarterly Meeting met as usual in the old historic house at Burlington. To some of the visitors who had never approached the town direct from the Pennsylvania side, there was the novelty of the ferry across the Delaware.

There was the usual attendance of members, with a few visitors whose coming received a warm welcome.

It would not be difficult to outline the vocal exercises that were offered; enough, perhaps, to say that they were in the life, and that the meeting, under them, was refreshed as is the outward man who has found food suitable to his condition.

In the second or "business meeting," reference was made to three or more appointed meetings held since last report at Barnegat, N. J.; a minute furnished Max I. Reich for Gospel service in New England and Canada was returned with a brief verbal statement that he had found an open door, wherever his Master had turned his feet. One of the Quarterly Meeting's appointees to the Representative Meeting, having felt the time had come for him to resign, the Meeting appointed Henry W. Albertson in his place; the four Query answers were read and summarized and the minute referred to as a feature of the business of the Meeting on the previous day was read and further statements offered by members of the Visitation Committee present.

The meeting having held until all the business had been transacted, without hurry and without the weariness that comes when a meeting is unreasonably prolonged, adjourned with the feeling that again we had been blessed and our coming together owned of the Lord.

D. H. F.

CONFERENCE AT WOODLAND, N. C.

A Conference was held on the 25th ult. at Woodland, N. C., under the oversight of the Monthly Meeting which regularly convenes at that place.

It was felt that the younger members of the Meeting should have a conspicuous part in this, and in arranging the Meeting, this was had in mind. Two meetings were planned—the one in the morning was addressed by Max I. Reich on "Reasons for Believing That the Christian Religion is of Divine Revelation." The house was comfortably filled with attentive listeners, who had come from far and near.

On account of the funeral of a prominent citizen in the neighborhood occurring that afternoon, the Conference set for that date was postponed until next day.

At this meeting several young Friends read papers prepared by themselves on vital subjects such as "First-day School Service," "Ethics as Taught at Westtown," "Friends' Service of Love in War Time and Since," "How to Bring Young Friends Everywhere into Touch with Each Other," and others of kindred nature.

A good deal of discussion arose and some Friends evidently feeling that younger Friends might be indifferent to the testimonies of older Friends were glad to learn differently. It was not possible to read all the papers for want of time, and so the matter was referred back to the Monthly Meeting to decide whether another Conference should not be held in the near future.

It was an eye-opener to many to discover so much buried talent among the rising generation of North Carolina Friends and an enthusiasm, which if rightly guided, will lead to more.

Most of the visitors present remained over to attend the Quarterly Meeting, held at Rich Square immediately after the Conference. The meetings for worship were times of favor; in the business meeting a touching memorial was read concerning Abby Hollowell of Oak Grove Monthly Meeting, a Minister in whom the illumination of the Spirit took the place of outward educational advantages.

AIMWELL SCHOOL.

Vacation is over. From seashore and mountains families are coming back to the city; and one of the great reasons for this return is the fact that schools are about to re-open.

Westtown, Germantown, Friends' Select, are all ready to carry on the plans made by the committees and faculties for the help of the children. But there is another school which should also be of great interest to Friends and whose pupils are eagerly returning not from a healthy and happy vacation in country or mountains, but from the crowded city streets.

Aimwell School was founded in 1796 and is located at 809 N. Randolph Street. It gives the girls of the neighborhood as thorough a training as the public schools provide and also gives them a simple religious training, endeavoring to develop earnest Christian women. And because it deals with smaller numbers—there are between seventy and eighty pupils—it also can give something which the public schools cannot give. The School very truly goes into the children's homes and helps the mothers solve their problems, problems that to some of us look almost hopeless. The mother of three children whose father has been killed in an accident must be helped. The old woman who must care for her little granddaughter sometimes has to be shown that soap and water are necessary for the small girl. All this the school does as regularly as it does the routine work of the class-room.

But it requires money to carry on this work. Salaries have to be paid, and they ought to be larger now than ever before, the cooking and sewing classes must be supplied with materials, and we all know that supplies cost money. So the committee directly responsible for the maintenance of the School is appealing for assistance, or rather, as Dr. Grenfell would say, is giving people an opportunity to share in a beautiful and satisfying work. To be convinced that the School is worth while it is only necessary to ask some of the older girls what it has done for them, or what the mid-week meeting for worship at Fourth and Arch Streets means to them, or to inquire of the mothers why they wish to send their children to Aimwell School.

HANNAH C. REEVE,
Secretary,

531 Linden Street, Camden, N. J.

It was Christ's purpose to divert every mind from the search after what one can get to what one can give. And, of this, the Cross remains not only the Supreme Example, but the Supreme Inspiration. It is in its essence that the Cross is of value. It is because the crucifixion reveals the heart of Jesus, which is the heart of God, that it is powerful. We see there that Jesus shirked nothing in carrying out His own teaching. No man can charge Him with saying one thing and doing another. He saw that His followers must share His baptism and drink His cup, but first of all He passed through the baptism, and drank the cup's bitterness to the dregs. The Cross is thus a test and a triumph of reality. Do we believe our own theories? The manner in which we face our Cross will tell. Do we understand that the will of Christ—the Spirit of Christ—applied consistently to human affairs will make a new world? The Cross is proof that it will, and also that nothing else can.—G. NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

The weekly cable received from the Berlin office reports that the Friends are now feeding 175,000 children in 1,800 centres.

The Vienna Tageblatt in speaking of the better food conditions during the summer months in Vienna states that, in spite of the continued depreciation of the currency, a decrease in the prices of certain foodstuffs could be noted during the past month. Green vegetables and potatoes have been supplied in such quantities that the high prices quoted during the previous month could not be maintained.

The reduction in the price of vegetables naturally affects the cost of living, on account of the fact that the people are more able to subsist upon the green vegetables which are so plentiful during the summer months and which may be transported so easily to the city. This explains the statement of the Central Commission, according to which, the cost of living for a family of four amounts to 7,020 kronen for the Seventh Month, as against 7,325 kronen for the Sixth Month.

With the approach of winter the work of the Friends' Mission in Poland will have to be withdrawn in certain of the far eastern districts, notably Baranowice on the Russian border, not because the need is yet met, but because of the danger from wolves, whose presence makes a cross-country visit of relief quite impossible.

The wolves are increasing in numbers, for this part of the country has but recently been made a part of Poland, and the government forbids the Russians who live there to use arms or ammunition, and so the wolves are multiplying. They have become a menace to the livestock of the peasants. In winter it will be impossible to travel without a large party with several sleighs, and this is considered impracticable in view of the resources of the Mission. The work of caring for the returned refugees which the Friends have been carrying on in this district will be turned over to the Polish Government, which declares that it is able to handle the problem of the wolves.

FOOD AT COLLEGE IN POLAND.

"It was one of the most beautiful of spring days and I was at its best, but joining the crowd we left the sunshine behind us and went down into a basement of one of the old buildings of the University. As we walked along the corridor we soon began to smell the savory odor of cooked food, which we found came from a door into which a stream of young men was turning. We looked in, and were amazed at the crowd which filled the room and for a while stood listening to the buzz of conversation and the clatter of plates as we watched the long lines move. Suddenly someone saw us and called out a command. Immediately a path appeared before us in the crowd, down which we walked rather self-consciously, followed by many interested glances and murmurs of 'Amerykanska.' We soon reached the back of the room, where there were windows through which plates were being handed to the waiting students.

"There were very few women among the students, but the men were of all ages, mostly young and rather sober and very shabby. The majority were wearing much-mended uniforms. The long lines passed by slowly as the plates of food were ceaselessly handed out as they were brought up in relays from the interior of the kitchen by barefooted women with handkerchiefs over their heads.

"Some of the students who were helping to serve the food told us that a corps of the students served the meals each day, receiving their meals free. They took turns in doing this.

"We were invited to try a student's dinner while they told us about the whole plan and process, and a very good dinner it was. The food had been provided by the A. R. A. and it had been cooked in the new improved kitchen given and equipped by the Friends' Relief Mission. The cost to each student was generally about ten marks, and this provided a dinner of really appetizing onion soup, followed by corned beef and beans with sauce. At the close of the dinner there was also a cup of very good coffee.

"While we were eating the students talked to us about their work in the university, how a majority of them had been in the army for several years, and how difficult it was to pick up the threads of study once more. They told us that the shortest course was scheduled to take five years, but with the present lack of books and instruments it appeared as though it would take them seven to eight years. And yet with all these handicaps, enthusiasm and ambition were their predominant characteristics, and they spoke of the great hopes they held for their regained country, feeling sure that these difficulties which confronted Poland were only temporary, and that Poland had characteristics and resources in its young manhood and young womanhood which would build it into a great and resourceful nation."

ODD WAYS OF DISTRIBUTING FOOD IN GERMANY.

Those who follow the trail of the Quaker feeding in Germany may see many interesting and quaint sights. Not the least interesting are those of transporting the food. Besides the very efficient ordinary method of distributing the food by motor trucks and railroad there are many amusing methods which necessity calls into use. From Dresden word comes that one day a boy and his dog were hitched together to draw a wagonload of cooked food from the kitchen to the feeding center. In the Saxon hills the wagon carrying the food is often drawn by a bony old horse hitched to one side of the pole. Of course, he pulls the wagon in a sort of crab-like fashion, but the food doesn't seem to be stirred up by the time it reaches the children.

In the Vogtland women sometimes carry the hot food up the hill in kettles which are strapped to their backs. This is the prevalent mode of express service in this district. In Stettin the fire department of the town delivers the rations whenever there are no fires. In the city of Essen a string of trolley cars is loaded with thermos bottles, each containing food for 100 children, and with great boxes of zweiback for distribution to the schools. In a town in Bavaria two great buckets of food are carried by a boy who bears a wooden yoke across his shoulders. In a very small town in this district the food is carried to the kindergarten in a baby carriage. There seems to be no limit to the variety of methods which are possible to bring food to children when it is really necessary.

DOES GERMANY APPRECIATE?

Many wonder concerning the extent of the appreciation of the German people for the relief which has been brought to them through the child-feeding mission of the Quakers. Do they understand the meaning of the gift that has been given them? Do they ever show any appreciation for the rebuilding of their children's bodies and the saving of their lives? These, and other questions like them, are constantly arising in our minds as we have continued to give to the work of feeding Germany's children. An answer to these questions may be found, in a slight way, in an excerpt from a German daily newspaper, the Tarnowitz Stadtblatt:

"When one takes an investigating tour through the feeding kitchens which the Quakers are maintaining, one finds many children with shining faces partaking of the cocoa and rations provided by the Friends. Both the children and mothers are very happy, and they appreciate the food very much. Sometimes they are questioned about the Quakers and their work, and this is the impression they all give—'They are Christians in the spirit of Jesus of Nazareth, with loving hearts and practical minds.'

"The peace in which we are now living is not founded upon principles of morality and unselfishness, and therefore is not safe. The Friends are helping to give the world peace with their food, rather than holding conferences as others are doing. They are building a bridge over land and sea and are teaching us to have faith, and to believe that there is love in the world. They have a star as their emblem. May it be the star of a bright future."

CHRISTIANITY is not a religion which makes up for compromise in practice by an effusive admiration of Christ's spirit and ideals; it is not the general admiration that Christ's plan of life is superior to any other. It means that here and now, from morning to evening, we acknowledge that Jesus has the last word upon our life—not the last word at the last judgment, but the last word on the action and the passion of to-day. —DR. PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

For the present the Disarmament Conference, to open at Washington on Armistice Day, dwarfs all other Peace activities. With representatives from Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan and the United States, met together to consider the subject of "Limitation of Armament" and, with China added, the "Pacific and Far Eastern Question," the importance of the occasion can scarcely be exaggerated. The Peace Conference at Paris in 1919 may have been too close to the war to make possible the adoption of a new basis for international relations, great as was the effort on the part of some to do so. The world has had occasion to learn much since then and things may now be possible which could not then be done. The opportunity of generations is before the people of the world, and the responsibility upon those who feel that a new world order within and among nations must be established is almost overwhelming.

THE PURPOSES AND SCOPE OF THE CONFERENCE.

President Harding in his invitation to the other nations asks them "to participate in a Conference on the subject of Limitation of Armament, in connection with which Pacific and Far Eastern subjects will also be discussed." The enormous expenditures of all great nations for the support of their armies and navies seem to him an economic burden that is preventing the world from recovery and progress, and he also clearly points out that such "avoidable or extravagant expense" is "a constant menace to the world rather than an assurance of its preservation."

He thinks the time is opportune for "the Powers" to confer on the limitation of armament not merely naval, but of all kinds, and on the control of new agencies of warfare, referring apparently to chemical warfare, the use of disease germs and submarines.

Further, he says wisely that we cannot expect to have peace unless the causes of misunderstanding are removed, and certain underlying principles are agreed upon. As the problems of China, Japan and the Pacific Ocean are at present the gravest sources of danger, these are to be discussed and solved if possible, but it is plainly stated that the scope of the Far Eastern questions is not to be defined by this country, but to be determined before the Conference by an exchange of suggestions among the nations interested.

It is greatly to be desired that the urgent subject of Disarmament shall be kept in the foreground for as early action as possible; and it is also claimed that most nations will feel that their readiness to reduce their armament will depend on the principles and policies that shall be accepted by the great nations to govern their actions in the Far East and elsewhere. The two subjects are interdependent.

THE DELEGATES TO THE CONFERENCE.

It seems likely that each nation will send a delegation of five members to the Conference, accompanied by a large staff of assistants and experts. President Harding's appointment (no confirmation by the Senate is necessary) of Charles E. Hughes, Secretary of State, to lead the delegation of this country has met with hearty approval and the success of the entire Conference will probably depend largely on his skill and ability. The Philadelphia Friends who saw Secretary Hughes in Washington a few weeks ago were much impressed with his sincere desire to make the Conference a success, with his ability and with a confidence placed in him by others at Washington. Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, has also been appointed; which makes it highly probable that whatever recommendations the Conference may make will receive favorable action by the Senate. Various women's organizations are urging that one woman be named among the delegates and the labor bodies are trying to secure a representative.

France has announced Premier Briand as the leader of its delegation; Lloyd George will probably be here from Great Britain, and all the nations represented are expected to send strong delegates. The best each nation can select will make none too able a body to reach wise decisions about the problems to be considered.

POPE BENEDICT'S ATTITUDE TOWARD THE SUBJECT.

A recent Ledger dispatch from Rome states that the Pope is deeply interested in America's effort to bring lasting peace to the peoples of the world and he considers that his peace message of four years ago really initiated the Disarmament movement. He would limit not only the naval forces of the nations, but the land forces as well, and he would restrict the latter to the number needed by each nation to maintain law and order within its own territory. He considers the abolition of conscription as absolutely essential to successful disarmament and peace.

The fundamental issue, as he sees it, is the substitution of the moral force of right for the material force of might, a statement to which all Christians should be able to give hearty and intelligent assent.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

WILLIAM T. and ELEANOR R. ELKINTON are added to the list of those expecting to attend Ohio Yearly Meeting. Their prospect of attendance had not matured in time to be presented to the Monthly Meeting, but they go with the hearty approval of their Friends. They are both Elders.

So far as we know Haddonfield and Salem is the pioneer Quarter amongst us to issue a news sheet of its proceedings to all its members. The first number is admirable and carries with it much of the spirit of a very good meeting.

This same Quarter (Haddonfield and Salem) has arranged a Conference on membership in the Society of Friends to be held on the afternoon and evening of Ninth Month 9th. Such Conferences were suggested by the Yearly Meeting. In the afternoon several young Friends are on the program; in the evening Alfred C. Garrett will review the whole subject as preliminary to a general discussion.

RICHARD R. WOOD who contributes an article to this number of THE FRIEND has given valuable service to the Peace Committee for some weeks past. He has now relinquished this position to join the teaching staff of Whittier College in California.

The American Friend for Eighth Month 25th is the Centennial Number of Indiana Yearly Meeting. It contains much interesting historical matter.

MARY PUMPHREY made quite a wide circle of friends while visiting in this country some years ago. These and others will be interested in this item from The Friend (London):

Mary Pumphrey (Wincombe), after reaching Fremantle, West Australia, traveled through to Sydney by train, almost a week's unbroken journey, for which, says a writer in the Australasian Friend, she seemed none the worse. At the time of the report she had gone on to Queensland and was hoping to be in Adelaide, South Australia, some time before the General Meeting.

Five three Friends recognized as Elders by Burlington Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders are William Henry Balderston, Mary L. Balderston and Joseph I. Edgerton.

HAJOCA BATH

With clean water waste

With the use of tile and Hajoca present-day plumbing, many a residence built a decade or more ago can be made equal in sanitary equipment to the luxurious new residence.

This beautiful built-in porcelain enameled bath is admirably suited for such remodeled work. There are no spaces under or back of the bath to collect dust or moisture.

The fixture is distinctive for its sanitary features and inviting appearance.

Visit our showrooms. This will materially help in any remodeling you contemplate.

We believe that the new world will only cease to be a mere attractive phrase and become a living reality when the young of all nations determine together to make the effort of thought, will, and persistent labor that this ideal of world-wide fellowship demands of them. It is a hard task and a slow one, but let us see to it we are not traitors to our youth.—From the International News Sheet.

This is the New Year season for the Young Friends' Movement, and I imagine that many of us are thinking of the year ahead. The Young Friends' Movement has lived through the first glow of its forming and we desire that now it may not settle down into a mechanical organization. Movements have been known to do that;—we have seen it happen even in our Quaker history. What a dire calamity if it should happen now, when there opens out before the Society of Friends a wider door of service than ever before; now when the whole Society has been stirred with a call to help carry the message of the possibility of Christ's living comradeship with every man. Surely this is such a call as youth has always answered. Our Young Friends' Movement has in the past largely contented itself with developing Quakerism within; but in looking ahead will not the call for the next year bring us into work of an expansive nature? Will we not want to help put young Friends into contact with opportunities of carrying Christian fundamentals to others? Ours is no sectarian doctrine,—but a teaching that "God is demanding of us all a new order of life,—that He is greater, more loving, nearer and more available for our help and comfort than any man has dreamed." There are many who are hungering and thirsting, who do not find comfort in the pressure of their materialistic life—who have lost faith in the organized church, who are perplexed and seeking for the way.

"If only each of us might be given afresh the child-like spirit, and if all together we might hear once more the call of the Master ring out clear and strong to our Society—might not even the early triumph of Quakerism be surpassed? A new age needs indeed a new spirit. We are not called to give just the same thing as was given by our spiritual forefathers, but we are called, each and all, to give our best, without stint, without counting the cost, and unless we do, we cannot be true to that which God has given us."

MARY J. MOON.

TWO KINDS OF HUMILITY.

The other day, in talking with a young Friend, whose rôle, unfortunately, is hardly more than that of an interested spectator, the following observation interested me: "Your writers don't speak with enough assurance. There are too many questions in their utterances. Their attitude is too apologetic to carry conviction. Let them come out fearlessly with what they believe. Other people don't have to accept their findings, if they don't wish to, but they themselves should show in what they write and speak that they believe what they are saying."

It is true. The point is well taken. We cannot expect to convince even such "interested spectators," let alone those who are indifferent, if we fail to give them the assurance that we really are convinced ourselves.

We are convinced, ourselves. That is not the trouble. But generations of cautious expression, the wholly commendable desire not to pretend to more than we have attained, and the realization that we must put off our shoes on holy ground, have resulted in a sort of humility that stifles and weakens. Our best endeavors are handicapped. Our efforts do not bear the fruits we had hoped for.

We "do what we can," "in our little way." We interpret the sentence, "In quietness and confidence shall be thy strength," as if the third and fourth words weren't there at all.

Peter and John were humble, but bold. It was their boldness that made people realize that they had been with Jesus. They were aware of their limitations: "Silver and gold have we none," but "such as we have, we give!" And the "such as they had" worked a more wonderful thing than any amount of treasure, material or intellectual, could have done.

We need this other sort of humility, the confident sort. We must cease to be apologetic. We dare not be ashamed of what is, according to Paul, "the power of God," to the saving of mankind. We need the spirit of Nehemiah: "I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down." If we aren't on the rock, we must bend every energy to get there; if we are on the rock, why act as if we were still on the sand or in the mire?

No one that ever lived was more humble than Isaac Penington, but mark what he says:

"Christ was the light, he had the fulness of light, and the apostles a very great proportion; but, blessed be the Lord, I have received some, and am changed by it, and become light in the Lord; and walk with God, and dwell with God in the light."

This is the quiet confidence we need.

MY EVENING PRAYER.

If I have wounded any soul to-day,
If I have caused one foot to go astray,
If I have walked in my own willful way—
Good Lord forgive!

If I have uttered idle words or vain,
If I have turned aside from want or pain,
Lest I myself should suffer through the strain—
Good Lord forgive!

If I have craved for joys that are not mine,
If I have let my wayward heart repine,
Dwelling on things of earth, not things Divine—
Good Lord forgive!

If I have been perverse, or hard, or cold,
If I have longed for shelter in the fold
When Thou hast given me some part to hold—
Good Lord forgive!

Forgive the sins I have confessed to thee,
Forgive the secret sins I do not see,
That which I know not, Father, teach Thou me—
Help me to live.

—C. MAUDE BATTERSBY, in Indianapolis News.

TO ALL YOUNG FRIENDS EVERYWHERE.

MESSAGE OF THE TWELFTH YOUNG FRIENDS' GENERAL CONFERENCE, HELD AT RICHMOND, INDIANA, 1921.

In the days when the Spanish kingdom was at the height of its power its coinage bore this arrogant inscription, "Nothing More Beyond." After Columbus discovered America, the "Nothing" was struck from the coin, leaving the inscription "More Beyond."

"More Beyond!" With this sense of the unexplored continents of truth and service before us, we have met in the Twelfth Annual Conference of the Young Friends of America.

In worship, in study, in play we have been finding together that life which is life indeed, the life of God. We are sure that no "official" God, no far-off God, no God who can be contained in a formula will suffice for our needs or the needs of humanity. Only the "God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" can help us. In that common conviction we have been thinking much of Jesus, "The Way, the Truth and the Life," and praying for that faith which clings to God and lets go all else, which believes and trusts; which says, "Thy Will be Done;" that faith which can remove our mountains.

God is love, and we have been conscious anew of the wonderful revelation of his love in the life of Jesus Christ. Such love knows no race, nor color, nor creed. It is universal. Without it we cannot have the kingdom of heaven within us or help to build that Kingdom in the world about us.

"By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." In naked, starved, soul-blighted Europe, Friends have joined together in the adventure of giving the "cup of cold water in His Name." The fellowship they have known points the way for us. Good-will and generous-mindedness which we need within our Society at home can only be achieved as we toil together in the supreme service of making all men friends of God and of one another.

A definite task to this end is at our door within our very hands. For two hundred and fifty years, our Society has been regarded as the symbol of love instead of hate, peace instead of war, freedom instead of slavery and oppression. In Africa, in Europe, in Asia, in Latin America, there are those of our numbers who are giving their lives to advance Christianity and brotherhood within the nations. To-day the prophets' vision of world disarmament is possible of fulfillment if we join whole-heartedly in this great cause. Never has the ideal of world peace been more tangible, never the call more clear—"What doeth the Lord Require of Thee?" "Arise, shine, for thy light is come."

IMPRESSIONS OF EARLHAM CONFERENCE OF ALL FRIENDS, 1921.

For some years past The Young Friends' General Conference at Earlham, Indiana, has meant inspiration and opportunity for an ever-widening circle of young people. If those who have attended these gatherings can even in a slight degree pass on their feeling of spiritual enrichment one of the greatest objects of the Conference will be fulfilled.

In the Conference this year impressions were heaped upon us day by day until we were completely overwhelmed, but as time goes on we should be able to judge more intelligently of the outstanding features and of the spirit which pervaded the whole.

It took a short time for those of us from the east to get accustomed to some of the ways of the westerners, and I think some of us felt that the Conference erred from being too strenuous rather than too restful. Possibly some of us, coming into a new realm of Quakerism for the first time, rebelled inwardly at the invasion upon our cherished ideas of what Quakerism should be. We very quickly learned, however, that Quakers are not distinguished by the form in which they worship nor the theologies in which they believe, but are recognized by the extent to which they can rise above such distinctions. If the Earlham Conference emphasized nothing else it emphasized the fact that "where there is a will there is a way," where one believes that fellowship is fundamental it will become the guiding point in one's life.

Unlike some of the previous conferences there were many girls and boys in attendance, quite young in age and experience. It was therefore very fortunate that able and sympathetic leaders were in charge of study and play. The teacher-pupil relationship was manifest along with the real comrade spirit to a degree which I have never seen equalled. For this reason the guiding spirits of the Conference were also the companions of everyone.

The morning classes were replete with concrete suggestions of how we may best serve in whatever type of Christian work we undertake. One of the misfortunes of the Conference was that we were necessarily limited in the number of classes which we were able to attend. In one of these groups, William J. Reagan helped us to see that life is a most glorious problem; that parents and teachers, probably more than anyone else, hold in their hands and hearts the key to the future. Agnes L. Tierney, by telling us in a clear, straightforward manner the history and problems of Quakerism gave us a truer foundation for our present beliefs and a wider vision for the future.

In Frederick Libby's forceful talks he made us feel the truth of the statement that "you can't have heaven within you unless you create it around you." He made us feel uncomfortable in our self-satisfaction as so-called Friends and Christians. He, in addition to many others, emphasized our present opportunity with regard to the Disarmament movement. To work for such a movement is to give positive evidence that we as Friends disbelieve in war, but do believe in struggling for better understanding among nations.

In conclusion, I feel that the Conference stirred in all of us a "Divine unrest." We can give expression to this feeling as we grow in experience and understanding. Because of this opportunity which has come to us we can be more sincere in our friendliness, more honest in our chosen work, and truer men and women in our daily lives.

EDWARD N. WRIGHT.

HODEWEOSDONC.

All morning the clouds lay so close to North Hill that it seemed as if they would tear themselves to pieces on the tree tops, but in the afternoon the drizzle stopped.

"But even if it isn't raining," said Emma, at the supper-table, "it's too damp for a corn roast. They'll never expect us this evening."

Beatrice looked up quickly, but said nothing. The rest of us fell upon our supper with true Tunesassa appetites in spite of our disappointment. For we were disappointed. Della Jimmerson had invited us two days before to a real Indian corn roast and this was the second rainy day.

After supper John took all of us, except Emma, to the post office. An errand stopped us at the railroad station and in a flash Beatrice was out of the car and into the office. In another minute she was back.

"Edison says they're getting ready for us now," she panted. Without a word we turned the car and fled back to the school for Emma.

Such an evening! Nothing ever tasted so good as those ears of corn roasted on the long pointed sticks that Jo Jimmerson had whittled beautifully. If it was a little charred here and there no one minded. "Charcoal is wholesome!" And after the corn, sandwiches and coffee and delicious cake. Then we burnt the pointed sticks one by one in the camp-fire, while the smoke blew impartially into all our faces.

At last the talk came round to the Seneca language. The girls had given each of us an Indian name and we had had great fun trying to learn to pronounce them. Then of course it was a game to see who could think of the hardest word for us to say. Finally, Della Jimmerson asked: "Can you say the word for Quaker?"

"What is it? We'll try."

"Hodeweosdonc." We tried to repeat it—to the diversion of the company.

"What does it mean?" asked Emma.

"It means 'They have made their word good.'" Della Jimmerson looked up, expecting an answer. But we were staring at each other blankly across the firelight. The same thought was in all our minds:

"What have young Friends done to deserve such a tribute?"

A. T.

AMUSEMENTS.

Much has been written and spoken regarding harmful diversions. Have we not, however, placed the emphasis on the negative instead of on the positive side of this question? And have we been striking at the root of the matter or only trying to cut away a few branches? How many of those of us who are parents do our full duty by our children when they are in the most impressionable periods of their lives?

If we plant an apple orchard and in eighteen or twenty years plant keifer pear trees ten feet from the butt of each apple the pears will not flourish.

Likewise, if we implant in the mind of the child the love of good books, of the out-of-doors, of accomplishment, of service, and of wholesome recreative games there remains little, if any, hospitable soil for the growth of the germ of the movie, the theatre and dance.

I do not know how they did it, but as far back as I can remember, my parents inculcated in my mind such a wholesome desire for the former that when I was for a few years transplanted to the city, allurements of the latter were like the seeds that fell in stony places—there simply was not sufficient soil in which they could find permanent growth.

How I pity the boys and girls who can not find anything to do and drift into the artificial places of entertainment. How I envy them the time at their disposal which if it were possible for me to have I would love to spend in the pursuit of the pleasures that were mine years ago and in the service of which the world is in such dire need.

As far back as memory carries me I loved to roam about the country side. Fishing and swimming I enjoyed, but found far greater pleasure in hunting flowers, butterflies, beetles, snakes, turtles, minerals, cocoons, wild fruits and berries, birds and animals, and other objects of Natural History. And when the weather was bad and I had to remain indoors there were the collections to be arranged and post marks, coins and postage stamps to occupy the spare hours.

Many are the mistakes of my life, but as an aid in offsetting the attractions of the harmful diversions I believe parents and teachers will find such youthful enjoyments as outlined helpful also to their children and pupils.

HERMAN COPE.

THE PRACTICAL MAN

MANUFACTURER—Jolly good outlook! Latest thing in machinery; and manager, foremen and everyone else tip-top! HIS FRIEND—Glad to hear it, our friend Underlook ought to be pleased at last.

MANUFACTURER—O, I don't know. He will have it that the engine we've got can't drive the machinery; he's always on that one line; never seems to understand that we're out for practical results.

HIS FRIEND—I know. Those pessimists are awfully limited in outlook.

FIVE YEARS LATER.

HIS FRIEND—Hello, old chap, what's up? Business slack?

MANUFACTURER—Can't make it out, kept pace with every improvement in machinery; and staff as good as ever.

HIS FRIEND—What's Underlook got to say?

MANUFACTURER—O, he's talking about his precious engine. They laugh.

A. NEAVE BRAYSHAW, in Friends' Fellowship Papers.

WHEN CAPITAL AND LABOR WORK.

Capital, in the person of Mr. Brown, came briskly down the office steps. He was on his way to an important meeting and his mind was working on perplexing problems. Just as he reached the curb where his car was waiting for him he paused. Within a few feet of where he stood, Labor, in the person of Antonio, was laying a drain. He watched the young fellow, with his specifications beside him for consultation, as he worked. Taking a few steps nearer to the worker, Mr. Brown said pleasantly, "Good morning, Antonio! Let me tell you what has just passed through my mind, 'Do your own figuring man and get ahead.'" "I haven't the education, Mr. Brown," said Antonio, "and I cannot afford to take the time, even if I had the brains for it. Besides, there is the wife and the little ones." "On the other hand," said Mr. Brown, "we have the night Trade School with an engineering course. Your day's work is not so long now as it used to be when I began to climb the ladder—" Then Mr. Brown looked at his watch and rode away in his car and Antonio returned to his drain.

A generous proportion of Mr. Brown's wealth had been devoted to the development of a trade school with evening classes, where day workers might have an opportunity to perfect themselves in special lines of work. Mr. Brown and Antonio met occasionally and a pleasant word always passed between the two, but it was not until four years later that an opportunity occurred for a conversation. This time it was Antonio who took the initiative and at his own request was ushered into Mr. Brown's office.

"I just called in, Sir, to tell you I am leaving," said Antonio. "Come now, can't we fix this up?" said Mr. Brown, "what is the trouble? You are a first rate fellow and valuable to the company. We can't afford to lose you." "Thank you, Mr. Brown, thank you, Sir, but I am going into business for myself. I thought over the advice you gave me four years ago, and then acted on it. Now I have graduated from the night school and got my diploma, and I have an opportunity to start in for myself, but before I left your employ I wanted to tell you how much I owe you for the interest you have always taken in me and all others in the business." The two men shook hands and Mr. Brown said kindly, "If you ever need any accommodation, Antonio, you know where to come." Men with Antonio's spirit are pretty sure to succeed.

The next time Mr. Brown and his former employee met, it was again Antonio who made the advance. "Mr. Brown," he said, "I want you to see my summer place on the Bay and meet my wife and family. We have a beautiful location and we want you to come down and dine with us." "Thank you," said Mr. Brown, "I will be pleased to do so. At what hour did you say?"

This is a true story in every particular. The young Italian drain layer is now a wealthy contractor and Alderman for his ward in the city. From his own happy experience, he is considerate and inspiring to those who labor for him.

When Capital and Labor meet
Then paths are smoothed for many feet.

ELIZABETH D. E. Sisson, in The American Friend.

THE PRACTICE OF BROTHERLINESS.

It seems to me that even Friends, many of them, do not realize that true religion is the practice of treating our fellow-man equally as well as ourselves; and that the Gospel of Jesus Christ is the fact that His risen, living Spirit will enable every one to actually do that, who is willing to. This spirit persists through death into that age where all live brotherly and in fellowship.

The law of godliness and brotherliness is just as binding on us as any other law of God in nature. Compare it with the laws of gravity, electricity and heat. We are compelled to obey all these laws; and the better we know and follow them the better for us, for they all work for our good. But note the result of not following in every particular any one of these laws. The consequent disaster is inexorable in retribution. It is just so in this law of godliness and brotherliness. We are created and intended to act like a god and practice brotherliness with our fellow-man; and if, in our free will, we should refuse, we must suffer the consequent, inexorable disaster in retribution.

The implication of this law is that all mankind, the world over, who are willing to practice brotherliness, shall be enabled, both here and hereafter. That all willing to do that much shall receive further knowledge as to the Will of God; but that fundamental, basic law or rule must first be conformed to. Obedience to that law of brotherliness puts us in tune or accord with the Spirit of Jesus Christ, so that further knowledge can come and further benefit be received by us.

This fact will explain the sickness and uselessness of many Friends and others who refuse to practice even that first requisite. In heaven only those who practice brotherliness exist. Of those on earth, only those willing to live that way can ever exist in heaven. When we pray that the name of our Father in heaven may be hallowed, and that His will may be done on earth as it is done in heaven, we pray that we may be enabled to act and practice brotherliness on earth, for that is the will of God, and His name or character.

The person willing to act brotherly, the world over, whether he be Chinese or Hindoo, or Zulu or British or American, is enabled. And the measure of his prayer for the new birth into that Christ character is the measure of his treatment of his fellow-man. It makes no difference what he says or what he does, if he be not willing to treat his brother-man equally as well as himself. As he treats his fellow-man, so is really his prayer that he be treated equally as well. Then that is the measure he metes out to himself, for he abides in that.

Now apply this principle to nations. You will see that the problem is not concerned with war at all, for war is only the inevitable, inexorable outcome of living in unbrotherliness; but that it is concerned vitally with the practice of brotherliness. As long as we refuse to act brotherly war must come. It is the fruition of our course of conduct. The unbrotherly man dislike war as much as the brotherly man. He does not like the crop he reaps from his own seed, but unbrotherliness always produces unbrotherliness, bringing full fruition of disaster and war and death.

Hell on earth must continue as long as men refuse to practice brotherliness; and peace on earth can only come as the inexorable outcome of fellowship—thy fellow-man equally with thyself.

THE INTERNATIONAL NEWS-SHEET.

We have at hand the first copy of the "International News-Sheet of the Young Friends' International Committee." It is significant in that it treats not only of "Problems Young Friends are Facing" in England, Ireland, America, and New Zealand, but also of International Experiments in Education, which are not the work of Friends, but which will tend to unite young people the world over.

The last paragraph, under the caption, "What We Can Do?" contains five suggestions applicable to all of us:

"Get to know the foreigners in every town, the foreign pupils in our schools, the foreign students at our universities, and extend to them the hand of fellowship. These students are generally extremely lonely, and this is a piece of international work at our very door."

"Equip ourselves mentally that we may be a powerful force in creating a new international ideal. The time has passed for vague generalities and for mere dreaming. Get groups together to study international problems."

"Think of international service as our life work. The door is open to Friends in many countries; there is an unique opportunity in Central Europe. Young Friends who can go to Central Europe and earn their living are badly needed. Opportunities abound in China, India and elsewhere."

"Correspond with young people in other lands and so make the links of friendship stronger."

"Give a subscription, however small, to the work of this committee."

To be real, religion must touch life at every point. This is just what the religion of Jesus does. True religion does not lead men to escape from the daily round and the common tasks, but enables them steadily to pursue these tasks under the sense that God's will and purpose are to be worked out in the manifold relationships and complexities of life to-day.

How strangely have we reversed the standards of Jesus in this our modern world! Why do we attach a stigma of inferiority to the life of manual labor? In itself it is good and wholesome and the organized life of the community is dependent on its right performance. And the great Master of life, Himself, labored with His hands, knew the life of hardship and poverty, learned wisdom from the things that He experienced—both what he suffered and what He enjoyed. All labor (whether of hand or brain) that expresses the creative instinct and contributes to the common good of men is to be held in honor. "Labor is sweet, for Thou has toiled." We cannot worship the Christ and despise the manual worker.

"Where the many toil together, there am I among my own,
Where the tired workman sleeth, there am I with him alone,
I, the peace that passeth knowledge, dwell amid the daily strife,
I, the bread of life am broken, in the sacrament of life."

So teach us to know the gladness of Thy presence in the work of every day. May we all be partakers in the service of the world and share the labor that is needful to the common life of men on earth. Thus may we come to share Thy spirit and to learn the secret of Thy joy and the wonder of Thy power!—ROBERT DAVIS.

"If you don't believe co-operation is necessary, watch what happens to a wagon, if one wheel comes off."

A FRIEND is one who knows all about you and likes you just the same."

FRIENDS TODAY.

From the Centennial Address at Richmond, Indiana, 1921.

The world at this present time, from Washington to Warsaw, believes in us, in our ideals, our way of life and in our spirit. If we were only as good as men think us to be our future would be well assured. Two hundred years ago we were better than most people knew or suspected; now we lag behind the estimate which has been passed upon us by a world, grateful for our work of relief and reconstruction. We are thankful, as we should be, for the appreciation which has been bestowed but we do well to feel very humble in the face of the immense expectation with which a weary and disillusioned world is turning toward us. They have had bread at our hands; but they cannot live by bread alone and now they are turning to us for those deeper truths and principles by which men really live and by which the spiritual reconstruction of the world alone can be wrought out. Economic theories, even good ones, are not enough for this situation. Panaceas of social enthusiasts will not bring the new world that is longed for. The fact should be burned into everybody's consciousness by the events of these last seven years that no world is ever safe for democracy or for any free co-operative ways of life until the men and women who compose it have been spiritually trained and disciplined. Naturalism, materialism, commercialism, imperialism, all move straight on toward the kind of collapse and débâcle which has staggered our generation. Let no one suppose that leagues of nations, disarmament conferences, or "scraps of paper" of any kind that can be patched up, will do the business for us and guarantee a future of peace and tranquility for the world. President Harding has well reminded us that the world cannot have peace until it really desires peace.

The units that compose society must be transformed in heart and fibre. A new spirit must be formed within. The working theories of life must be profoundly altered. Different ideals must be created. Truer methods of education must be worked out for the children of the future. Business, industry and commerce must be spiritualized and turned to ends of love and service. Labor must be dignified and made to promote and foster personality. Religion must be raised to its true place as the great spring of inspiration, power and joy.—RUFUS M. JONES.

EDITORIAL COMMENT.

THE SPIRIT OF YOUTH.

In a new poem by William Roscoe Thayer, we find this striking line,

"God tells His secrets to the heart of youth."

One wonders whether some of the unusual expressions of the spirit of youth during the past summer may not have been insensibly woven into this highly poetical line. It occurs, let us frankly confess, in a poem written for the dedication of a war memorial in Boston, but like most real poetry its truth is universal. A passing emotion that produced it cannot limit its application. The great army of Christian Endeavorers in New York City some weeks since made an impressive demonstration of their practical knowledge of "God's secrets." They won the recognition of the great metropolitan city, not only for the work they do, but for the religious spirit they manifested. Against prevalent waves of pessimism it was most heartening to have the so-called secular press hail their "religious spirit" as they sojourned in the city. They demonstrated one other point worthy of comment. They showed how the spirit of youth works. During the previous five years of their life as a nation-wide organization they had been inspired by the slogan, "A saloonless nation by 1921." Now youth loves a slogan. Is it not the battle-cry of the clan as of old? It concentrates unbounded energy upon some strong citadel that needs to be cast down. It appeals to the native instinct of dangerous adventure. It is a veritable Edelweiss to the youthful imagination. So the new slogan, "A Warless World by 1923," puts not alone the sixteen thousand Endeavorers in conference in New York City, but Endeavorers everywhere, in action to convince the President and Congress that they must "give us disarmament by agreement if possible; by example if necessary; and give us no narrow partisanship at all." Against a tidal wave like that who can stand?

THE STRAIGHT LINE.

THE Saturday Evening Post and numerous other journals have arrayed themselves this summer in favor of the military training camp as a valuable institution of American life. The Post uses the telling title, "Making the Boys Fit," in presenting its case. The climax of its arguments is reached in the statement that the training under absolute authority will make our boys "think and act quickly along a straight line!" Exactly, that would do for a definition of autocracy. It was the force that kept Czars in power and made so-called Prussianism even Germany's most deadly enemy. Thinking and acting "along a straight line" under authority, is the very antipode of democracy. Respect for authority is undoubtedly a crying need even of democracy. But it is the kind of respect that finds expression in the motto one reads in various public places in New England, "Obedience to law is liberty." God's law first and always, man's laws when we can believe they do no violence to God's. Schools, colleges, community centres should be aroused by this plea of "Making the Boys Fit," and find ways and means of doing it so well, that no resources of a war department can compete with them.

REFORMING THE WORLD.

It is generally conceded that the President has not been more felicitous than in a little speech made during a week-end visit in New England. It will be well to repeat the outstanding passage:

If I may tell you my own ideal for this Republic, I'd like ours to be an America of good-will, an America of perfect understanding, an America of abiding justice; nay, more, I'd like ours to be a God-fearing people committed to the task of reforming the world and teaching mankind that it is not good to make warfare. I believe that is going to be the mission of America, and if I can be your representative in promoting that ideal I shall not have served in vain.

As fine as this is in sentiment and expression it has been widely pointed out, even in administration circles, that it trips on a most unfortunate phrase. "The task of reforming the world," assumed by a nation, as well as by an individual, is heavily loaded with repulsion. And yet it is quite the most difficult point involved in any legitimate seed-sowing propaganda.

This assumed superiority is the side of propaganda that makes it utterly hateful to many.

We refer to this circumstance not to criticize the President, but to warn ourselves. It is a present-moment danger in Quakerism. If the Quaker way of living the revealed truth attracts the attention of the world—if they demand to know how we do it, certainly this is a God-given opportunity. But don't let us seem to assume that it is our truth, or even our way. It is His, who is Way, Truth and Life.

THE YOUNG FRIENDS' NUMBER.

AFTER the summer recess we are resuming the Young Friends' Number and so give our readers something of the spirit of youth noted above. No religious organization can prosper without maintaining some natural bonds between youth and age. We may like the even balance of maturity, but it is well to remember how much truth there is in the poetical expression, "the child is father of the man." So much is this, so that even the characteristic of youth to stress one impulse or one idea often reappears in age. There is, however, this difference. The one idea in age is apt to be crystallized into fixed tradition, to put its victim in a hopeless rut, while in youth everything is in flux. If the dominant idea then seems unprofitable, it may soon be superseded. Safety at any rate lies in some freedom of expression. If we are astounded in any measure at what is expressed, we may at least seek to know our responsibility for it. There are many happy evidences of a growing unity between our older and younger elements. We rejoice in this and lend ourselves to the cultivation of it with real thankfulness.

[Eds.]

THE LOST BEAUTY OF SIMPLICITY.

The vulgarity of American wealth is the subject of frequent jest abroad. Perhaps we shall see ourselves as others see us some day, and learn that our ostentation makes us ridiculous, that beauty lies in simplicity, not in ornamentation.

Perhaps some day we shall realize that our little school-girl daughters are ridiculous, not beautiful, in their French heels and silk stockings and showy dresses and rouged cheeks and elaborately dressed hair. Perhaps some day we shall see that girlish simplicity in dress and life and manner is more beautiful than cheap, unhygienic imitation of adult life and finery.

When I see the long rows of automobiles in front of our high schools these days, I say to myself, "Someone is robbing these lads and lassies of the long, brisk walk under trees turning to golden glory under autumn's magic wand, robbing them of the thump and pound of rushing blood with which the exhilarating walk or run feeds the brain cells, robbing them of lithe limbs and health-tinted cheeks." I grant grudgingly that automobiles may help us adults to rush a little faster in the performance of our tasks, but I can't help but question whether they are not the enemies of children, veritable robbers of childhood.

The simple life of the old New England home, as I recall it, with its run to school through the stinging cold, its homely "chores" in the home, its evenings at the fireside with the family and great books, was better far for the child, in my judgment, than all the Solomon's glory with which we are loading him today.

In the matter of amusements America must return to simplicity too. We are told that Americans are amusement-mad, and sometimes it seems as though the charge were true. Long ago Xerxes, the Persian monarch, living among the luxuries and extravagances of a royal court, offered a reward to the inventor of a new amusement. The incident mirrors the restless, discontented heart of seekers after artificial pleasures in all ages. We must have something new, a new thrill! And so we go from extravagance, from absurdity to absurdity.

What we need to relearn is that natural, simple pleasures are the most satisfying, and that they best recreate exhausted bodies and minds. Someone has remarked that every time he reads Carlton's "One Way Out," he learns a new way to be happy without its costing anything, and it helps him to save at least five or ten dollars every month. Ways to be happy without its costing anything—thank God, they are all about us!

Solomon's glory costs so much! It costs dear in labor and worry and tears and nerves and muscles.

Is it worth the heavy price many pay for it?

Simpler dress, simpler food, simpler amusements—how they would wipe out at one stroke most of the worries that harass our bodies, minds and souls!—S. S. ESTEY, in Churchman Afield.

THE SEVENTH MONTH "EXAMINER."

Friends' Quarterly Examiner for Seventh Month was delayed in reaching the Editors, which accounts for the tardiness of the present notice. There are eight articles in this number. The first, "Idle Giants," by L. Violet Hodgkin, treats in her inimitably graceful style of an estuary on the West Coast of England filled with great ships, mostly foreign prizes, now falling to rust and ruin. An American reader thinks at once of the same prodigal, wanton waste in the great Hog Island yards, and the lesson so deftly though indirectly taught, of the wilful extravagance entailed by militarism, comes home to us as well, and just as forcibly. Dr. James Pearce has a scholarly essay on "Sir Thomas Browne and the Religio Medici:" then follows "The Napoleonic Legend in 1921," by Roger H. Soltan, whom the members of the Mission des Amis will recall with affection, and "The Problem of Unemployment," by Gladys M. Hall. Next in order comes a defence of the much-maligned "Eighteenth Century Quaker," by John Edward Southall, of Wales, probably himself the nearest approach to that type of any British Friend now living. Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin treats, in a nineteen page article (the longest in this issue), of "Chinese Quakerism at Work," being his freshly-gathered impressions sent home in advance of his return. A report on the "New Town" scheme, of much interest to "social order" students on both sides of the water, by Ralph H. Crowley, M. D., is followed by a very thoughtful paper on "The Recording of Ministers," by William C. Braithwaite. The writer does not appear to desire, as do so many who discuss this important question today, the abolition of the practice, reminds us once more that it is but the acknowledging of a gift, and that it should never seem to set apart the ministers into a special priestly or pastoral class. He does not want the ministers "levelled down" to the dead-line of the meeting, rather he pleads for the "levelling-up" of the rest of the meeting by the proper acknowledgement of all sorts of other gifts in addition to those of the ministry and eldership, thus recalling John William Graham's pithy sentence, that the Society of Friends has no lay membership.

MY PORTION.

I know not what a day may bring;

For now 'tis sorrow that I sing,

And now 'tis joy.

In both a Father's hand I see;

For one renews the man in me,

And one the boy.

OUR Society at the present time is expending a vast amount of energy in the world, directing it as far as it is able along the true path in the revolution at this moment in progress. That activity, I believe, draws its inspiration from the meetings for worship, and if it is to be kept up we must be continually building up earnest souls in the silence of our meetings; gathering in the people and passing them through the crucible which produced our present leaders—CHARLES H. BARNES.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

BETTY OF SOUTHLAND.—(The following is a true story of a little girl who was helped by the good school for colored people called appropriately "Southland"—for it is in the far South. There schools are few, and funds to educate the children even fewer. In our zeal for the little children abroad let us not forget those at our own doors, and let us rejoice in the good this school is doing for Betty and others.) You have asked me to tell you a "life story" and I hesitate, for, while in memory there come thronging many tales of these dusky children of the Southland, they seem too pitiful and too sacred to repeat. But I can tell you the story of Betty for it has such a dear, happy ending.

Poor frail little ten-year-old Betty, white as any white child and with deep, dark eyes which made more striking the paleness of her face, came to the Southland school and asked for a place.

"Oh, yes, she could work. She chopped cotton at home day in and day out and picked it, too. Oh, no, she did not mind the hot sun,—sometimes it did get cold and frosty at picking time," but "please let me stay," she pleaded, "I won't even mind the cold."

From whence had Betty come? Her home was some five miles away from the College, in a small cabin on a bleak, dreary hillside. She had a mother who loved her child, but she knew no father. The dark man who lived in the house and came back from town drunk nearly every week and was so abusive, was not her father. The older children had to leave home early and now that Betty was ten, she needs must seek shelter elsewhere.

Her mother started her off that day with her little package. The brother who was younger and quite as delicate, a homely, little freckled-faced fellow, followed her a part of the way begging her not to go. For a mile they walked hand in hand crying and then he turned back and she resolutely went on.

Would Southland permit her to stay? There were no funds for her care, but her pleadings prevailed and she remained, staying for fourteen years.

Betty proved to be a very capable, responsive child. She worked well in school and out and played well between times. I might tell you of some of her many childhood pranks, for they crowd so upon memory,—how she rode the very, very old mule "Standback" who would never move out of a slow walk going, but would come in strong on the homestretch with Betty sticking on like a leech; or I could tell of the time she washed her mother's seven little white kittens with good lye soap and water causing their early demise, or about the first dress she ever made which was carried about so much when she was working on it that she lost both sleeves. But she was just a very normal child and you already know this part of the story perhaps too well.

Life seemed to her a great joy and her cheery, free laugh was contagious; but there were two real sorrows for her. Whenever she made a visit to her mother she would come back with a heavy heart. Her mother was poor, ignorant and superstitious, and being roughly treated by the man of the house, always poured out a tale of great woe and distress whenever the child visited her, so Betty's heart sometimes ached almost to breaking.

The other sorrow was for the little brother. He would visit her at long intervals, too bashful to enter the campus, but he would whistle a call and Betty would greet him at the front fence. There they would talk, he on one side and she on the other. Back and forth they would pass little trinkets through the palings and at the end of an hour the good-bye kiss was given the same way. Then he would leave without looking back and she would stand with her hands over her eyes trying to keep the tears away.

Her childhood passed rapidly for there was so much to do and so much to study and to learn. When Betty was fourteen years old she joined the Friends' Church and took an active part in all the services.

Years passed, she graduated from the eighth grade in school and then finally finished the High School course. The large audience that listened to her Commencement oration was stormy in its applause, for she was an excellent speaker and had chosen a subject she knew—"The Drunkard."

She taught in the Primary Department for two years and had charge of the students' dining hall, giving good service in both positions.

Then a boy came to school one day who looked like all the rest of the boys to us, but not so to Betty.

He stayed only one year and then left, going to California where he had work. For several months Betty debated "the question," asking, "tell me what to do?" Finally, the ticket was bought and she left us going to him. Oh! no, I was not the only one trying to hide the tears. It reminded me of the long ago when in childhood, the little freckled-faced brother walked away.

More than three years have passed since then and only a few weeks ago Betty slipped back to Southland for a visit, and walked into the morning church service unannounced as of old,—the same dear girl only grown into a good woman. Our own little Betty now a woman! A woman with a nice home of her own, and living a life of inspiration and service in her community.

The old mother still lives on the bleak hillside in the same rented cabin. The man, now by the law of the land a step-father, is there too. They have changed none. Sometimes a sister is there, having deserted her husband and eight children, and Betty would be there too, if Southland had not given her a working chance.

Do you think it was worth while? Do you think it paid in dollars and cents?

To-day there are twenty and more Bettys asking to come to school at Southland. Every mail brings letters from those begging to be allowed to come, but even some already here must be sent away unless funds are provided to keep them. One little girl must go back into the swamps of Louisiana, into a lumber camp, unless something is provided for her soon. They don't ask for any easy road—only a chance to work to earn their way. Shall they be denied?

TWO PENNIES.—Dwight jingled the two pennies that his father had given him as he felt them in his pocket. Then he took them out and looked at them. They were just alike; each was made of bright copper, they were of the same size, and each had a picture of an Indian on one side.

"One lollipop, please," Dwight said, as he went into the store and laid one penny down on the counter. "And one pencil," he added, laying the other penny down.

So that was the end of Dwight's pennies, but not exactly.

The lollipop began going at once, and in a very short time it was all gone. The pencil, which was made of lead and very useful, went to work.

It made ever so many pictures to give Dwight pleasure on a rainy day. It went to school with him and wrote such a fine composition that it earned him a high mark. Then it wrote some neat labels, with Dwight's help, for mother's canning-jars. She said they would last as well as inked labels, and she gave Dwight five cents for helping her so much.

If those two pennies could have talked things over, which penny, do you suppose, would feel as if it had amounted to something in the world?—Exchange.

It is the incarnation of God's spirit in man that must be the force driving us into service. The danger is that in this money and pleasure-loving, utilitarian age the soul of man is being starved. The spiritual side of man needs nourishment, but we haven't time for it. The true sacramental life unites these two aspects, and it is this wonderful balance of Jesus' life that makes its strongest appeal to us. His times of prayer and communion were the source of the power which went out in service among the poor and needy of his day.—ERNEST E. UNWIN.

BOOK REVIEWS.

LITERARY NOTES.

The Weekly Review for Seventh Month published an article by Richard M. Gummere, Headmaster of the William Penn Charter School of Philadelphia, entitled, "Vocational Tyranny."

Among other publications in German dealing with Friends are announced the following: "Joan Mary Fry, Das Sakrament des Lebens; Ein Quäkerbuch. Schüchtern: Neuwelt-Verlag. Wilhelm Schäfer, Drei Briefe, mit einem Nachwort, an die Quaker. Munich, G. Müller.

Louis Gannett, for some time connected with the Relief Mission of Friends in France, is contributing to the Nation (New York) a series of articles on Russia in which the handful of English and American Friends engaged in relief work figure prominently. The London namesake of the Nation writing editorially about the Russian famine says: "Happily, there is in the Society of Friends an organization which has earned the confidence and the gratitude of Moscow, as indeed it has won the trust of every race, Christian or pagan, throughout the world."

Among the articles announced for the Ninth Month number of the Journal of Religion is one by Rufus M. Jones on "Psychology and the Spiritual Life."

Several reviews of The Early Christian Attitude to War by our friend C. J. Cadoux have recently appeared, including the Journal of Theological Studies and the periodical published by the Roman Catholic Bollandist Society. Professor Von Harnack of Berlin says of it in the Theologische Literaturzeitung:

"His decisions are everywhere carefully weighed, so that the book, though it offers nothing new, may be considered the conclusion of strife over these questions. The opposition of early Christianity to war comes even more sharply to light than in my own presentation of the subject, and I find no ground to question this as the theory of primitive Christianity."

HENRY J. CADBURY.

CHINA, CAPTIVE OR FREE?*

The author of this work has been a resident in China for nearly four decades and acknowledges his pro-Chinese proclivities, yet at the same time an honest attempt is made to be fair to other nations in discussing their relations with China.

A comparison is made of the German occupation of Kiaochow with the Japanese invasion of Shantung, with evidence to show that the former condition was much more to the advantage of the Chinese. Throughout the long series of intrigues and encroachments by European nations and Japan, Germany has shown herself, on the whole, the most considerate to the Chinese themselves.

China was forced into the European war through the influence and intrigue of the United States, Great Britain, France and Japan. Great Britain and France seem to have been actuated chiefly by the desire to use China's entrance as a lever to force Germans out of the country as a commercial rival. Japan saw the opportunity to gain a secure foothold in the country, and the United States while urging China to enter the war because of the claims that she might have at the peace table, failed to make good the assurances that had been given.

One of the most illuminating of the chapters is entitled the "Blow Struck at China." The author declares that "comparing what China got under the section entitled 'China' and what Japan got under the section entitled 'Shantung,' it seems to me much as if the Big Three—the greatest men in the world—had given Japan a most sumptuous repast and at the close had handed as a 'tip' a few dimes or paper rubles to China, standing by in watchful waiting."

In considering the future prospects of China it is evident that her worst enemies are not in Tokio but in Peking. Moral reform in the politics of the country is of prime importance. She must abandon her militaristic methods, there must be a reunion of the North and South.

However great the estrangement between the two countries may be, it is of no benefit to China to increase it, but rather to cement the old bonds of friendship and to regain her rights by direct approach to Japan. China should renew her friendship with Germany as soon as possible, as well as with other nations, and she should bend herself to the task of building up a merchant marine.

The author closes his book by enumerating ten principles which bear on the Chinese problem. Among these may be mentioned the need of all nations being actuated by lofty principles and a desire to establish peace and reconciliation. Diplomats should study conditions at first hand in the Orient and not judge them by European standards. Residents of any country, including China, must consider the interests of that country of prime importance so long as they reside there. The Chinese must be given more independence of action in controlling their own affairs, and the ideal of universal brotherhood among all races of mankind must become a dominating principle in the polity of nations.

To all those who are interested in the great problems relating to the Orient, which are bound to come up at the coming Congress on Disarmament a careful perusal of this book is highly recommended.

THE FRIENDS IN STARVING RUSSIA.

RUSSIANS, CERTAIN OF DEATH, CALMLY AWAIT THEIR FATE.

The failure of the Russian crop equals all the advance descriptions which have been made of it. League upon league of vast fields of fertile black earth lie desolate and bare as far as the eye can reach without a sign that a crop has been harvested from them. The peasants speak only of their larders and of the total failure of one staple food crop after another. On all sides is heard their fatalistic and quite Russian acceptance of the situation, "This winter we die," which is true regarding the vast mass of the peasantry unless relief on a large scale comes from outside.

Very little land has been plowed for fall sowing, for none of the promised seed-grain has arrived in any of the villages visited and peasants have too little confidence in its arrival to waste time in preparing the fields. They are living now, in most cases, on miserable famine bread, composed principally of linden leaves, dried and beaten into an improvised meal, mixed with sunflower seeds, grass and other substitutes for food, and what little rye, wheat or oats can be gleaned from the burned-out fields. They have also a few potatoes, cabbages and watermelons, and a little milk from their scraggy cows and goats. Thanks to the consumption of their summer's harvest, which they ate instead of using it for seed, the adult population and the larger children still have a fair share of food, though the youngsters up to four and five years old already are broken down in health through undernourishment.

Throughout the whole country the population is only a step or two ahead of absolute starvation, and within six weeks or two months the country will be literally stripped of food.

The mass migration of the country population officially has been stopped or is under control, but all the roads leading from Samara are filled with many fugitives with wagons, or even hand carts, loaded with their effects, headed away from the starvation they know of to what may be no better but cannot possibly be worse. They have not the vaguest idea as to where they are going. Their numbers are not the millions mentioned in some reports, but they run five to six families to the average mile of road. At night they are camped all along the wayside, their horses turned out to pasture, and families camping under the wagons or in the open air. Some already have reached the end of their journey owing to the death of their horses. One sample case is that of an intelligent peasant living within one hundred miles of Samara. He started with his wife, two children and a horse-cart for Samara, hoping to obtain work on the railroad. His horse dropped exhausted twenty miles from Samara and left the family foodless and stranded.

Every creek and rivulet has been dry for many months. Peasant mothers are in despair over their children. One mother in the famine district killed her child rather than let it starve, and another mother, of six children, said: "I am tempted to do the same. I wish the cholera or some other quick death would come and take my children before winter."

(From the Philadelphia Ledger's account of the Russian famine.)

HOOVER'S REPORT OF CONDITIONS IN RUSSIA.

At a meeting of the European Relief Council in Washington on Eighth Month 24th, Herbert Hoover, who called the meeting, made an introductory announcement in which he brought out the following survey. He said that reports which he had received, indicated that we face the greatest tragedy the world has ever seen, or seen for many generations at least. Of fifty-four Russian provinces, forty-four were self-supporting, and all but ten were able to export. Only ten of the self-supporting provinces have been visited by the drouth, but of the remaining thirty-four formerly self-supporting, only four are able to furnish food beyond their borders. Many of the remaining thirty cannot support themselves. There are, therefore, ten provinces suffering from drouth and forty-four suffering from famine in varying degrees.

THE QUAKERS IN RUSSIA.

The most serious shortage, obviously, is in milk and fats—and in soap. Everybody is short of soap in Russia. Despite that people are remarkably clean. The cleanliness campaigns waged by the Health Commissariat must have been extraordinarily effective. Many of the children's institutions about Moscow wash their sheets with wood ashes instead of soap; an effete American is amazed at the resultant cleanliness—but soap would be easier. Hence the Quakers, who were first among Western relief organizations to begin work in Russia, just as, two years ago, they were first to feed children in the Central Empires, have very largely concentrated their efforts thus far on soap and fat and milk.

The Quakers are, to be sure, distributing supplies for other organizations as well. The A. R. A. turned over to the Quakers $100,000 worth of condensed milk and vegetable oil—eight carloads of the former and six of the latter; and the Red Cross gave $50,000 worth of medicine and clothing. The British Quakers, together with the British Save the Children Fund, raised about $250,000 for relief work in Russia, and the American Friends' Service Committee, with its allied organizations, has done the rest.

These funds and supplies were, when I was in Russia two months ago, being utilized in Moscow alone. Work has since begun in Petrograd, where the faces on the streets show the mark of hunger far more vividly than in Moscow. Distribution of supplies provided by the Jewish Joint Distribution Committee has also begun from Minsk, and one of the Quaker workers, Anna Haines, has just gone, with a first cargo of supplies, to Samara, in the famine zone, and will shortly return to America to report. The Quakers have thus far been hampered by lack of personnel. They have only six workers in Russia today, but with these work a staff of friendly Russians—including a former London Russian anarchist, two mechanics formerly employed in the Ford shops in Detroit, a Greek chauffeur, and several Russians who have never been out of Russia, some of them Communist and some of them non-Communist. Three or four old United States army cars, which were turned over to the Quakers in France after the armistice, served the period of relief work there, then moved to Vienna for a twelvemonth, now distribute the Quaker supplies in Moscow.

Distribution is accomplished through the schools. Hitherto the Quaker work has been almost entirely confined to babies and school-children. The field of need is so vast and the funds in proportion so slight that concentration of effort was required. During last Fifth Month, for instance, more than 70,000 Moscow school-children received a pound of soap apiece. I passed a day carrying soap to the schools. Each school presents its list of pupils; the total is checked, the soap delivered, a receipt taken, and later the children sign individual receipts. There may be some slight loss occasionally, but the obvious test of fraud is the public markets, and thus far not a single cake of any Quaker-distributed brand of soap, nor any tin of their milk, has been discovered in any of the Moscow markets; and every report of such discoveries has been rapidly investigated.

Stories of pilfering in Russia are legion. The fact is that the actual loss from stealing in Russia has been less than the loss suffered by the Quakers from stealing in Germany, absolutely or relatively. Not a single case of goods has been lost, occasionally a few tins have been stolen out of a case. To anyone familiar with relief work, even in Western Europe, that record is a marvel. Three times freight cars have gone astray, and the suspicion of theft has arisen. Each time the carload has been traced and recovered. There is stealing in Russia, as in other countries; it has not yet affected the Quaker supplies. Circumstantial stories have come to the Quakers of misuse of their supplies, as in the case where their chocolate was reported to be on sale at a particular market—before they had begun importing chocolate!

Nor have government officials interfered with or obstructed the work. On the contrary, they have given it unusual facilities, supplied gasoline and oil for the cars, obtained a warehouse, granted office space, etc. They are suspicious of new workers and examine them carefully before they admit them to Russia. But the most recent cables indicate that the famine has brought about more readiness to admit unknown workers—if they come with supplies in their wake.

What the Quakers have done is, of course, very little compared to the possibilities and needs in Russia. The famine on the Volga cries out for relief on an infinitely larger scale. But the Quakers have opened the way for large-scale relief.—LEWIS S. GANNETT, in The Nation. (Formerly of the Friends' Unit in France.)

SHIPMENTS received during week ending Ninth Month 3, 1921—125 boxes and packages; 1 from Mennonites; 8 for German Relief.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

"WAR DOES NOT PAY."

"Let us dedicate ourselves to the task of impressing on our public leaders the lesson that we know: that war does not pay."

These are words used by Franklin D'Olier, former Commander of the American Legion, when speaking at Chateau-Thierry at the dedication of the new Roosevelt Bridge over the Marne. Such sentiment coming from men who fought, means more than if it came from those who never knew the full significance of the destruction of men by their fellow-men.

The true soldier does not need a reminder that the glory of war is only in the sublimity of devotion manifest, not in the killing. It is those who never fought who require to be told that war should be abolished, as a heinous crime of man against man.—From the Public Ledger (Philadelphia).

THE PEACE PORTAL.

A visible memorial of the one hundred years of peace along the three thousand miles of unfortified boundary between Canada and the United States has just been dedicated at the little border town of Blaine in the State of Washington. It is an arch built of concrete and steel, resting half on Canadian and half on American soil and through it runs the Pacific highway, which extends from Vancouver, B. C., to a point in Lower California, a distance of nearly two thousand miles.

"What has been done by two great groups of peoples, facing each other along three thousand miles of boundary, can be done by other and greater groups of humanity watching each other across four thousand miles of sea. It is the task of the Washington conference to find the ways and means of reaching the understandings and the agreements that will make this one of the great facts of history.

"It can be done. That steel and stone gate that stands hard by the Pacific, away up in the Northwest, symbolizing a peace untroubled for more than one hundred years, shows that when governments want peace and desire disarmament they can have them."

PRESIDENT HARDING AT THE ARMY WAR COLLEGE.

Those of us who are hoping for so great results from the Washington Disarmament Conference must always keep in mind that the number of people in the world who think that it is possible at this stage of human development for war to be entirely abolished, is really very small. We must therefore not be seriously troubled at President Harding's recent remarks at the opening of the Army War College, when he said: "I think there will be less armies and less navies, I wish it with all my heart. But there never will come a time when there will not be a requisite agency for the maintenance of law and authority and for national defense. It is perfectly futile to think there may never be conflict when you stop to consider that in two thousand years of Christian civilization . . . we have only lately come to a real civilized state of warfare." And yet the President is doubtless entirely sincere in his efforts to reduce the burden of armaments the world over and to endeavor to make war as nearly impossible as may be.

THE ASSEMBLY OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS MEETS.

Although the Washington Conference on Disarmament almost engrosses the attention of peace people in this country, the League of Nations, in which forty-six countries are represented, quietly proceeds with its work. Its prestige has been increased by the reference to it by the Supreme Council of the knotty problem of how to divide Upper Silesia, when the latter body was unable to reach a decision. Members of the International Court of Justice under the League of Nations are to be chosen this month by the Assembly and the Council of the League. The Commission on Disarmament is already at work.

The Assembly of the League of Nations met in Geneva the early part of this month and H. A. Van Karnebeck, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Holland, was elected President. Hungary is applying for membership and also Latvia, Lithuania, Ukraine, Azerbaizan, Georgia, Armenia and Lichtenstein. It is possible that Germany also may apply for admission.

TWO PEACE PAMPHLETS WORTH HAVING.

If any readers of THE FRIEND have not yet done so, they should read Elbert Russell's address, "A Quaker Challenge to a World of Force," delivered in New York last spring and Harry Emerson Fosdick's disarmament sermon, "Shall We End War?" The two treatments supplement each other rather well and both are worth having. The Friends' Peace Committee, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, will gladly send them without charge to anyone requesting a copy of each.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

A PRIVATE letter from Berlin tells of the presence of Abner and Ella Newlin at the meeting there. In spite of their inability to speak German, they appear to be getting on remarkably as they travel about, and to be accomplishing valuable service in the cause which led them forth. Their being thus helped through the various difficulties of traveling in strange lands in the Lord's service is no surprise to some of their friends. "He is faithful that promised."

THE concluding meeting of the appointments made last spring at Barnegat, N. J., was held on the 4th. There was a good attendance although not as large as a month previous. The holiday week-end had made a condition unfavorable to well-attended meetings. Wm. Bishop, Max I. Reich and Alfred Lowry had acceptable vocal service. These three Friends were also at Tuckerton in the morning where thirty-six persons assembled.

From a private letter we learn that Emma Maria Bishop has been sojourning in Canada this summer, mostly with a brother. She has had opportunity to be at some small meetings and to visit Anna and Delia Crawford and Yardley Warner. With the approach of autumn she intends to resume her service in the States. It is likely she will go from Buffalo to Tunesassa, thence to Ithaca for the Cornell group, and after that probably to Wellesley.

In addition to the list of Friends printed in last number as expecting to be at Ohio Yearly Meeting, we are glad now to note that Sarah W. Cooper, a minister of Arch Street Monthly Meeting, was able to join Wm. T. and Eleanor R. Elkinton.

NOTICES.

Jews in Russia.—A meeting has been appointed for the 22nd inst. at Twelfth Street Meeting-house, at 7.45 p. m. (Daylight Saving Time) to hear an account of the material and spiritual conditions prevailing among the Jews in South Russia; to be addressed by Peter Gorodish, of Kieff, Russia, who has just arrived from the district where hundreds of thousands of Jews were massacred, and where a large number of Jews have become Christians, and have formed themselves into a Hebrew Christian Church of their own. Peter Gorodish has been invited to this country by "The Hebrew-Christian Alliance of America," of which Max I. Reich is President, who will introduce him and interpret for him. Friends and others are invited to attend this meeting.

By authority of Eveleth Monthly Meeting, an appointed meeting is to be held at Mt. Laurel, N. J., on First-day afternoon, Ninth Month 18, 1921, at three o'clock, new time. An invitation is extended to all interested Friends.

PROBABLY no characteristic of Tannate is so outstanding as its durability and long life in service at hard work. The Tannate tannage produces a tough, pliable, elastic leather that withstands hard belting conditions considerably longer than oak tanned belting.

LAMBETH DOCUMENTS AND FRIENDS.

One of the important principles taught by the early Friends and veritably practiced by them from that day to this, has been the priceless value of the individual in the sight of his Maker, as he stood apart by himself.

To the Friend the individual was first, the gathered church was only second.

The principle has gained relatively few converts since it was revived in the seventeenth century, and today, when men of every creed and color of persuasion are calling for a united fellowship and a union of the churches, we are confronted by the decisions of a great conference of church dignitaries, called for the very purpose of reconciling "minor differences," that the united church of Christendom may present a front "more imposing and more impregnable" than she has ever been able to show.

Does it seem narrow and self-centred for the weakest, numerically, of the Protestant churches to find much in the decisions of the great conference with which it cannot unite?

Does it beget in any the feeling that, after all, we may, as a body, be really out of touch with the great march of Christian thought and endeavor, which is gripping not a few of the dedicated servants of our common Master?

Do we fail to allow the scales to be lifted from our eyes that we may see that there is a spirit leading out of the entanglements of priestcraft into an atmosphere where each soul knows for itself so close a communion with the Father and so real a fellowship with Jesus Christ, His Son, that no priest is needed to interpose his sanctions?

Are there any among us ready to question whether two hundred and fifty years are not enough to test out this principle, which seems to us to be so fundamental?

It is no time to lose faith in the past. It may be that the apparent inability of the leaders of this great conference to come to a conclusion more nearly in line with our point of view is a fresh indication of the life that is stirring in the great body of the people, and announces with some confidence the approach of that day, that it would, at first thought, seem to have made more remote.

The cry is incessant from the churches themselves that they are not advancing as they should in the service to which they are called. This takes shape in at least these three searching queries to which our attention is daily drawn in the press:

(1) Why are there so many empty pulpits and relatively so few qualifying to fill them? (2) Why is the type of the so-called divinity student not advancing to the same extent as pertains in our law and medical schools? (3) Why does the church fail to grapple with the most pressing problems of the day, those that most vitally concern us all?

These queries could be increased, but they satisfy, for the present, the object had in view, and should suggest wholesome and far-reaching answers to other related questions, which the Friend finds himself at times confronting.

We must never lose sight of the plain fact of history that there are two essentials of every reform movement. The first demands that the people have advanced far enough to present a field for the expected reformation to work in; the second, that God let loose His reformers. One is not less essential than the other for the carrying forward of any reform movement. We think of Luther, Fox, and Wesley, largely in the latter light, but for a perfect setting of our picture we need to widen its scope and include a foreground that may embrace many previous years or generations of people.

If the early Friends saw more clearly than others the true relationship of man with God, and we believe they did, at least part of their plain duty must have been to promulgate this doctrine whenever and wherever they could. How faithful or how unfaithful they have been to this duty we need not question. It is not because this is Quaker doctrine that we plead for it, but because it is, to us, the only sound, basic principle on which a reconciled Christian Church can be built. The attitude of this principle toward all the questions that divide Christendom today is not difficult to find, for in its original presentation it was naught less than "primitive Christianity revived."

It is little that the ordinary man can do to foster this, but God has most often seen fit to work through the ordinary man, and the marvels He has wrought through him have been the great levers and advancing agencies of all progress.

That Friends have always taken an advanced stand in the great moral reforms that have been made during the period of their existence is alluded to by almost every one who dips his pen in ink to write about them. Is there anything significant that in the findings of the Lambeth Conference we have conclusions almost as much out of joint with the Quaker ideals as though they had been given forth in 1670 rather than in 1921?

That there is much in the report which we can accept is evident, but the following four distinct findings, taken from the "Report of the Lambeth Conference on Christian Reunion" show that fundamentally there is an unbridged gap: "We believe (it recites) that the visible unity of the Church will be found to involve the whole-hearted acceptance of the Holy Scriptures, as the record of God's revelation of Himself to man, and as being the rule and ultimate standard of faith; and the Creed, commonly called Nicene, as the sufficient statement of the Christian faith, and either it or the Apostles' Creed as the baptismal confession of belief; the divinely instituted sacraments of Baptism and the Holy Communion, as expressing for all the corporate life of the whole fellowship in and with Christ; a ministry acknowledged by every part of the Church as possessing not only the inward call of the spirit, but also the commission of Christ and the authority of the whole body."

We cannot tell how much the Quaker trend of preaching and teaching has influenced thinking people in regard to the fundamentals that the Conference has set its seal of approval upon. There may be a very wide margin of divergence between the findings of the Conference and the real feelings of the rank and file of men and women within and without the Christian fold.

Oftentimes a change that has been approaching very gradually seems to the onlooker to have accomplished its results in a single day; so it may be that the Friends' concept of the true relation of man to our Heavenly Father has gained vantage which we do not comprehend, that the spirituality of Christ's kingdom is more nearly realized today in a multitude of human hearts than ever before, and we need to take courage and pass on the word of cheer as we feel it.

D. H. F.

LAY RELIGION: THE HOPE OF THE FUTURE.*

[The following is re-printed from The Friend (London) of twenty-sixth of Eighth Month, where it appeared as an editorial. Many Friends cherish the belief that the simple form of Christianity which Friends have professed presents the most hopeful basis of unity. The divisive elements in any attempted expression of religion in Orders or Ordinances may be momentarily in abeyance, but heretofore they have always emerged in "fierce controversy." If Friends have a real contribution to make in this most important field, they need to feel, probably much more than they do, a sense of mission and to have greater faith in Lay Religion. Christ's leadership in the Church is impeded by our apathy and lack of faith.—F.N.S.]

The shock which—in common, surely, with all Quakers—one felt on first hearing the terms of the "Lambeth Appeal on Christian Re-union" revealed a difference between our position and that of the Churches, much more fundamental and deep than one hitherto suspected. "We believe (says the 'Appeal') that the visible unity of the Church will be found to involve the whole-hearted acceptance of the Holy Scriptures, as the record of God's revelation of Himself to man, and as being the rule and ultimate standard of faith; and the Creed, commonly called Nicene, as the sufficient statement of the Christian faith, and either it or the Apostles' Creed as the baptismal confession of belief; the divinely instituted sacraments of Baptism and the Holy Communion, as expressing for all the corporate life of the whole fellowship in and with Christ; a ministry acknowledged by every part of the Church as possessing not only the inward call of the spirit, but also the commission of Christ and the authority of the whole body." Without entering into detail, it seems plain that if any kind of Christian reunion arises in response to the bishop's appeal, it will leave the Society of Friends outside. We cannot 'accept wholeheartedly' any of these four points, and the more one contemplates compromise in the interests of unity, the more surely one realizes that it is impossible for us to concede anything in this matter without betraying the great principles on which Quakerism rests, and on which (we believe) the future of Christianity also depends.

The challenge of the "Appeal" brings Friends directly to the position taken by Henry T. Hodgkin in his book on Lay Religion. As he says, there are two kinds of religion, eternally antagonistic to each other and mutually exclusive. The one may be termed esoteric, partaking of the nature of a cult, whose mysteries are revealed to the initiated alone, who in turn interpret them 'as they can bear' to the laity; whose priests wear a peculiar dress, and alone are permitted to perform the essential rites; a religion which regards certain days, certain places and certain persons as peculiarly sacred. The other is essentially democratic, requiring neither priest, temple nor ceremonial, and regarding all men and women as real or potential vehicles for the Spirit of God, and religion a universal human quality. The 'democratic' form of religion is represented—almost alone amongst religious bodies—by our Society, whose continued existence for over two hundred and fifty years is a challenge to the whole system of the prelacy. In the very nature of the case, a conference of bishops is as inherently unable to offer a basis of Christian unity acceptable to Friends as are the Allied Powers, victorious in the war, to treat Germany fairly in the matter of reparation!

As regards the Lambeth document, whilst, no doubt, the bishops feel that they are conceding much, it is evident throughout that their outlook is that of 'priests of the cult' rather than that of the rank and file of Christian worshippers. The tendency of the age is towards more individual freedom in matters of belief; and, with the march of popular education, it is impossible to believe that those churches which rely upon a separated and sacrosanct ministry will ever again command the allegiance of the people.

It is a significant fact that all but one of the Hebrew prophets were laymen. Every 'Reformation' too, which the Christian Church has experienced, has been directed against some priestly claim which had become no longer tenable; the 'reformed' priesthood, unfortunately, always contriving to establish itself with an authority very little diminished by reform, until new 'nonconformists' arose who achieved a fresh Reformation. The credentials of the new priesthood were always denied by the old; so that in our day the Roman Church refuses to recognize Anglican orders; the Anglican Archbishop of York cannot approve of Dr. Jowett, the eminent Nonconformist minister, preaching in Durham Cathedral; similarly the Nonconformist ministry denies to laymen the right of conducting the communion service; and nearly all denominations agree, more or less, in relegating women to a subordinate position in the Church.

The priestly system encourages intellectual dishonesty. It assumes (although its adherents frequently admit the falsity of the assumptions) that the ordination of a priest ipso facto endows him, for the remainder of his life, with peculiar sanctity; that women are incapable of this special grace; that churches are, more than other buildings, the abode of God; that their ceremonies (e. g., baptism) have some peculiar virtue; that all the Scriptures were 'written by the finger of God'; and are therefore equally authoritative. The interests of true religion demand that these assumptions shall be denied—in practice, as well as in word. The bishops, through the 'Lambeth Appeal,' wish to perpetuate them. The system also hinders the spiritual growth of its members. The distinction between clergy and laity places each in a false position. The one is revered as something more than human; the other, by contrast, is inclined to disparage himself and to belittle his moral and spiritual capacity. The average church-goer will rarely advance a Christian argument in matters political or commercial. He leaves that to the clergy, and himself feels free to compromise Christian principles and to postpone their application to the world until some far-off millennium, when human nature shall have been regenerated. This in turn perverts the clergy into compromise. Further, the established system acts as a drag on the wheels of truth. "Slowly the Bible of the race is writ;" new conceptions of God come to enlighten ened souls who, in a lay community, would share their spiritual vision with others until the whole "church" had seen the light. But the clergy must officially close their eyes to the fuller vision, delaying the truth for safety's sake; even if they do not jealously persecute the new seer for heresy.

Hope for the future lies in a more universal recognition of the fact that human personality is a spiritual thing, partaking of the very nature of God, and capable of infinite moral and spiritual development; that man's true home is in the Father, and that he is a "prodigal" whenever he wastes his substance by the starvation of his spiritual nature. This can only come about as we endeavor to make all times and places sacred, and, abolishing the distinction between clergy and laity, make every man his own priest and invest every village carpenter with the power to teach with authority—the authority of spiritual experience. Most Christians would accept the principle, though few have yet tested it. The Society of Friends has, however, done the pioneering and shown the way. Other lay communities have sprung up of late years, such as the Brotherhood and Adult School movements, who, meeting in unconsecrated buildings, sometimes even in a private parlor or dancing saloon, yet experience the presence of God richly. To share in building up the spiritual life of the members of such a community is probably the finest thing any of us can do.

SYMBOLISM IN MARK'S GOSPEL.

EDWARD GRUBB.

We usually think of the Gospel of Mark as the most rough-hewn of the narratives concerning Jesus Christ—as a simple and artless story of the impression He made on some of His first followers, like Peter. And this is largely right. Yet it may be a deeper study will show us subtleties of thought and meaning which reveal the author as a true artist, perhaps unconsciously even to himself. Take, for example, the eleventh chapter, and try to read a little between the lines.

It begins with the triumphal entry into Jerusalem—the first occasion, according to this evangelist, on which "the Lord" had openly declared His Messiahship. The cries of the "many" who walked before and after, "Blessed is the kingdom that cometh, the kingdom of our father David, Hosanna in the highest," do not hide from Jesus the opposition He will encounter from the secular-minded rulers of His nation. Even the crowd is more intent upon freedom from Roman oppression, which they fancy He is going to bring them, than upon His message—more bent upon achieving Home Rule than on understanding the Ruler. He enters Jerusalem, goes into the temple, and after "looking round about upon all things," evidently with some poignant emotion that impressed the narrator, He leaves the city with His disciples to spend the night at Bethany.

Next morning, on returning to Jerusalem, He is hungry; and seeing a fig-tree covered with leaves, He hopes to find on it some remains of the last year's crop—but there are none. In the hearing of His disciples He says, "No man eat fruit from thee henceforward forever;" and next day the fig-tree was seen to be "withered from the roots." It is perfectly clear that this was no petulant exhibition of disappointment; what it means is not far to seek. In Luke xiii: 6-9 He had spoken about another barren fig-tree, which the owner wished to cut down as useless, but which his gardener persuaded him to give another chance. At that time He had hoped that the rulers of His people would still repent and receive Him; but now He saw that this was not to be. The tree would never bear fruit, it could only be destroyed. He proceeded to challenge the authorities openly by His second manifesto as Messiah—driving out from the temple the money-changers and their cattle; and He knew that this was an insult they would not forgive. (The cattle and sheep were probably raised by the priests and rulers on their estates, and brought to the temple to be sold for sacrifice at exorbitant prices; the opposition to Jesus was in no small degree financial.)

It is no accident that the great injunction "Have faith in God" follows immediately upon the withering of the fig-tree. The words are spoken to His own soul as much as to the disciples. "Whosoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou taken up and cast into the sea, and shall not doubt in his heart (or let cross-judgments make him waver), he shall have it." The "mountain of the Lord's house" (Is. ii-2) stood above them, dark and forbidding—the mountain which was to have been for all the nations the center of the worship of God. It had now become the fortress of hypocrisy, pride, hard-heartedness and mammon-worship. His work was to overthrow it and replace it with the kingdom of the Father's love. Was no faith in God needed to assure even Him that this could be? How could one poor Galilean, with a little band of half-understanding followers, essay so hopeless a task—even with the plaudits of a crowd who would leave Him when they found He would not take up arms? "Their heart was not really with Him, and might easily be turned against Him if some panic fear should arise at the bidding of His enemies. Nothing so shakes the soul with doubt as to see the heirs of truth hoarding it with selfish fear. When those who are accounted leaders of the Church adopt the standards of the world, exchanging faith for prudence and relying upon the arm of flesh for victory, the heart of the prophet may well be chilled with misgiving."*

It was by believing prayer that the Lord Himself conquered the doubts that would arise as to whether the task laid upon Him could be achieved. Even if He were Himself prepared, armed only with the love of God, to assail the fortress where lay entrenched the forces of tradition and self-interest, what about those weak and dull disciples? Without their aid He could accomplish little or nothing; when the Shepherd was smitten, where would the flock be? Unless He could radiate into them a faith that would survive the Cross and make them independent of His bodily presence, His work was impossible of fulfilment.† Yet, in spite of ever-deepening anxiety, and a "temptation" which culminated in Gethsemane and on the Cross, the soul of Jesus remained true to His Father's will. He never once began to compromise with the spirit of the world—never once admitted the necessity of using force or policy to gain His ends. His life was perfectly true to His words about the power of love and forgiveness to achieve the seemingly impossible. In the midst of the agony of crucifixion He prayed, thinking doubtless of those who had delivered Him up for death, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do" (Luke xxiii: 34). And so here, again, it is no accident that Mark gives us, immediately following the words about believing prayer, "And when ye stand praying, forgive." The way of the Master must be the way of the disciples, too. The whole of this chapter, when read with understanding sympathy, reveals much of the inner conflict of our Lord's last days on earth, and much of the secret of His ultimate victory.

The problems Jesus had to face are permanent, and are even more pressing now than ever. The present-day failures of civilization and of the Church seem to arise mainly from neglect of His teaching. Take the proper use of the day of rest. How many realize what it means? They make it a day for the pursuit of pleasure. But that quest may be, and often is, the most arduous and the least fruitful. If men and women stayed to think of the day's purpose, and how that could best be fulfilled, the whole problem would be solved. Room would be left for the soul's rest, refreshment, and recuperation, and the day would bring its own reward.—G. CURRIE MARTIN.

*J. R. Coates, The Christ of Revolution, p. 91. I am indebted to this little book for many of the thoughts here expressed.

†Two passages in Luke's Gospel seem to reflect the overwhelming anxiety of Jesus in these last days, which at times drove Him almost to despair. They are xii: 8, "When the Son of man cometh (i. e. to the climax of the Cross), shall he find faith on the earth?" and xxii: 37, "That which concerneth me has come to an end." The last phrase is the same as in Mark iii: 26, "Satan hath an end."

"FAITH AND WORKS AT PRESENT."

[William B. Harvey has called our attention to an article with the above title from the well-known pen of Maurice Hewlett. It appeared in The Forum for Ninth Month. The five concluding paragraphs deal with the Society of Friends. The point in reprinting these paragraphs is to emphasize the present responsibility of our Society in the face of great liberality of judgment. We all have a sense of having fallen far short of the good imputed to us. Do we feel stimulated as we should to make these good things that are said of us more and more true in the circle of our life activities? We can go out to Germany and Poland with a message of good-will, can we radiate the same message from our homes and our business desks?—Eds.]

I have said that Christ's teaching has never been followed. His way of life never attempted. That is true of nations, with which, so far, I have been dealing. Obviously it is not true of individuals, nor altogether so of groups of individuals. Groups have attempted it; Cathari, Patterini, Franciscans, Hussites, Wyclifites, Albigenses, Friends of God, Port-Royalists, Doukhobors and suchlike. Most of them have failed owing to internal weakness, and the nature of men; some, like the Albigenses, have been crushed out or worn down by the hostility of governments. One only, English in origin, has endured for three hundred years. That is a group large enough to be called something else. It does not claim to be a church, and calls itself the Society of Friends. By a term of mockery, now become one of affection, men outside call it the Quakers.

Founded by George Fox, an uninstructed man illuminated by close and literal reading of the Gospels, outliving both a time of persecution and one of moral collapse, that Society has presented to the world for three hundred and more years the nearest approach to the Christ-like way of life which has ever been known. It is based upon neighborly love, is strictly pacific, in the face of Government it is quietist. It is without formulary or sacrament. So far, the likeness is exact. It does, not, however, observe the counsel of Poverty, and is in no real sense communistic. In those two points, and in the fact that it has not been zealous to proselytize, it falls short of the teaching of Jesus Christ. But essentially it resembles that teaching in being an enthusiasm, an illumination, and a Way of Life where permeation of body by spirit is complete both in the particular and in the whole. Its doctrine is idealistic and undogmatic. It comes not to destroy, but to fulfill. It is not, as Mr. Carl Heath says in a recent pamphlet,* a "sect obsessed with a theory of its own exclusive wisdom;" it is "no creed which alone brings salvation." "Whatever else it is," he goes on to say, "it is always a movement of spiritual seekers holding out hands of fellowship to all who search for God, for Light and Truth, and for that way of life where men can love God wholeheartedly and their fellows as themselves."

So much for that. What is now extremely noteworthy is that, since the late war began, the Society of Friends has broken down the defenses which screened it from the world, and definitely ranged itself in Europe as a Christian body with work to do correspondent with the faith which it holds. With no bridge-making to be done, with no gulf between Belief and Conduct, the Quakers of America and Britain, ever since the Armistice, have been steadily at work throughout Europe, and particularly in Germany and Austria, mending the fortunes of broken people, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, showing forth Goodwill among men who of late years have shown forth none of their own. From reports delivered at a meeting held this month, I learn that in Germany something like a million children are being fed, and that in Vienna and the Provinces "the largest number of children helped at any one time has been seventy thousand." (The financial statements of relief by English and American Friends are omitted. They have appeared previously in THE FRIEND.)

Quaker Thought in International Service*, by Carl Heath (Friends' Council for International Service.)

These figures tell their own story; and if we call the work which they represent "loving our enemies," as we well may, it is not what they would call it; for they say that it takes two to make a quarrel, and that Quakers quarrel with no sons of men. The matter for the concern of Christendom is that it is a work which I believe I am right in saying no other church, no other society of Christian people, as such, is doing. What individual adherents to one church or another may be at, is not now to the purpose. The point upon which I must insist is that, professing the doctrine of Christ, they keep it, as it were, in an airtight compartment, not only unspotted from the world, but with no chance of braving any spots at all. As churches, all of them are infected with the dread of importing the affairs of the world into church!—a disastrous dichotomy (giving life two lobes, as if it were a brain) of which the Church of England is the most notorious upholder.

What has happened? What is the meaning of all this? To account for it is entirely beyond my powers which only enable me to report it. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and it if it has so far waled the secret of Christ into one small society of men only, there is, I suppose, nothing to do but to "wait still upon God." Meantime, in the place of Love toward men, upon which the whole Evangel is founded, the nations of the world are waiting still upon Hate toward them. Christian Irish still murder Christian English, and English Irish still murder Christian English, and English Russian, having broken down a tyranny which levied war on one class, have set up in its place a tyranny which wars upon another class. The French, having broken the Germans, hate and fear them more than before. The Turks still massacre the Armenians, the Greeks whatever Turks they can get at. Masters and Men have learned nothing by a war which at least showed all men equal in fortune, except to grudge each other their share in it. The very water drinkers cannot drink their water without having their stomachs turned by the thought of the wine other men are drinking. Alone in creation, it seems, humanity preys upon its own kind. That is where we are in 1921, that year of Our Lord. In the background hangs Christ on the Cross who died that Love might prevail.

BASEBALL NEWS CURTAILED.

With the above caption the Ledger announces what may indicate a turn of the tide of popular favor toward more sanity of interest in the reading public. It makes one think of the following sentence from E. Gosse's new book:

"I make no apology for their brevity, since that was inevitable. Books, very properly, have to be satisfied with what crumbs of space may fall from the platters of Football and the League of Nations. If Literature were bigger, Golf would have to be less bulky, and how dreadful that would be!"

Declaring that an active doubt existed as to the value of professional baseball in American life, the Chicago Tribune announces on its editorial page that it had curtailed its baseball reports in favor of other sports, particularly amateur games.

"The Tribune is down to about a half column now for games in which the home team plays and to a bare statement of vital statistics regarding other clubs," the announcement said.

"Two or three hours in a ball park do not take anything off the waist line of the spectators or add anything to chest measurement. Professional baseball is a stimulus for boys, but journalism has overfed it with space.

"Amateur sports seldom produce the ability of professional sports, but they produce sound citizenry."

For guidance in the future years,
And blessings richer, deeper still;
For love to share each other's tears,
For quick discernment of Thy will;
Our hearts look up, O Lord, to Thee,
Our Saviour, Man of Galilee."

BOOK REVIEWS.

"THE CHARM OF FINE MANNERS" is an arresting title in these days, when we are told that "fine manners" are no longer prevalent. The sale of the modest little book gives proofs, however, that we still enjoy reading of them, and Helen Ekin Starrett has surely earned the right to speak to girls, as she does in these "letters to a daughter." She is Principal Emeritus of the Starrett School for Girls, Chicago, and dedicates the book to the School Alumnae, as well as to her own daughters, and seven grand-daughters. Her portrait shows a strong and lovely face; the face of a real mother.

Such subjects as "Aims in Life," "Personal Habits," "Who Are the Cultivated?" "Religious Culture and Duty," are dealt with in the letters. The last one, entitled "The Making of a Home," is noteworthy, and so is "A Little Sermon to Schoolgirls," which, despite its title, is not dry or dictatorial. All will enjoy the story of the borrowed hair-brush, which is told in it.

So, if we are tempted to question whether such a book will be read, the answer seems to lie in the book itself, and its sane and sensible teaching.

MORNING ALL THE WAY.

I sit beneath the westering sun,
While lengthening shadows eastward fall;
I trace the path my life has run,
And clear-eyed memory scans it all.

The star that led from primal night
That far-off day when I was born,
Has moved perennial, calm and bright,
To herald a continuous morn.

Fresh-breathing dews and perfumes rise,
Dawn peeps o'er dawn, still coming on,
Stars fade out from the warming skies,
Before an ever-coming sun.

The Plans Divine new scope unfold;
Man waking, new achievement dares;
Light, backward beaming, gilds the Old.
Unwithering, Nature's beauty fares.

Westward I turn and gaze. No Night!
Dawn far and faint, with rosy ray
Betokens still the growing light
That leads the wide, Eternal Day!

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

LITTLE CORNERS.—Georgia Willis, who helped in the kitchen, was rubbing the knives. Somebody had been careless, and let one get rusty, but Georgia rubbed with all her might; rubbed and sang softly a little song:

"In the world is darkness, so we must shine,
You in your little corner, and I in mine."

"What do you rub at them knives forever for?" Mary said. Mary was the cook.

"Because they are in my corner," Georgia said brightly. "'You in your little corner,' you know, 'and I in mine.' I'll do the best I can; that's all I can do."

"I wouldn't waste my strength," said Mary. "I know that no one will notice."

"Jesus will," said Georgia, and then she sang again:

"You in your little corner, and I in mine."

"This steak is in my corner, I suppose," said Mary to herself. "If that child must do what she can, I s'pose I must.

If he knows about knives, it's likely he does about steak," and she broiled it beautifully.

"Mary, the steak was very nicely done to-day," Miss Emma said.

"That's all along of Georgia," said Mary, with a pleased red face, and then she told about the knives.

Miss Emma was ironing ruffles; she was tired and warm. "Helen will not care whether they are fluted nicely or not," she said. "I'll hurry them over." But after she heard about the knives, she did her best.

"How beautifully my dress is done," Helen said, and Emma, laughing, answered: "That is owing to Georgia." Then she told about the knives.

"No," said Helen to her friend who urged, "I really cannot go this evening. I am going to prayer-meeting; my corner is there."

"Your corner! What do you mean?" Then Helen told about the knives.

"Well," the friend said, "if you will not go with me, perhaps I will with you," and they went to the prayer-meeting.

"You helped us ever so much with the singing this evening." That was what their pastor said to them as they were going home. "I was afraid you wouldn't be there."

"It was owing to our Georgia," said Helen; "she seemed to think she must do what she could, if it were only knives." Then she told him the story.

"I believe I will go in here again," said the minister, stopping before a poor little house. "I said yesterday there was no use, but I must do what I can." In the house a sick man was lying. Again and again the minister had called, but he wouldn't listen to him; but to-night he said: "I have come to tell you a little story." Then he told him about Georgia Willis, about her knives, and her little corner, and her "doing what she could," and the sick man wiped the tears from his eyes, and said: "I'll find my corner, too; I'll try to shine for him." And the sick man was Georgia's father. Jesus, looking down at her that day, said, "She has done what she could," and he gave the blessing.

"I believe I won't go to walk," said Helen, hesitating. "I'll finish that dress of mother's; I suppose I can if I think so."

"Why, child, you here sewing?" her mother said. "I thought you had gone to walk."

"No, ma'am; this dress seemed to be in my corner, so I thought I would finish it."

"In your corner?" her mother repeated in surprise, and then Helen told about the knives. The doorbell rang, and the mother went thoughtfully to receive her pastor. "I suppose I could give more," she said to herself, as she slowly took out ten dollars she had laid aside for missions. "If that poor child in the kitchen is trying to do what she can, I wonder if I am? I'll make it twenty-five."

And Georgia's guardian angel said to another angel: "Georgia Willis gave twenty-five dollars to our dear people in India to-day."

"Twenty-five dollars?" said the other angel. "Why, I thought she was poor?"

"Oh, well, she thinks she is, but her Father in heaven isn't, you know. She did what she could, and He did the rest."

But Georgia knew nothing about all this, and the next morning she brightened her knives and sang cheerily.—Our Boys and Girls.

THE MYSTERY IN THE SILENCE.

The Infinite always is silent—

It is only the Finite speaks;

Our words are the idle wave caps

On the deep that never breaks.

We may question with wand of science,

Explain, decide and discuss;

But only in meditation

The Mystery speaks to us.

FRIENDS THROUGH ORIENTAL EYES.

[We are indebted to Edward C. Wood, who has forwarded the personal letters from which the following extracts are taken. They were written by a young Japanese student to one of his friends in Philadelphia, where he had been a student at the University of Pennsylvania. The excellent English, revealing only here and there a foreign trace, has not been tampered with. To omit names is, we know, rather aggravating, yet in some instances it seemed best to do so, as these letters were of course written without thought of publication.]

—Eds.]

[From the steamer.] . . . I will keep you posted with my activities on the other side by writing to you as often as I can. Will you please give my love to your "mother dear," who is also "mother dear" to me. I appreciate her gift of Whittier's poems very much indeed. Isn't it encouraging to think that vast and almost limitless as the ocean is, there are the same hearts beating and understanding one another on each shore? I have confidence in people and their hearts and am not afraid to go into strange countries among strange people. The strangeness is merely on the surface. I have found that in the Germans on board and will do so in the English people tomorrow afternoon and thereafter. With the deepest feeling of brotherliness and gratefulness,

Yours cordially,

DEVONSHIRE HOUSE, London.

July 13, 1921.

I am writing this in the Library of the Devonshire House. I have just met Mr. Nicholson, secretary of the Central Offices. He has taken me to this library to meet Norman Penney, the librarian, who is now with me. Both these gentlemen have talked very kindly with me and I feel very near to them. Mr. Nicholson has given me a number of Friends' names and those of the leading Meeting-houses in and around London. Probably next Sunday I shall be at the home of J. Rowntree Gillett at Hampstead, as well as attending the Meeting-house there.

THE PENN CLUB.

8, 9, 10 Tavistock Square, W. C. 1.

July 18, 1921.

As indicated in my last letter I have pitched my tent at this club. . . . The Penn Club is the social headquarters of Friends in London and among other club accommodations and facilities, it is equipped with numerous bed-rooms for visitors and resident members—a place somewhat like our International Students' House [at the University of Pennsylvania]. The members of the club are either Friends or those connected with them. . . . The club, as is characteristic of all Quaker undertakings, is unpretentious outwardly but quite thorough and complete in conveniences and comforts of the right kind.

Yesterday I visited the Hampstead Meeting-house, at the invitation of Dr. Claude Taylor of Rosslyn Hill. Unfortunately Dr. Taylor was indisposed and could not attend the meeting, but Mrs. Taylor and her three children were there to take me to their home after the meeting. . . . I need not tell you about the meeting itself as it is substantially the same as with you, except one point which impressed me. It is that there was an air of less formality and more openness about the place. There were no elevated seats [at Hampstead, at least. The Devonshire Meeting-house has] for overseers and everybody sat on the same floor, as at an informal gathering. I also noticed that there was a larger attendance of young girls than I thought. After the meeting a number of people spoke to me and bade me welcome to their gathering, quite a delightful experience which I invariably enjoy at Friends' meetings.

Mrs. Taylor and children took me under their wings and showed me around Hampstead before going home to dinner. The Taylors have never been to America. Dr. Taylor himself has [in 1912], but has hitherto offered the hospitality of their home to several Friends from the United States who came to visit London. . . . They have a very nice home at Rosslyn Hill and I spent several pleasant hours with them there. My only regret was that Dr. Taylor, on account of his illness, was not allowed to meet visitors. I am going to renew my visit before long.

The next Friend I am scheduled to meet is Philip Burt, who . . . was until recently a railway manager but is now retired and teaching Railway Management in the London School of Economics, one of the best schools of its kind here and abroad. Philip Burt is greatly interested in foreign students coming to London and makes it his business (voluntarily, of course) to introduce them to good English homes and thus to bring them in contact with the best type of English people whom it is not easy for casual visitors to meet and get acquainted with.

London is now suffering from a drought lasting more than three months and the heat is supposed to be "unbearable," although you from Philadelphia might not think it so very bad. I am getting used to English ways. There are many things I miss, but there are also compensations. Above all I enjoy the London atmosphere of "taking time" and restfulness, although English people themselves seem to think London a pretty noisy and "quick" place. Yesterday morning I surprised an Englishman by calling London sleepy—sleepier than Philly. . . . With kindest thoughts,

Yours,

July 30, 1921.

It goes to my heart to hear from you in this strange city where I have not yet learned to feel quite at home—certainly not as much as I did in old Philly, which I think is an experience I shall not easily repeat anywhere for the rest of my earthly days. In my last letter I told you, I believe, of my intended visit to Philip Burt here. Well, I met him last Sunday at the Westminster Meeting-house, at St. Martin's Lane, not far from the famous Abbey. . . . The Westminster Meeting-house is much quieter and more in conformity to the usual order of things in Quaker meetings than the Hampstead Meeting which I had visited the previous Sunday and which impressed me as unusually free from formalities and looked more like an ordinary discussion group of a non-religious character. Generally speaking, I find that the English Friends take far greater interest and a more active share in the social and political activities of their country than you do in the United States. They represent the more progressive and enlightened portion of the English people. You know that time was when they kept deliberately aloof from politics and social entanglements, believing that their mission was in the realm of heart and faith, but today they are an active force in the social affairs of England. You will be surprised to hear that the majority of English Quaker voters are for Labor and the young Friends here are exclusively radical in their views, often subscribing to socialistic tendencies. In any case, such a great catastrophe as the Great War cannot but leave a profound impression upon the sensitive hearts of Friends in England and it is no wonder that they should come forward with their solutions of the chaos in the shattered world. This attitude and eagerness of theirs are clearly discernible at Quaker meetings here. The messages delivered on these occasions teach more directly and feelingly their social needs than would messages at similar meetings in America. This poor world of ours needs mending and overhauling, spiritually no less than materially, and you notice that indisputably on this side of the ocean. One of the greatest surprises for me in London has been the apparent laxity of morality in some portions of English society. I have been here only a little more than ten days and yet I have seen not a few things that have shocked my sense of propriety. This is deplorable for England, the England whose pride has been her correctness and purity. It may be, although I hope not, that the same thing is happening in America, but at least it is not openly tolerated there.

Excuse my digression. To go back to our original subject, the meeting is over and I shook hands with many people as usual. One of these, curious to say, was a friend of yours—a Philadelphian. He was no less a personage than Alfred Scattergood himself. He and his family are in London on their way home from Berlin. . . . I told him of you and your letter to him as head of the American Friends' Mission and he said he would re-address it to Mr. Bacon, the new chairman. It was certainly an accidental meeting and I was very glad of it.

Philip Burtt I found to be a man of large sympathies and wide interests. He has been a business man up to a recent time, having been a railway manager in York, which is his home. He is a man in his early fifties, and, unlike most Englishmen, is very quick in his motion and also in speech—quite American in his ways. He reminds me of Lloyd George in his agility and appearance, if not in other respects. Exceedingly genial and very kindly, he is a likeable man, indeed. When I went there were also two other guests, a "patriotic" Irishman and a "patriotic" Hindu. You will readily understand that none but a very liberal Bull can stand the patriotism of these two radical Britishers. . . . He knows a great deal about the Orient and seems to feel that there is a great field for Quaker missionary work out there.

I have also seen Herbert H. Catford of the Friends' Foreign Mission Association, who wrote to you some time ago for Henry Hodgkin about me. He and his brother are inviting me to their home one of these days so that I may know more about Friends in London. You see, my circle of Quaker friends is daily growing and widening.

The press here is very much interested in the forthcoming Washington Conference on Disarmament. We are all unconditionally for it, are we not? Let us pray that this ray of hope may be the light of the truly significant life of our nations in the future!

With love to your mother dear,

Yours,

LETTER FROM ABNER AND ELLA NEWLIN.

LONDON, Eighth Month 16, 1921.

TO OUR DEAR FRIENDS IN THE "HOMELAND":—

We arrived here this A. M. at seven o'clock. We took the boat at Hook of Holland and were on the water last night. The channel was rough the first two hours. We felt miserable, but did not get really sick. After that it was more calm and we slept well. We feel much better since the weather is cooler. The hot weather in Germany was trying when traveling. There have been light rains there and here, but not enough to do the thirsty ground much good. The late crop of potatoes and vegetables is going to be short. It will affect the food conditions greatly.

The wheat and rye were fairly good in Germany and were well taken care of. It means much to the country people, but will not feed the cities.

We had expected to go a week earlier, but a fire on a large boat which was in the dock, made it necessary for the company to find accommodations immediately for two thousand people, so we were changed to make room for them. Our contract was not quite closed when it occurred. These things are not under our control and we are content, trusting "Our Father is at the helm."

We expect to go to Fritchley tomorrow. It seems as if a wall had suddenly fallen down between us and the people, to be where every one speaks English. We were at Bithoven, Holland, over the week-end. Holland has rosy children and is building new houses. Two things that are scarce in Germany.

With love to all,

ABNER L. AND ELLA NEWLIN.

FRIENDS' DISARMAMENT COUNCIL.

FREDERICK J. LIBBY, Secretary.

In pursuance of the Minutes of the meeting held in Philadelphia on Sixth Month 22, of representatives of the three groups of Friends, a meeting for organization of a Friends' Disarmament Council was held at 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, on the 12th inst. The following were reported as the duly elected members of the Council:

Allen D. Hole, W. Rufus Kersey, A. Morris Carey, Irene Stranahan, Ross Hadley, Isaac T. Johnson, Edith Wildman, as representatives of the Five Years' Meeting, William I. Hull, Hannah Clothier Hull, Arthur C. Jackson, George A. Walton, Jesse H. Holmes, representing the Friends' General Conference, M. Albert Linton, Frances Tatum Rhoads, Harold Evans, J. Henry Scattergood, representing the Arch Street (Philadelphia) Yearly Meeting.

The following were present: Allen D. Hole, W. Rufus Kersey, Irene Stranahan, Wm. I. Hull, Hannah Clothier Hull, Arthur C. Jackson, M. Albert Linton, Harold Evans, J. Henry Scattergood, and by invitation, Rufus M. Jones, Wilbur K. Thomas, Wm. F. Wickersham, Edgar Stranahan and Frederick J. Libby.

The selection of Frederick Libby on Sixth Month 22, as Executive Secretary, was confirmed. The name of the organization as given above was adopted. Co-operation with Friends in Great Britain and Japan was agreed upon. The invitation of the National Council on Limitation of Armaments (a newly formed federation of National bodies favoring Disarmament and representing Labor, the Farmers, the Churches, Women's organizations, etc.), to co-operate as a constituent member was accepted and it was agreed to aid in the financial support of this co-ordinating body. The sum of $25,000 was agreed upon as our own budget for the year and the hope was expressed that each of our constituent groups should try to raise one-third.

M. Albert Linton, who acted as Chairman of the meeting, was asked to continue as Chairman of the Council for the present. A. Morris Carey, 1004 Cathedral Street, Baltimore, Md., was made treasurer.

An Executive Committee was chosen, comprising the Chairman and Executive Secretary ex-officio, and Harold Evans, Wm. I. Hull, Lucy Biddle Lewis, A. Morris Carey, Allen D. Hole and a third member of the Five Years' Meeting to be chosen from those who are yet to be named.

IMPORTANT DISARMAMENT GROUPS CONFER IN WASHINGTON, D. C.

A significant Conference of representatives of sixteen National Groups that favor Reduction of Armaments was held on Ninth Month 8, 1921, in Washington, to discuss ways of co-operation.

All of the National Farmers' Organizations and all of the important Women's Groups as well as representatives of the Churches and one Labor organization were included in the Conference.

It was agreed that a loose organization is necessary to prevent duplication of effort and to secure effective action. A National Council on Reduction of Armaments is to be formed, composed of one representative of each National Organization that favors this object.

The purpose of this Council, it was agreed, shall be "to unite and make articulate through the member-organizations, the overwhelming sentiment of the people of the United States in favor of Reduction of Armaments;" its functions will be to co-ordinate the work of the member-organizations, to maintain lines of action, to maintain an advisory board of experts and to co-operate with similar organizations in other countries.

The Friends' Disarmament Council will be one of the co-operating groups. This method of organization will leave each group to carry out its full program and give its testimony unhampered by other bodies, while at the same time it will increase the efficiency of all by helpful suggestion.

WALTER C. WOODWARD

ARTHUR WATTS' FIRST REPORT OF THE RUSSIAN FAMINE SITUATION.

The area involved includes the whole of the Volga Valley from Kazan to Astrakhan, normally the bread-producing district, not only for the rest of European Russia, but for many other parts of the world. The conditions in Siberia and south-western Russia are better, while in the immediate vicinity of Moscow there has been an excellent yield, but in the first instance the matter of transportation is tedious and uncertain, and in the last two the supply is not expected to meet the local demands. Figures vary widely and wildly, but 14,000,000 people are said (in an official report to one of the Moscow newspapers) to be unable to exist over the next winter without government or foreign aid.

Recently returned travelers find gruesome stories of conditions already prevalent in the Volga district. Railroad stations are massed with people, some fleeing from the cities to the country in the hope of finding remnants of bread there; others leaving the starving villages for what they hope to find in the more food-favored city centres. Wartime refugee situations are developing; children left orphans by the death or wilful desertion of their parents, cholera and typhus becoming epidemic along the main routes of travel (reported outbreaks of the black plague have not been well authenticated), people eating grass when their provisions for the journey to Siberia had been devoured before the arrival of the train to take them there.

The Russian Government is endeavoring to cope with the situation. Among other measures they are endeavoring to send the inhabitants of the famine districts into more favored localities. Institutions for orphans and refugees, and sanatoria, many of which had been located in the famine area because of its usual productivity, are to be evacuated in regularly organized trains to the central and northern parts of Russia and to Siberia. Various cities have offered to receive varying numbers of these children; Moscow already has over four hundred of them. About sixty trains have now been equipped with kitchens and supplies to run with émigrés from Saratov, Samara, Kazan and other Volga cities to Tashkent and Siberia, each train carrying some five hundred people and making the trip in about ten days. In addition to this attempt at organized evacuation there is a tremendous amount of individual flight. As a result of so much movement along the main travel routes, special bases of food and medical relief are to be established at the larger railroad junctures. A provision train (with kitchens) capable of feeding 5,000 children a day is already established at Samara, and a smaller one at Kazan. Others will soon be operating at Orenburg, Simirsk, Chelyabinsk and Omsk. The local committees arrange for the distribution of the food, usually from tents adjacent to the trains. Bath and laundry trains, formerly devoted to the army, are to be sent to the same places, in order to prevent if possible the spread of cholera and typhus and other diseases. Refugees are to be bathed and their clothes, if vermin infected, to be burned. These plans, unfortunately, will be greatly affected by the lack of new clothing to provide people, as all reports from the provinces show that to be one of the greatest needs. Yesterday's paper stated that 100,000 sets of underwear were immediately required for adults and that there was absolutely no children's underwear available for this very laudable purpose. Anyone who saw how typhus crawled along the railroad line across Siberia and was almost unheard-of in non-travel haunted neighborhoods will heartily encourage the attempt to delouse refugees at every station where the train stops long enough to do so.

Food is, of course, obviously the greatest need of all. Especially cereals are required, as the Russian peasant is more dependent on bread than one unacquainted with him can imagine. Soap is often overlooked as a relief commodity, but it is very lacking here now, and I believe we have been more thanked by children, their parents and teachers for it than for any other one thing. Medicines we have already telegraphed for, and the diseases we are likely to meet are best combatted by other means. Agateware bowls for feeding children and large iron kettles for cooking purposes are badly needed. They could be used to the greatest number possible, as all household utensils are unbelievably scarce. The infection caused by the use of wooden spoons and bowls and by several persons' use of the same utensil at the same time is obvious, but almost unavoidable.

THE HEWSONS SAIL TO TAKE UP RELIEF WORK IN RUSSIA.

Cornell and Estelle Hewson, of Richmond, Indiana, sailed last Seventh-day on the Orduna, from New York, to join the new Unit in Russia, which is now being formed to meet the appalling emergency of the Russian famine. They will proceed to Riga before going into the famine district.

ALFRED G. SCATTERGOOD RETURNS HOME.

Alfred G. Scattergood, of Philadelphia, who for almost two years has been the Chairman of the Child-feeding Mission in Germany, arrived home the 11th.

"STRONG TO BEAR TROUBLE."

My stenographer is a young widow, the widow of a German Pacifist who was executed by Government troops at the time of the revolution in 1918 because of his political opinions. She has two small children, whom she is unable to support. She has a dependent and aged mother, and a dependent sister who has recently undergone a major operation. She carries them all on her back.

Some time ago another sister lost her husband, very suddenly and painfully, from cancer of the brain. My little lady was terribly broken up about it, more than I have ever seen her over her own troubles.

"He had everything to live for," she said; "he was young and very fine. My sister is not as strong to bear trouble as I am. It is harder for her than for me."

I thought of her own young husband and of that terrible night when he did not come home from his work as reporter for the sessions of the Reichstag. I thought of the moments of weakness I had seen her overcome, when she was all but conquered by her hard fate. I thought, too, of the sweetness with which she does her daily work, and what that sweetness would mean in normal life, as the mother of her children, could she be just that. All that she must give up.

And, as she says, she learns daily to be "strong in trouble."

CAROLINE G. NORMENT.

A GERMAN BABY AND A FRENCH OFFICER.

It was a hot summer day in the valley of the Rhine. The river valleys know how to confine and reflect their sunshine to double its power. A through express train rolled across the bridge from the unoccupied into the occupied territory of Germany and stopped at the customs barrier which the French authorities inaugurated. The passengers, who were waiting on the station platform to board the train, had to be patient until all those within had climbed down upon the platform with their luggage and had had it inspected by the authorities. Then there was a surging rush for seats by the hot and impatient human group.

A French officer, who was a passenger, stood calmly in the door of the first-class carriage and surveyed the scene with a cool and detached atmosphere of possession.

A woman with a baby came and asked for a possible seat and settled down for a long journey. With the attitude of the French officer and the crowded coach as a combination there was a certain sense of tension which made the feeling not as comfortable as it was before. But there was the baby. He sat straight up in his mother's lap, with golden curls and soft brown eyes, clasping his little cap in his hands, looking straight across at the officer. We were moving down the left bank of the Rhine. One could see French troops exercising in the fields. As the baby quietly surveyed the glory of the French uniform a French hand reached across the aisle and touched the little soft hand with an inviting gesture and a German mother disengaged the fingers from the cap and laid it in the hand of the enemy. A French watch seems to tick as interestingly as any other, and so after the baby had listened to it, the officer asked the baby if the baby liked it. There was full agreement.

As we rolled into the station at Mainz the officer buckled on his signs of war again, but the air was distinctly cooler, for it was found that after all "a little child shall lead them."

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

PEACE TREATIES WITH THE CENTRAL POWERS.

The United States is now practically at peace with all nations. Preliminary treaties of peace have been signed with Germany, Austria and Hungary, which need only to be ratified and officially promulgated. Our country, it may be recalled, was not at war with Turkey and Bulgaria. Diplomatic and commercial relations may now be officially resumed with the nations with which we have been at war and real peace draws one step nearer.

PRESIDENT HARDING ON THE PORTAL OF PEACE.

The following is part of President Harding's message for the dedication of the peace portal on the border line between Canada and the United States, at Blaine, Washington, early this month:

"You have erected a temple of peace, whose gates are never to be closed save in war. Already it stands for more than a century of unbroken peace between Britain and America, and we all join in the hope that in coming time it may commemorate an era of peace much longer than the period of wars for which the temple of Janus stood. Our century and more of peace with the British Empire, our relations of unbroken amity with Canada, the fact that a boundary line over 3000 miles long remains unfortified—these are the testimonies that the world grows wiser and better. All mankind looks to this example, and yearns to be able to follow it, and we are justified to believe that a time is at hand when it may take a long step in that direction. On the occasion of dedication of the Pacific peace portal, I wish to convey to you personally my high appreciation of your patriotic service in providing this symbolic sign to international peace, and in doing so, I would also thank the Pacific Highway Association for the fine co-operation it has rendered."

UNITED STATES DELEGATES TO THE CONFERENCE.

Charles E. Hughes, Secretary of State, Henry Cabot Lodge, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, ex-Senator Elihu Root, who was Secretary of State under President Roosevelt, and Senator Oscar Underwood, constitute the United States delegation to the Disarmament Conference. With the Republican and the Democratic leaders of the Senate as members of the Conference, there should be little question of the Senate failing to ratify such decisions as shall be reached.

In addition to the above there will probably be an advisory committee of twelve or sixteen men and women, more representative of the people in general.

ORGANIZED LABOR WILL SUPPORT DISARMAMENT.

The Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor, which speaks for nearly four million workers, has pledged its support to the Washington Conference, and announces that the workers will help organize mass meetings and parades in all cities and towns for Armistice Day, 1921, the date the Conference is to open.

The churches, the farmers' associations, women's and other organizations of this country are also deeply interested in the success of the Conference and probably all unite in the Labor slogan, "It is time to disarm." Unless all of these and many other forces furnish a strong, intelligent, well-directed public opinion, favoring disarmament, both before and during the Conference, success cannot be expected.

THE HEART OF RECONCILIATION.—Pardon a reference to a memory of my boyhood that has never lost its color or its strength. It is the memory of my mother reproving me, in tears. Punishment might have been bearable; I could have faced it. But tears, they vanquished me. A mother's suffering for a son's disloyalty to truth—there was something in that which made my act repulsive and at the same time unveiled to me a heart of love and reconciliation and peace.

May I not ascend by that little slope of filial experience to the cross of my Lord on the hill called Calvary? There our Lord unveils our sin, and there he unveils the love which forgets the sin and can redeem the sinner.

Sinai has no place for sinners.

Calvary has no place for anybody else.

There we can take our burden, and we need never bring it away.—JOHN HENRY JOWETT.

To the twentieth century is left the task of so enlightening the consciences of all men of good-will that they shall recognize the moral obligation of applying the teaching of Christ—the Christian ideal—to economics and politics no less than to the ethics of individual character and conduct.—PRINCIPAL ALFRED E. GARVIE.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

The Reformed Church Messenger, published at Fifteenth and Race Streets, this city, has been conducting a symposium on "What is the Most Awful Sin," with prizes for the best essays of six hundred words. Although not a prize winner, our friend William C. Allen's article on "Militarism" has first place in the eight contributions printed in their Eighth Month 11th number. It is fortunate to have this plain teaching put before the large audience of the subscribers to this paper.

In reporting a Norwegian Summer School (in some measure a child of Woodbrook) I. S. in The Friend [London] mentions that A. Gertrude Jacob "with her true American 'go' and liveliness" was of the party. H. G. Wood and Alfred Kemp Brown were also present and had an acceptable part in lectures and other service.

We are indebted to Annie H. Barton for some information in regard to the Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting Conference on Membership at Woodbury on the afternoon and evening of the ninth.

"There were over two hundred persons present. Both sides of the question were presented, and it was indeed a satisfactory occasion tending to clarify the views of any who were of uncertain opinions. There was such a unity of thought and expression in favor of birthright membership that it is scarcely correct to say a discussion followed. The spiritual phases of the question had been well brought out by Max I. Reich and Alfred C. Garrett and the remarks that followed were mainly along those lines."

The Quarterly Meeting is to receive a report from the Committee in charge of the subject. This may appear in a later issue of THE FRIEND.

GEORGE WOOD BACON is well known in the circle of our subscribers. They will be interested to learn that he has a six page article in The Survey for Eighth Month 16th on "The Country School—Then and Now." The article is kindly put into our hands by Charles Evans. After the manner of an expert engineer he has telling paragraphs on Financing the Public Schools, on Present-day Necessities, on Teachers' Salaries, on School Attendance and on Attracting the Child. The article was first read at a Pupils' Association in the environment of the author's youth. His tribute to the "tongue [of land] in Cumberland County, N. J., lying between the Delaware Bay and the Cohansey River," will stir tender memories in not a few.

No more conclusive presentation of the economic argument for disarmament has come to our notice than that used by our Friend. After two paragraphs in which the subject is made very specific the conclusion is put thus:

"Do we comprehend what these stupendous figures really mean; do we understand how much of our national capital assets are now tied up in this sterile business of national defense? Four and one-half billion dollars [present Government demands] capitalized at six per cent. per annum equals $75,000,000,000. This is the amount of our capital that must first annually earn $4,500,000,000 before it can contribute to the development of our own and the world's economic life. National defense therefore holds a first mortgage on our prime assets, on the nation's best productive effort. Seventy-five billion dollars represents the bulk of the nation's quick assets and from one-quarter to one-third of its total assets. This is the price we are now paying for the World War; this is the price we may continue to pay unless we and the nations of the world reset the stage. The stage cannot be reset without our initiative."

The Friend [London] quotes Outward Bound in regard to General Smut's as follows: "It is not generally known that one source of this great quality (the touch of the seer) is the influence that began in his life during the Boer War through the War Relief work of the Friends in South Africa. He was impressed and profoundly moved by the spirit in which the work was done for sufferers on both sides. He characteristically worked back to the source of that spirit, and since that day has never lost contact with the Friends' principle and practice."

THE volume of Extracts from the Minutes of Proceedings of London Yearly Meeting is now at hand from the office of the Society of Friends in London. We call it a volume for it contains 286 closely printed pages. The effect of increased costs of printing and paper is indicated by the fact that a charge is made for the volume. The contents, shown in a four-page index, includes about 200 titles. There are two valuable tables, one of general statistics by Quarterly Meetings, the other of the fifteen boarding schools (four of them in Ireland) to which the Yearly Meeting extends some fostering care.

The various financial statements will also be of interest. The sum of £3,205, was spent by the Committee on the All Friends' Conference. This, of course, represents a very small portion of the total cost of that conference.

In the most cursory review of the volume it is clear that the ends of the earth are brought together in the outreaching concerns of London Yearly Meeting. This wide range of interest affords scope for the activities of the great variety represented in the nearly 20,000 membership of the Yearly Meeting. That so much variety can be fused into a unity of feeling and purpose is truly cause for thankfulness.

FRIENDS will remember the alarm William C. Allen expressed in London and Philadelphia, as the result of his observations during his religious service around the world, on the unfriendly feeling between Great Britain and the United States. At the moment, for psychological reasons, at least, it seemed wise to some both in London and Philadelphia, that this painful situation should be dealt with quietly. The international patient might be very sick, but the hope of recovery was in "keeping the house quiet."

Since then many conditions have changed, and the elements of the problems have become much more clear. The causes of the feeling have emerged, and can be dealt with specifically.

This the New York Nation has done with much ability in a series of ten articles under the caption: "No War with England." They are now bound together and can be had for twenty-five cents from the publication office of The Nation. All intelligent peace workers will want to read them.

WE are indebted to The Friend (London) for this item:—

Groups of the International League of Youth have been formed in many of the towns of Germany and some in Switzerland and it is hoped to extend into other countries. The members are recruited almost entirely from the ranks of the workers. The founder of the League and its dominating personality is Professor Leonard Nelson, of Göttingen, the well-known interpreter of Kant and Fries; he suffered bitter persecution during the war on account of his anti-war attitude. Our correspondent describes the communal life lived by thirty student members of the League, their whole life being of a Spartan simplicity. The League, he says, has many affinities with Friends, and, by invitation, he addressed the group in Göttingen on Quakerism, the address being given in English, which all the thirty students could understand. Many questions were asked afterwards and the keenest interest evinced.

NOTICES.

WEST GROVE DAY.—Former members and attenders of the Meeting at West Grove are reminded that it was decided last year to hold the "re-union" annually on "the first First-day in the Tenth Month." This fixes the date for this year on the second of the month. All interested will please arrange accordingly. The hour of meeting is ten o'clock. Bring luncheon.

A PUBLIC MEETING for Divine worship will be held at Centre Meeting-house, near Centerville, Del., First-day, Tenth Month 2nd, at two o'clock, Standard Time. The meeting will be under the joint care of Race Street and Arch Street Friends. Those desiring transportation from Wilmington will please communicate with Dr. Robert H. Maris, 1009 Jefferson Street, Wilmington, Del.

CHARLES D. HURREY, Secretary of the International Friendly Relations Committee, Secretary of the World's Student Christian Federation, and colleague of John R. Mott, has just returned from a trip through Cuba, Jamaica, Peru, Chile, Argentine, Brazil, Portugal and Spain. His principal objects were the promotion of European Student Relief, the World's Student Christian Federation and International Friendly Relations among foreign students. C. D. Hurrey's rare ability as a speaker, coupled with his experiences and impressions growing out of this trip, should make anyone eager to accept an opportunity to hear him. He will speak at a luncheon to be given in the Mirror Room of the Wanamaker Tea Room, on Tenth Month 4th, at 12.30 p. m. For further information apply to Edward C. Wood, Houston Hall, University of Pennsylvania.

THE last special Meeting for Worship for the season is to be held at Parkville Meeting-house on First-day, Ninth Month 25, 1921, at 2.45 p. m., Standard Time. Interested persons are invited to be present.

MARRIED.—In Friends' Meeting-house, Chestnut Street, West Chester, Pa., on Eighth Month 17, 1921, ISAAC GARRETT ROBERTS and ELLA N. SWAYNE; members of Birmingham Monthly Meeting, Pa.

DIED.—On Eighth Month 31, 1921, in Philadelphia, WM. EVANS Wood, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Western District.

—, on Eighth Month 31, 1921, MARY K. PALMER, widow of John S. Palmer, in her eighty-seventh year; a member of Germantown Monthly Meeting.

—, at Germantown Pa., on Sixth Month 24, 1921, MARY D. ELDER, daughter of the late James and Susanna C. Elder; a member of Germantown Monthly Meeting of Friends.

THE MASTER POTTER.

One does not have to be expert in the potter's art to know that clay occurs in nature in great variety. Common observation gives witness to this fact. The ordinary wayfarer, even if he drive an automobile, finds a painfully evident difference between the kind of clay that holds him fast in the road, and that other not uncommon variety that makes it impossible for him to keep his car from sliding into the ditch. Between these two extremes there must evidently be a wide range of quality for industrial or artistic uses. It does not surprise us therefore to be told that the various kinds of pottery and porcelain are very much determined by the difference in clay beds to which manufacturers have access. This conclusion has been pretty widely generalized, and it would be safe to assume that to most of us Dolton and Worcestershire and Sévres convey a somewhat vague idea at least of difference in material rather than in workmanship.

If we become a little initiated in the work of the American Indians in pottery we may find a definite challenge of this current opinion in regard to the fixed relationships between quality of clay and kinds of pottery. Two Indian tribes with access to the same clay beds will make a very different product. In one the crudity of the clay is tempered into fine-grained beauty; in the other it mars the work even for humble uses. Is it possibly true then that skill in pottery does in measure defy the quality of clay—that the deft workman can make a fine product out of base material? Without entirely discarding the first conclusion may we not assume, in a discussion that has no technical bearing, that both generalizations are measurably true; that quality of material and quality of workmanship are co-relatives in the making of products of the potter's art? Does such a conclusion do other than exalt the skill of the workman, and set in relief that verisimilitude of the Master Workman who at times seems to have small regard to quality of material, but makes some of the finest products of human personality out of the "base things" of life? Let that be as it may,—let the comparison of human life to the potter and his wheel be perfect in detail or not, the more we become aware of God's work in men and women the more we must marvel at the skill of the Master Workman with what from every human point of view we should call poor material.

In books like "Twice Born Men," in lives like those of John B. Gough or George Long one finds striking instances of the Potter's consummate art. It seems almost incredible that some such transformations as thus brought to light should take place. The ascent from the depths of bestiality to the refinement and tenderness of radiant Christian personality should be miracle enough to satisfy anyone—should be final as evidence of the work of grace now in the world. Indeed, the danger is (and it is the danger that should concern us) that we shall be blinded by such instances, shall be so well satisfied with the objective and external evidences in others, that we forget that we cannot escape the witness box ourselves? How much or how little has the crude clay of our natures yielded to the transforming work of the Master Potter? That is what the observant eyes of a critical world is saying! That discloses the sorry wilderness of failure in which too many Christians are entangled!

The ancient exhortation, to the young "to keep out of the air," to the old, "to keep out of the earth," is not without bearing on this subject. After middle life how well reconciled we find ourselves to the imperfections of the clay! Our quick tempers, our gloomy temperaments, our unreasonable habits, have become crystallized. We say of them, when we give offence, "I am very sorry, but I am made that way." If all Christians over fifty could shake themselves loose from such a condition—could actually day by day submit to the Master Potter's hand, what a changed world there would be! How much self-will, how much arrogant opinion, how much uncharitableness would go by the board! How does it come to pass that this progressive tempering and moulding of the clay gets arrested—that our development in Christian graces so often comes to a standstill? There are two evident reasons. We lack faith and we lack patience. So often have we stumbled and fallen, so little real progress do we seem to see as the years pass, that we are prone to say such attainments as those at which the Christian should aim are too high for us. And so they are at one bound. The upward path is not to reach just one bold outstanding peak of attainment. There are summits beyond summits, and the exhilaration of the climb should beckon us on as we ascend.

Nor does the Master Potter lack faith in us, or fail in patience in the face of all discouragements. He stands ready, if need be, to break up, to regrind, and to remould our stubborn clay, and in the end to put the unmistakable mark of His workmanship upon the product. J. H. B.

ONE thing I know—that those who come nearest to God have most to give of inspiration and joy to their fellows; that their concern is always how best they can give rather than how they may get, and that a heaven-learned sympathy makes them slow to speak in terms of disparagement of the efforts of either the "long-established minister" or the "self-conscious young Friend."—WALTER H. BENTLEY.

FRIENDS AND FUNDAMENTALS.

[The following is taken from Caroline S. Stephens's introduction to the third edition of "Quaker Strongholds." A suggestion of our late beloved friend, Samuel Morris, prompted this expression. So far as we know it is unrivaled in Quaker literature.—Eds.]

It is, perhaps, not surprising that our habitual absence from the attempt to define the undefinable and to formulate for transmission to others those mysteries before which the deepest human wisdom most deeply feels its own insufficiency, should have been much and often misunderstood. It has led to many doubts of our orthodoxy as a body; and, coupled with our question of outward observances, it has led some even to question our Christianity.

It is here that any misinterpretation of our silence naturally touches us to the quick. Doubts of each other's orthodoxy have been so freely interchanged in all directions amongst Christians as to have lost much of their force. But no true Christian will contentedly acquiesce in any doubt as to his loyalty to Christ, and silence may, of course, proceed from the most varied sources, from unbelief and from indifference, as well as from reverence and from adoration. I desire, therefore, on my own behalf, as well as on behalf of those with whom I have any true religious fellowship, to say in the most emphatic manner that the liberty we claim and proclaim from forms and formularies is not the liberty to think our own thoughts and to go our own way. It is, on the contrary, the liberty where-with Christ Himself hath made us free, the liberty of those who having the substance, know that they no longer need the figure—the liberty which comes of taking up our cross and following Him who was crucified for us.

Our objection to forms is not that they would pledge us too deeply, but rather that they would confine us to that which is too little, that they hamper and check the living exercise of the spirit which is necessary for real worship and real inward growth. Quakerism, as I understand it, is largely a protest against the attempt to reduce spiritual life to a technical process—a matter of rules and definitions to be confidently applied and transmitted by human agents, and separable from the growth of the divine seed in the heart. We feel this growth to be mainly beyond human ken—a hidden birth proceeding from a source unfathomable by the human mind.

And if this be true of that part of the "mystery of godliness" which relates to our own life and experience, if even in regard to what takes place in our own hearts we feel a sacred fear of inter-meddling in the mysterious processes of life and growth by intellectual investigation or effort of will—how much more must we fear to give free play to words, or even to thoughts, respecting the nature of the very Fountain from which our eternal life is derived, and the awful and mysterious manner in which alone, under necessities forever inscrutable by us, that Fountain could be opened for us?

To know in our own experience that eternal life is, indeed, freely opened to us, that it is possible for us to be redeemed and healed and made one in Christ, as He is one with the Father, to know that for our sakes the Son of God did lay down His life, becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross, that we, through Him might have life, to know in our own hearts what it is to be brought under the humbling, redeeming, purifying power of the cross of Christ; all this is enough and more than enough to fill our life with praise and our hearts with thanksgiving, and to set us free forever from the desire for explanations of the unsearchable. As through death life is opened up to us—so whether slowly or suddenly, yet surely, as in a heavenly dawn, does the "Radiancy Divine," the brightness of the Father's glory, become visible to us, and we recognize it for what it is, "the light of the knowledge of God, in the face of Jesus Christ." Why this revelation must be through death, why we could be redeemed only through His submission for our sakes to endure the shame, to drink the bitterest cup ever tasted on this earth, to suffer the extremest penalty of the sin, He never shared, this we may indeed partly feel, but no tongue can tell.

If, therefore, we do not always utter freely, or confidently define, our belief as to the nature and work of our Lord Jesus Christ, it is not for want of absolute and adoring trust in Him as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world, but because the mystery is greater and the trust deeper, fuller, broader, more powerful, than words can utter; because we dare not limit or define in terms of the intellect that which can be understood only by the child-like heart, because as we "look upon Him whom we have pierced," but Who has yet loved us with an everlasting love, and given Himself for us, that the love of the Father to us sinners might be livingly revealed to us, as we look upon Him, the only language possible to us is the language of penitence, of praise, of love, of adoration.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING REVISITED.

WATSON W. DEWEES.

Ohio Yearly Meeting, held at Barnesville, Ninth Month 17th to 22nd, inclusive, presented no unusual features, but was felt to be a profitable and helpful occasion. To a visitor like myself, attending irregularly once in six or seven years, it was a continual temptation to compare the present with the past, and to note the differences between it and Philadelphia, my own Yearly Meeting by adoption. Those capable of judging, thought the attendance was quite up to the average of recent years. It will be remembered that one large Quarterly Meeting, Hickory Grove, was set off a few years ago and united to Iowa Yearly Meeting (Conservative), making a considerable reduction in the total membership of Ohio Yearly Meeting, and especially affecting the number of children of school age. Roughly stated, the membership of Ohio Yearly Meeting might be put at eighteen hundred or about two-fifths the size of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. This is simply an estimate as no exact figures are accessible. There are four Quarterly Meetings, Short Creek, Salem, Stillwater and Pennsville, always enumerated in the order of their establishment. Sixty years ago Pennsville was a large Quarterly Meeting, with three Monthly Meetings. It is now reduced to one, and is assisted by a committee of the Yearly Meeting. This change does not so much indicate a decay of Quakerism as a migration, for the membership of Pennsville went to swell the size of meetings in Iowa and elsewhere farther west.

The business meetings began on Seventh-day and are continued until the following Fifth-day, with public meetings for worship on First and Fourth-days. There is only one sitting per day, but the visitor quickly discerns that much of the real work of the meeting is being done in the intervals by numerous committees.

"Comparisons are odious," is an oft-quoted proverb, but they are extremely convenient for purposes of illustration. Philadelphians could but note with interest, that representatives from the different Quarterly Meetings were expected to remain on duty throughout the week. One Friend found it necessary to return home, and carefully obtained consent in open meeting before starting for the train. It seemed very business-like and suggestive, and if the duties of representatives extended beyond the nomination of clerks, the practice would be quite worth copying.

The isolation of Philadelphia has led to the disuse of correspondence and the present generation of members has little or no recollection of such a function. But in Ohio, the major part of two sittings, something less than one-half of the available time of the meeting, was devoted to receiving and sending epistles. It is by no means an empty form, but a duty in which the very life of the meeting seemed to be much involved.

When the subject of education was under consideration the fact was brought to light that there are three hundred and twelve children of school age, nearly half of them being educated in Friends' Schools. Several neighborhood primary schools are maintained by subordinate meetings for periods ranging from six and a-half to nine months. The meeting was reminded that a state law now requires that all children be kept at school thirty-two weeks in the year. Short term

Friends' Schools must lengthen their time or risk an awkward conflict with State authorities.

The report of the Committee in charge of the Boarding School was listened to with deep interest. The impression derived from this report and other sources of information, strengthens the belief that much good is being done with a comparatively small amount of money. It was extremely refreshing to hear of an institution which could live strictly "within its means" and report a surplus of near a thousand dollars! Past and present pupils attending the meeting gave no evidence of having been famished, and one could hope the teachers had not been unduly stinted in the matter of salaries to make the surplus possible.

Mention of the school must always bring to mind the close relation it bears to the very existence of the Yearly Meeting. Stillwater Friends within driving distance entertain liberally, but it is difficult to see how the membership could be provided for without the school as a boarding home. Here something less than a hundred and fifty people were lodged and fed, and a much larger number had single meals on public occasions. The accommodations were not of the Atlantic City hotel type, but clean and decent, and at a moderate cost. The long mornings and evenings gave opportunity for much social intercourse and the formation and renewal of friendships. Many were old scholars in fact, and all fell naturally and easily into the routine of Boarding School life. At meal time they sat at long tables closely packed like school children, and the waiters were present or former pupils, familiar with the usages of the place.

Bible reading in the evening became a meeting for worship, as of olden time, and many have had cause to remember these occasions as periods of deep religious feeling.

All this does not describe the real Ohio Yearly Meeting. There are many things in this world which cannot be explained in words and sentences. The visitor who goes to Barnesville in a sympathetic attitude of mind will feel the touch of a spiritual life which may be experienced but is not easily transmitted by words to the comprehension of others.

CONFERENCE ON BIRTHRIGHT MEMBERSHIP.

About two hundred people gathered at Woodbury, New Jersey, on Ninth Month 9th, to attend a Conference on Birthright Membership arranged by a Committee of Salem and Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting.

Various phases of the subject were presented by Faith Borton, Herbert Nicholson, Warren Valentine, Max I. Reich and Alfred C. Garrett. All of these speakers, as well as those who took part in the discussion which followed, were in favor of retaining our present practice.

However, several considerations which might look toward a change in our system of birthright membership were brought out. Birthright membership is based upon the Scriptural idea of the unity of the family. It takes for granted that parents are concerned Friends by religious conviction, and that they will naturally bring up their children to a similar real conviction. It relies upon the expectation that the religious influences which they throw around their children will unfailingly result in the development of their children's life along practically the same lines as their own. This expectation is in fact largely justified by the results.

Two substitutes or plans for Birthright membership have been proposed. One is membership by conviction only, with no official recognition of children even as prospective members. The other is the plan of associate membership which is now in force in most of the Yearly Meetings of this country. In this the children are enrolled as associate members until they reach an age when they may decide for themselves whether they wish to be Friends or not.

Among the considerations which might suggest some modifications in our present regulations were the following:

The true church consists only of those who have been "born again." If it is our aim that our Society of Friends should not include any who are not members of the true church, we should not place on our rolls the names of our infant children until they are old enough to have had some religious experience. Our present system does as a matter of fact place upon our lists, and keep as members, a small number of people who are not truly Friends, and possibly some who have not been born again. Under a system of membership by conviction, or of associate membership, there might be fewer such; but with this thought immediately arises the question of our continuing duty toward those who are bound to us by close ties, who have not been quickened by a rebirth.

The Christian life of many of our young people might be strengthened if they were faced with the expectation of coming to a definite conviction, and in some simple way making a confession of their faith. The plan of associate membership provides for this. But such a confirmation of the membership which is ours by birthright, does often and often occur among us through the interest in religion, and in the affairs of the meeting, which our young people manifest in various ways. It would be the basis of a membership by conviction and it would mark the change from associate to full membership.

These are among the thoughts that were expressed at the Conference. It was felt that any advantage which might result from a change from our present method, could be better obtained in our plan as it is now, if parents, overseers and others, each and every one of us, would have a more effective concern to encourage and develop the religious life of our children.

The Conference closed with a conviction that we did not want a change in our discipline, but that we do want an increase in our own sense of responsibility.

ANNIE B. BROWN.

MEMBERSHIP IN OUR SOCIETY COMPARED TO CITIZENSHIP IN OUR COUNTRY.

READ AT THE WOODBURY CONFERENCE, NINTH MONTH 9th.

It is to be hoped that we all met here this afternoon with the attitude of the small boy who went fishing, and fell in. A passerby saw him and said, "How did you come to fall in?" "I didn't come to fall in," was the reply, "I came to fish!"

I came to fish here, to try to find out what our attitude should be on the subject of birthright membership.

The phase of the question which we shall discuss together now is its similarity to citizenship in a great Republic. "If there is an elevating and ennobling power on children in their consciousness of their being citizens of a great empire," runs my topic, "should there be a power for good on the youth of our Society in the knowledge that from childhood they have been its members, that they inherit its prestige and that no limitation of age barred their taking part in its concerns when qualified by the consecration of the Heavenly Anointed."

In thinking the question over, there are, it seems to me, some striking parallels in citizenship and membership in our Society. Let us turn our attention first to our privileges and then to our duties, in each case.

First of all, as citizens we have the use of all public benefits. Anything like forests, parks or lakes which belong to the country, belong to us each individually. We may use them freely. We have, also, as our heritage, the experience and work of older members of the community or State. We are heirs of past good legislation, the careful and wise planning of our forebears.

As citizens we have the right to vote and are represented on local and state matters.

But this is by no means all that comes to us through our citizenship. We have an individual responsibility for our country and the sense of belonging somewhere. Last, but by no means least, comes the right to the educational privileges which our schools provide.

Among our duties as good citizens is that of carrying forward the good work of the past and leaving the country a better place to live in than it was before.

We must, moreover, keep informed as to conditions in the country, state and county, if we are to be helpful citizens of America. Besides all this is the duty of using our gifts when they are needed for our country's good.

As we think over the privileges that each one of us inherits as a member of our religious society, they can be classified in much the same way as those mentioned above.

We have the free use of all meeting property. We inherit the experience and wisdom of our older members and, corresponding to our voting privilege, is that of taking part in the regular business meetings, no matter what our age or experience.

We send our representatives to conferences and these people report to us on their return. Our representatives serve on committees.

As regards the responsibility incurred by our membership in the Society, it may be said that this is one of the vital phases of such membership. It is only when each one of us feels his own responsibility that our meetings can be the sources of greatest blessing. This has been brought vividly before me during the past two years when a handful of us have gathered on First-day afternoons for silent worship together. In such a small group there is no chance of shoving the responsibility off onto someone else. Each one must do her share, or we fail in our purpose and our time is wasted.

Another privilege of birthright membership is the feeling of belonging to some religious society. We know that the older members are interested in the younger, that we are a part of the larger whole.

The opportunity which we have to go to Westtown and the other Friends' schools is by no means the least of our privileges as members of our Society from birth.

As Friends, we have our duties also; among them is that of carrying forward the traditions and testimony of the Society, and that of keeping informed about meeting activities. "The Quarterly Meeting Messenger" and the "Monthly Meeting letter to Absent Members" are a great help in this respect.

A duty which is of considerable importance and one which we are all too apt to let slide, is the last one listed above, that of using our gifts when they are needed by our meeting. Sometimes it seems easier to serve our country than our meeting, but the latter is as important as the former. Let us not think to ourselves, "Someone else can do this much better than I," but "However inadequate I feel myself to be, let me do this work to the best of my ability."

It has been said that a chain is no stronger than its weakest link. In a republic or a meeting this holds true. Let us individually open our eyes to the duties and privileges of such membership, and see to it that we are not the weakest link.

FAITH BORTON.

MEMBERSHIP IN THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

READ AT THE WOODBURY CONFERENCE, NINTH MONTH 9TH.

It is not an easy task to prepare a paper on a subject such as is under discussion at this moment, particularly when so little has been written on this line, as birthright membership so far has been accepted as the responsibility of Friends, since the foundation of the Society, and if any expect more than an expression of the individual opinion of a lay member they will be disappointed. But as individual opinions based upon living experiences form the premises upon which ultimate judgments are based, we are bound to weigh each individual expression.

A generation ago a young man, himself the son of parents who were recorded ministers in the Society of Friends, on graduation from College, went to a distant city to take his part in educational work for which he had been prepared. There was no meeting of the Society in the city of his adoption, and in the course of a few years he married, "out of meeting," a lady of deeply religious convictions but of a Puritan denomination. As children were born, the recorder of the meeting in the town of his nativity, acting in accordance with an unwritten custom, recorded these children, thus conferring upon them birthright membership.

These parents were concerned, as most parents are in these later days, with the practical problems of life, and like many Friends when living out of the influence of the home meeting, drifted into membership with another denomination.

One boy, however, at the age of five favored with a rather long visit with his grandparents, had the opportunity of a few months of training in Friendly principles. At the age of fifteen, this boy joined the church of his mother despite the knowledge from her lips that he had birthright membership in the Society of Friends. But there was no Friends' Meeting near and the boy desiring a spiritual home in reality, cast his lot with the other. But the teachings of the grandmother and the loving references of his Methodist mother to his birthright membership in the Society of Friends, lingered in the boy's memory, so that at twenty-one, having come to reside within the sphere of a Friends' meeting, he was ready to and did make good with his inclination and his birthright membership, becoming "by conviction and request" again a member of the Society.

No doubt this or other experiences, different only in detail, come to many descendants of Friends, for in my travels I have heard many far removed from the sphere of any Quaker meeting, testify in loving terms of their Quaker ancestry and the birthright membership.

Certainly no one would wish to establish the idea that one may be born into the kingdom of God. And it has been said that the birthright membership has been responsible for the existence in the Society of a number of persons who, while nominal members, are indifferent to the special responsibility for which Quakers stand and are incapable of bearing the ancient testimonies. This is undoubtedly true, and I freely admit that when, after a lapse of years, coming near to my birthplace I have heard persons point out that Quakers within their ken are not like the old stock; that the younger generation can no longer be distinguished as of old, by their virtues; that in their form of worship they are not unlike other denominations.

There may be some justification for such changes, but we know they are not generally true. But that a change has come in Quaker expression in most of the meetings of the country is not to be denied. Shortcomings of members and indifference are scarcely to be laid to birthright membership, for the same manifestations are to be noticed in the laity of other Protestant denominations not having the institution of birthright membership.

The uniform discipline of the New York Yearly Meeting, 1901, provides that, "Parents or guardians may make application for the enrollment of minor children as associate members."

And London Yearly Meeting provides:

"The right of children to membership in the Society extends to any child born of parents in membership; to any child either the father or mother of whom is, at the time of its birth, a member, provided such father and mother were both of them members at the time of marriage; also to any child where only one parent is a member at the time of its birth, if both parents (or guardians) express in writing their wish for the membership of the child and assert their intention to bring the child up in accordance with the principles of the Society."

Birthright membership presupposes that the child will be brought up in accordance with the principles of the Society, and assumes that the young, on attainment of their maturity, will have become convinced of the efficacy of the principles of the Society. The Society can afford to take this risk that children brought up in accordance with the principles of the Society will be Friends in spirit as well as in name. If this be accepted, there were no need for additional formality. Who can tell at what precise moment the chrysalis will break through its containing husk and become a beautiful butterfly? The moment of decision in a child's life is also a moment of crisis. In a crisis the spirit is susceptible to the slightest force. As the chrysalis frees itself from its cocoon before it is able to fly, so may a delicate child see the light, and feel the promptings of the spirit, before it is able to overcome its shyness or timidity. Let us not consider any formality that at this time of crisis may act as a deterrent.

It is said of Confucius that preliminary to his life work in the interest of his fellow-men he put away his wife. Shall we, contemplating the renaissance of the Society of Friends, put away our children?

The term "associate" as applied to a degree of membership in the Society of Friends cannot but be meaningless. The word used in this sense was popular some years ago in the various engineering societies. In these societies it signified a person qualified to work with or affiliate in the practice of engineering with a member. But these engineering societies now propose to use instead the term "intermediate" member. If this word "associate" is empty of meaning when used in the engineering sense, how much more so is it when used to describe the status of a child relative to its spiritual home.

Children on reaching maturity who feel themselves not in unity with the Society may tarry with us until conviction, or they may, under a quickening of conscience, transfer their membership to another denomination.

Dan Marmon, birthright member of the Society of Friends, founder of the Nordyke and Marmon Company, once said that most of his best inventions were thought out in the quiet of the Quaker meeting. However that may be, Dan made true to his convictions, for he left the Society for membership in the Presbyterian Church.

Statistics show that the Friends are not a numerous body. Indeed, it can be said that in point of numbers the Society barely is holding its own position. Meetings in the central and western states by adopting methods more like other churches; by the institution of First-day schools, etc., have been able to check the decline in membership, but the original simplicity or worship has been more or less lost. But these are a Christian and an hospitable people and I shall not say that they are not Friends in spirit. But usages in other Yearly meetings may be neither necessary nor advisable here.

During the period of birthright membership, Friends' Meetings have grown, flourished and declined. If it can be said that birthright membership was in its part responsible for the decline of these meetings, it can be said with equal emphasis that this principle was responsible for their growth.

Not many years ago, a great spiritual leader in another denomination said to a Friends' minister whom some of us have heard, that he had become convinced of the soundness of the principle of birthright membership. But birthright membership cannot be reconciled with the rite of water baptism. How shall we ask of our children written evidence that they have received the baptism of the Holy Spirit, as would be required under the operation of the uniform discipline?

Children of Friends are the special or preferred material from which to draw future members of the Society. They are our opportunity. Parents should be held accountable for their training, so that they will feel they are little members with us even as they look forward to the exercise of their civic duties. And will not the exercise of their spiritual obligations be always more convincing evidence of their religious convictions than any material formality?

The world knows us as Friends—Quakers—and expects us to continue as such. I believe that any radical change in our principles such as to diminish or to destroy our individuality as Friends and our capacity as an organization for doing Christian work, would disappoint, particularly at a time when the civilized races of mankind are receptive to our views. The hereditary rights of children in the Society of Friends are of long standing. To abolish such rights would involve radical change. Usually one such change leads to another. We can not foresee any advantage in wiping out such rights, and the results in certain meetings, which for nearly twenty years have operated under the uniform discipline, show a diminution of the young life in meetings. A leading financier says: "One good investment is worth more than the savings of a lifetime." If by means of hereditary membership we can save to the Society one powerful spiritual leader, the gain to the Society and to the cause of Christianity will more than offset any advantage that may be gained by the change.

Moreover, the Master said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

WARREN P. VALENTINE.

LETTER OF HERBERT V. NICHOLSON.

Herbert V. Nicholson was one of the younger Friends on the program of the Woodbury Conference. He made his contribution in the form of a letter written en route to Canada.

To the Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting Conference on Membership.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

I am sorry to miss the Conference on Membership at Woodbury. I had hoped my trip to Canada would come the latter part of the month, but now seems to be the opportune time.

As I am writing this letter my train is passing through the beautiful farm lands of New York State and I have just been witnessing the glories of a sunrise. Last evening the sun set, for me, over some beautiful mountain lakes above Scranton and I saw the great coal breakers of our rich anthracite region in the evening dusk. What a wonderful country is this of which I am a citizen—a citizen by birthright! Behind all the glories of nature it is so easy to see the hand of the Creator. There is His rule and His Kingdom in which I am a citizen, in a sense, by birthright. He made me a "living soul" which gives me the right of citizenship. I was also born in a Christian home—of parents who were Friends. This gave me the right of membership in that Society.

The sun is fully up now. We have just passed a town with dilapidated buildings and dump heaps. Hideous signboards and other things all show the thoughtlessness and greed of men. The fact that I am a native American does not make me a good citizen. I am not a real citizen, except technically, until I take an interest in the welfare of my country. So in God's Kingdom I have the right of citizenship, for I was born a child and it is the little children who represent the kind of people God wants—"for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." But, along with the simple, pure, child-nature He gave me freedom of will which has only too often led me into wrong ways so that I was alienated from Him, and became of a different nature and citizenship. In order to come into union with Him it was necessary to have a change of heart. I "must be born again." "All have sinned and fallen short." "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." These alls mean me. I have sinned. But there is a way back to God through His Son, who takes my iniquity from me as I turn to Him in faith and place my will at the foot of His cross.

The fact that I was born a Friend makes me a Friend only technically. The Quaker heritage is a fine thing, but I do not get the true benefits from it, nor can I do my part for it until I have experienced the cleansing and filling of the Spirit. Early Quakerism was a matter of experience. If today we are trusting in this past we are dead. Each generation must have its own experience if there is to be life. The lives of our fathers can and should give us much inspiration, but real membership in the Church of God can be gained only by an act of faith on the part of each individual, which takes him to God.

The problem before us is one of getting an outward form to represent this spiritual experience. Some would say that birth and training are sufficient. Others that the definite experience is enough without having a form to represent it. As I read my Bible I believe that it calls for definite regeneration and some sort of public testimony. The early Christians believed and were baptized. The baptism meant the outward confession of the inward cleansing. Paul said, "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." This surely indicates a heart experience and a testimony. In my own case, although I was a birthright Friend, the Spirit led me into these two definite steps, as He has led many others. But it seems to me that the present plan of membership tends to hinder the Spirit in His working because we naturally get to thinking that as long as we are full members there is no need of anything further. On the other hand, in churches where children are associate members and can become full members only after a "confession of faith," there is the danger, only too common, of this step being a mere form. But I believe this form, if properly taught and practised, is nearer the spiritual experience and Biblical teaching than is full birthright membership.

A mere change of form of membership, however, will not make any real difference in our Society. It is only as we more clearly see Jesus and understand His will that we can be used as citizens of His Kingdom. This discussion on membership will do a great deal of good if it does nothing more than to bring each one of us into a Holy Spirit examination of heart to know whether we are in that true fellowship with God and our fellow-men that makes us Christ's in deed and not merely in name.

My prayer is that this conference and our further consideration of this subject may be in that real unity which recognizes that "we, being many, are one body in Christ and every one members one of another." (Rom. xii: 5). "Let love be without dissimulation. Be kindly, affectionate, one toward another, with brotherly love; in honor preferring one another." (Rom. xii: 9, 10).

Your Friend in Christ,

HERBERT V. NICHOLSON.

NINTH MONTH 2, 1921.

CONFERENCE ON MEMBERSHIP AT WOODBURY, NINTH MONTH 9th.

The following is the report made to the Quarterly Meeting:
TO THE YEARLY MEETING:—

The following extract is taken from the Minute of Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting, held Ninth Month 15, 1921.

"The broad question of membership in our Religious Society was brought to the attention of our meeting held in Sixth Month last and a committee was appointed to consider the subject and, if way should open, to call a Quarterly Meeting Conference. The Committee now present the following report relative to a Conference that was held at Woodbury on the ninth of this month. The Conference was well attended, and the question of membership was helpfully discussed from varying points of view. The recommendation of the Committee that no change be made at this time in the Discipline as it relates to membership in our Religious Society was approved by this meeting. It was directed that a copy of the Committee's report and of this Minute be forwarded to our next Yearly Meeting."

M. ALBERT LINTON,
Clerk.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

The Committee appointed in Sixth Month last, to take into consideration the subject of membership in our Religious Society, reports as follows:

With an earnest desire to stimulate serious thought and expression, a conference of the members of Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting was held at Woodbury on the ninth of Ninth Month, at which members of this meeting and our Friends, Max I. Reich and Alfred C. Garrett, spoke. Our privileges and duties as birthright members of our Society, some of our shortcomings as such, and some of the thoughts of English Friends on membership were helpfully presented.

As birthright members we are privileged to enjoy the experience of those who have gone before and that of our own fellow-members, and we have the opportunity to receive an education for self-development. In return for these privileges we are under obligation to render whole-hearted service to our meeting. The danger has been pointed out, that having obtained membership without any cost, some may rely upon the form, rather than upon conviction of heart and spirit. If, however, meetings should drop these nominal members from their lists, there is need of our Saviour's caution that in "rooting out the tares we may root out the wheat also." As Moses built the tabernacle according to the pattern shown him in the mount, so early Friends framed a Society according to the pattern shown them.

It would seem that birthright membership is a divine principle and that God's intention is that the natural succession should be the spiritual succession. Early Friends, believing that the Grace of God hath appeared unto all men, and that none are excluded or neglected, expected all their members to come into onworldliness and true inwardness of spirit and spiritual power. Those who gave evidence of spiritual understanding were selected by the elders and overseers to attend business meetings and take part in the affairs of the Church. "The Society and not its principles has failed. Birthright membership is right for a people right with God."

A decisive step before becoming full members would doubtless necessitate thought and concern and religious conviction on the part of applicants—yet it is felt that greater responsibility on the part of each individual in our meetings will help as no machinery can do. If our members have not only a birthright, but have been truly born again, their lives and conversation will confess that they are followers of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ and members of His Church. In conclusion, we need nursing fathers and mothers and concerned elders and overseers who endeavor to bring all members to Christ; and stressing the need of the new birth, lead them to be Christians first, and Friends, if possible.

We believe that it has been worth while thus to confer together, and although we feel it wise to recommend no change in the Discipline as it relates to membership, we have the conviction that we need to do better than we have been doing, each querying in his or her heart, "Lord, what will Thou have me to do?"

By direction and on behalf of the Committee.

MARY R. WILLIAMS.

PASADENA NOTES.

The little group of Friends, known as "Pasadena Monthly Meeting," which meets at 500 East Villa Street, corner of Galena Avenue, now numbers a little over one hundred and fifty members.

Within the past year or two, a committee on membership was appointed by the Monthly Meeting to co-operate with the Overseers and Recorder, in revising the membership list.

A correspondence was entered into by the committee with all non- or infrequent-attenders, to learn the cause of such non-attendance, whether from distance or other inconvenience, or indifference. It was gratifying and encouraging to learn from some, that they valued their membership in the Society, and did not wish to relinquish it, or to become identified with any other denomination.

Others were prevented from attending because of distance, having removed from the vicinity of meeting.

From some no replies were received, and some had joined other denominations, or wished to be released from membership with Friends for other reasons.

In these latter cases it was decided to remove their names from the membership list, and so inform them, with a kindly invitation to be free to make application for renewal of membership at such time as they might feel so drawn.

In this process of revision and elimination, there were about twenty released from membership, by recommendation of the committee to the Monthly Meeting, without the usual form of disownment, which some feel adds a stigma, and leaves an unfriendly feeling towards the Society.

It is, however, the desire and aim of the Monthly Meeting to keep in touch with those who have manifested an interest in the Society, and who wish to retain their membership, by issuing occasional letters of encouragement, and sending extracts of the proceedings of the meeting, and of the Society at large, that their interest may be encouraged and strengthened, and, if way opens for it, that they may gather other members and interested persons in their community into a group of waiting Spiritual worshippers.

There are a number of attenders of our meetings, members of other Monthly and Yearly Meetings, who are valued by and useful to the meeting, and we would encourage and appreciate a transfer of their membership to this meeting.

The activities of the meeting and its committees and membership have continued to function for Peace, Prohibition and Relief work and distribution of literature.

The Disarmament Conference, and the enforcement of the Volstead Act have been encouraged by letter and petition to proper authorities.

Money donations, clothing and sewing have been liberally contributed by our members through the American Friends' Service Committee, and directly to Daniel and Emily Oliver for their work in Syria. The children of the First-day School contribute regularly to the latter fund.

The Friendly Circle continues its contribution of $50 per year for the education of two Japanese boys, and its meetings once a month during the winters, are interesting literary and social occasions, participated in by resident and visiting Friends of all branches.

During the year, we have had the acceptable company of several visiting Friends, among whom were Benjamin and Anna Vail and Deborah P. Lowry and more recently, Mary Ward and John G. and Rebecca P. Haines, the latter still with us, produced a Certificate of Sojournment from their Monthly Meeting, which was appreciatively received and read.

The bi-weekly First-day evening program meetings held during ten months in the year, and the First-day afternoon children's meetings alternating therewith at regular intervals, have been seasons of interest and instruction, mentally and spiritually.

During the summer, George and Lydia Michener invited the younger parents and their children, with some others, to their home in the valley, where an enjoyable and profitable afternoon was spent in the shade of their walnut grove.

Later, a program meeting for the children was held under the cottonwoods and willows on the banks of the sometimes torrential San Gabriel.

The increased attendance of children at the First-day Scripture School, is encouraging, as is also the aggregate general attendance of adults.

On Eighth Month 28th a First-day School and meeting were held, by invitation, at the home of Josiah and Frances Standing near Beaumont, California, about eighty miles east of Pasadena.

Hither several Friends journeyed by automobile on Seventh-day the 27th, bearing sundry provisions for the physical needs. Some twenty-seven of these took supper under the spacious palm-leaf-covered arbor, provided by the Standings. A camp-fire provided the means for roasting the "wenies."

Supper over, the company was entertained by the reading of a steamer letter from Foster Howie, who, with his father and mother, Frank and Catherine Howie, and three brothers and one sister, were recent attenders at our meeting, but have now returned to their former home in Australia. Also, John G. Haines gave an interesting account of his and his wife's recent trip by boat from Baltimore, Md., to Los Angeles, California, by way of the Panama Canal.

At an early hour, after Scripture reading from the 19th Psalm, the company dispersed, some to cozy bed-rooms in the house, others to their downy (?) couches of straw, under the stars in the heavens, which, in their twinkling brightness, seemed indeed to "declare the glory of God."

First-day morning, about forty were gathered at First-day School and meeting, some coming from Pasadena that morning.

The Meeting for Worship seemed owned and favored by the Head of the Church. The silence was broken by earnest prayer, that the meeting might be thus favored. Several testimonies followed to the tendering of the assembly, and a concern was expressed for the young, and that none should dissipate by word or deed, the good we had received.

The conversion of Eliza Yates, under the searching ministry of Thomas Shillito, was referred to.

After a bountiful dinner, spread under the long pavilion, the company dispersed to their distant homes, with a feeling that it had been good for us to be there.

Any Friends journeying this way will always be welcome at our meetings, and if any one knows of Friends living, or recently coming, to this vicinity, we should be pleased to know of them.

CHARLES LAMB AND THE QUAKERS.

"Get the writings of John Woolman by heart, and love the early Quakers," wrote Charles Lamb.

This well-beloved essayist and poet dressed with a "Quaker-like plainness," and, according to Thomas Hood, might have passed for a "Quaker in black." His thoughts were expressed with a directness and simplicity characteristic of early Friends. "A self-pleasing quaintness" was the phrase used in describing his literary style.

Charles Lamb—we always think of him with his Christian name added, "So Christians," he said, "should call one another"—had a deep sympathy with Friendly ways and manners. In one of his essays he writes, "I love Quaker ways and Quaker worship. I venerate the Quaker principles. It does me good for the rest of the day when I meet any of their people in my path." He told Bernard Barton, a Friend, that "in matters not dogmatical, I hope I am half a Quaker." In Lucy Barton's album he wrote some verses in which we read that—

"Whitest thoughts, in whitest dress,
Candid meanings, best express
Mind of quiet Quakeress."

In one of the Essays of Elia, entitled, "A Quakers' Meeting," he writes, "Reader, wouldst thou know what true peace and quiet meant; wouldst thou find a refuge from the noises and clamours of the multitudes; wouldst thou enjoy at once solitude and society; wouldst thou possess the depth of thine own spirit in stillness, without being shut out from the consoling faces of thy species; wouldst thou be alone and yet accompanied; solitary, yet not desolate; singular, yet not without some to keep thee in countenance; a unit in aggregate; a simple in composite—come with me into a Quakers' Meeting."

Further on he says, "How far the followers of these good men in our days have kept to the primitive spirit, or in what proportion they have substituted formality for it, the Judge of Spirits can alone determine. I have seen faces in their assemblies upon which the dove sat visibly brooding. Others, again, I have watched, when my thoughts should have been better engaged, in which I could detect nothing but a blank inanity."

He noted that the speakers did not "hold forth" when they spoke, but seemed rather to be spoken from. The speaker was the channel through which the message flowed. He tells of hearing a female voice, "You cannot guess from what part of the meeting it proceeds—with a low, buzzing, musical sound, laying out a few words which she thought might suit the condition of some present." He adds that from what he observed, the men spoke less often.

Referring evidently to London Yearly Meeting, he writes very beautifully that "The very garments of a Quaker seem incapable of receiving a soil; and cleanliness in them to be something more than the absence of its contrary. Every Quakeress is a lily, and when they come up in bands to their Whitsun Conferences, whitening the easterly streets of the metropolis, from all parts of the United Kingdom, they show like troops of the Shining Ones."

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

WAR ON CHRISTIAN PRINCIPLES.—From the Providence Journal of many years ago comes this little article on one of the terms of the treaty with Mexico, then just made. It seems timely, and we wish that it might be taken seriously by those who are now striving to stir up war between our country and Mexico.

One of the conditions of the treaty with Mexico, it is said, is that any future war which may break out between the two countries shall be conducted on Christian principles. Now we all know that this is the age of progress, and that all sorts of improvements are constantly taking place in all sorts of matters; but war on Christian principles is certainly the latest, and if it is carried out, we think it will prove the greatest of them all.

Just imagine it; we think we can see two armies drawn out in battle array. A fair field is before them; the positions are taken, the great guns are unlimbered. General Scott is just about to give the order to fire, when an aide comes up and respectfully reminds him that the war is to be conducted on Christian principles, and that it will not do to fire. "Very true, very true," says the Commander-in-chief, "but what are they? I have read Vauban, and Scheiter, and Turenne, and Coehorn. I have read the lives of the old conquerors, and have studied the campaigns of the greatest soldiers, but I never happened to come across these principles in any work on military art. Do you know anything about it, Colonel?" "No," "Nor you, Major?" "Nor I, either." "I really don't know how to begin; I suppose it would not do to shoot. Suppose we send for the chaplain."

The chaplain arrives; "Do you know anything about fighting on Christian principles?" "Oh yes; it is the easiest thing in the world." "Where are the books?" "Here," and the chaplain takes out the Bible. "Really," says the General, "we ought to have thought of this before. It is a bad time to commence the study of tactics when the enemy is right before us; but I suppose we are bound by the treaty. What is the first thing, Chaplain?"

"Thou shalt not kill. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." "But those are not neighbors; they are Mexicans." "The same book tells us, a little further on, that the opportunity to do good to a man makes him our neighbor." "Will you go on, Chaplain?"

"Love your enemies. Do good to them that hate you. Pray for them that despitefully use you. If a man smite you on one cheek, turn to him the other."

"But while we are praying for the Mexicans, they will be firing on us."

"No; they are bound by the treaty also. It works both ways."

"Then what is the use of our arms?"

"This is all provided for in the same book. Beat your swords into ploughshares, and your spears into pruning-hooks."

"Then I don't see as there is anything for us to do here."

"Nothing, unless you send over and ask Santa Anna if he needs anything in the way of medicines, provisions, or clothing; I rather think the treaty requires this of us. And I don't know but we ought to send them a few school-teachers, for I understand they are a shockingly ignorant people."

"But how do you ever know which party conquers in this fighting on Christian principles?"

"That is the great beauty of it. Both sides conquer, and there are never any killed or wounded."

Now this is all the way that we know of conducting war on Christian principles. We should advise all countries which feel that they must go to war, to try it.

GREAT EXODUS FROM STRICKEN RUSSIA.

Not only by rail, but by horse carts and even sometimes on foot, the refugees are pouring from Russia into Poland. Our workers in Poland, investigating the Volhynia District with a view to agricultural reconstruction work there this fall, report large numbers of carts thronging the dusty highways. This district is part of the old Ukraine, the granary of Russia, but was allotted to Poland by the recent treaty.

The peasants coming along this road are mainly from southern Russia, although some have come from as far as Samara, and have spent four months on the journey. It is the more prosperous peasants who journey in this way, since they must possess at least one horse to make the trip. Sometimes they come with a span of horses or with a cow and calf following the wagon.

Peasants who have no possessions travel by train, sent back to Poland on the government railways by agreement between the Soviet Government and the Polish Government. They are given permits by the Soviet Government, which state that at their own request and on account of the food shortage, they are granted transportation out of Russia. At the Polish border they are received into large repatriation camps, where they are disinfected and held in quarantine for five days. The Polish Government established two of these camps at first with a capacity of 4,000, but these gave way completely under the tens of thousands of incoming refugees, and old barracks all over Poland are being rapidly fitted up as disinfecting and distributing stations.

On the whole the refugees are coming back in good physical condition. Most of them state that they had enough to eat until just now. They have been in the country districts of Russia. They all agree that now the harvest is burned dry in the fields, even the potatoes are burned. It was so hot, they say, that people fell down in the fields. Last year, say those from some districts, was also a bad harvest, but still one could live; but this year there is nothing.

The peasants who travel by rail are put off at the station nearest their village, and wait there, patiently sitting on the ground near the station on top of their baggage until some one comes from the village to take them home. They cannot read or write, so they have sent no word before coming. Sometimes they have a wait of many days before they can get word over to their village, which may be a day's journey from the railroad, and before their neighbors can spare a horse from their own harvest to come for them.

The condition of these returning peasants will be a serious one until the next harvest, perhaps the most serious relief emergency in Europe at present, except the Russian famine itself. Our Mission is planning agricultural relief to the extent of its resources this fall and winter, loaning ploughs and horses and doing tractor ploughing until frost sets in, and helping also with seed and with food for the children over the winter.

FEEDING THE FACTORY BOY.

The Jugendliche are often fed in the Fortbildungsschule, and it has been my privilege to be shown some of the work of these schools. While I waited for the feeding-time, 5.30, the Herr Direktor himself—who takes charge of the feeding of 250 of his 3,000 boys each day—invited me to his office, and as I settled down to read the magazine I was carrying for just such an occasion, he said from his bookcase: "Which do you prefer: Byron, Wordsworth or Keats?" It is curious how often after I have struggled painfully to express myself in German, so many will finally tell me in some such manner that they can speak English much better than I German.

I was glad to accept his invitation to see the building without knowing that it would be so exceedingly interesting as I found it.

The boys who spend one day a week there are apprenticed in many different trades—iron workers, bakeries, machine-shops, mechanic stores, weaving, wood-work. In the school the young baker learns the theory and the right and wrong way to make bread. I saw specimens of "petrified" bread exemplifying many different faults in bread-making. The boys had built a model complex modern oven and so learned the mechanism of one of the greatest of their tools.

The young iron-workers learned the chemistry of gases dealing with their work—and so all through the many trades the learners are taught the whys and wherefores of their work, enabling them to become masters in their particular line.

I asked the director whether there was much changing from one trade to another. "Of course, some, but really very little when they once become a master tradesman."

From the class rooms and laboratories we went out to the gymnasium where the boys had their extra meal. These boys are even more eager to talk with a foreigner than the children of the Volksschule. I asked these boys first about their occupations. Most of them (this was the city of Chemnitz) were workers in machine-shops. They receive from twenty-five to ninety marks a week, and work from three to six days in a week.

Many of them are very much alive to the world of ideas, and they asked many questions about America—about Quakers—and many other subjects. They seemed to be much impressed with the idea of Friends—that being friends with people makes for peace and greater happiness for all. They did not tell me—as a boy did in a gymnasium when I spoke of a future time when there would be no more war—"That is impossible." Though they were rather a rough set, many of them had force and were struggling for something in the line of thought; and I felt that it is being more worth while to visit these feeding-places and talk with these young people than with younger children who are delighted with a visit and chat about the food and friends from America, but who are less capable of understanding the ideals that prompt our work and the ideals which, put into practice, we believe would make for a much happier world.

It is for this reason, at least in part, that I believe the feeding of these young folks is a step that will bear fruit not only in stronger bodies, minds better able to meet the grave problems of the coming years, but also with hearts that respond to friendliness shown by strangers and so will not have bitterness and hate in their hearts for people they do not know.

I have talked to many of these boys in the Gymnasium and Oberrealschule. I am always impressed with their openness to the idea of friendship as ever against the alternative hate and war.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

The importance of clear thinking and right-mindedness on the part of the rank and file of us is intimated by our English Friend, Wm. E. Wilson, in his recent review in The Friend [London] of Norman Angell's book "The Fruits of Victory," as follows:

"For we should miss half the truth of the thesis of the 'Fruits of Victory' if we laid all the blame on statesmen. Even on this indemnity question, war passion among the people of France and Great Britain had as much to do with the framing of the so-called 'Reparation' clauses in the Versailles treaty, as had the views of statesmen, and it is the general post-war and war-produced temper of common people more than the deliberate policy of any statesman which prevents the world being reorganized on lines that might make for peace."

ENDURING FOUNDATION FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE.

In last month's Century Magazine, Edward A. Filene calls attention to the only enduring foundations for international peace when he says:—

"The Churches' fundamental ideas are justice, mercy, brotherhood. These are the foundations for international friendships, the foundations for international co-operation. The measures needed for the restoration of our material prosperity are the same as those needed for our spiritual salvation."

SUBJECTS FOR CONSIDERATION AT THE DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE.

The complex nature and the practical difficulties of the problems to come before the Washington Disarmament Conference become more evident the more concretely we face them, as is shown by examining the tentative agenda of the conference just announced. The outline is as follows:

LIMITATION OF ARMAMENT.

First:—Limitation of naval armament; basis of limitation; extent of limitation; fulfillment of conditions.

Second:—Rules for control of new agencies of warfare.

Third:—Limitation of land armament.

PACIFIC AND FAR EASTERN QUESTIONS.

First:—Questions relating to China. Principles to be applied:

Second:—Application to subjects.

(a) Territorial integrity.

(b) Administrative integrity.

(c) Open door; equality of Administrative and industrial opportunity.

(d) Concessions, monopolies and other economic privileges.

(e) Development of railways.

(f) Preferential railroad rates.

(g) Status of existing commitments; questions relating to Siberia; similar questions relating to China.

Third:—Mandated islands.

WILL HAYS ON THE POSSIBILITIES OF THE CONFERENCE.

Postmaster General, Will Hays, in his Labor Day speech, is reported to have said, "It is my opinion that the meeting possesses more potentiality for good for mankind than any single event in the last 1921 years. And in the confidence of deep conviction I predict that the forces working for its successful consummation, guided by this same great mind and sympathetic heart working the miracles for good in this country and inspired by his spirit, will bring from the conference a result which will be recognized as the most important meeting of men's minds in all history and the most fruitful upward step taken by the world since the day Christ first preached 'Peace on earth, good-will toward men.'"

SENATOR BORAH FAVORS STOPPING WORK ON NEW WARSHIPS.

Senator Borah and Senator Pomerene, it is said, will work for the immediate suspension of all unfinished naval construction if the Conference should reach an agreement affecting the present building program of the United States. Senator Borah himself would even favor an agreement to sink every battleship afloat, on the theory that the battleship is the foundation of armament. Our four delegates to the Conference, Secretary Hughes, Senator Lodge, Elihu Root and Senator Underwood, are supposed to approve of completing the present naval program. After that they would enter an agreement for a "Naval Holiday," or a definite limitation of naval construction, according to report.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

HADDONFIELD AND SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING.—Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting was held last Fifth-day in the peaceful old meeting-house at Medford. There were no visitors present in the station of minister, a rare occurrence, but one of those who spoke in the meeting for worship was a Friend from another Quarterly Meeting. After the luncheon interval the business meeting was opened, and was felt by some to be a time when the tide of spiritual life rose rather higher than in the first meeting.

In addition to the Queries, the minute from the Ministers and Elders of the Yearly Meeting Extension Committee (forwarded by the Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders held the day before at Haddonfield) was read, introducing afresh the whole subject of the ministry and its exercise. What seemed to be a three-fold concern, introduced by three different members, yet forming together one, took deep hold of the meeting; the right use of our time, especially what we term our leisure; the deepening of the spiritual life; and the meeting's responsibility and duties towards isolated members, in holding up their hands as they endeavor to witness faithfully to the Truth. Elizabeth Abbott Christ, through whose interest and effort the meeting is maintained at Orlando, Fla., spoke on the last subject. There was some thought of adopting what has come to be our regular way of dealing with everything: appointing committees to consider some of these questions, but our attention was called to the functions and responsibilities of the Overseers in just such matters as these, and it was finally decided that the Clerks should draw up a full and clear minute on the whole subject, and that this minute should be published in the next issue of the Quarterly Meeting Messenger, that it might claim the attention of the entire membership, and perhaps especially of those who are Overseers in the particular meetings.

A full and instructive report was made by the committee appointed to hold a Conference on Birthright Membership. This report was directed to be forwarded to the Yearly Meeting. Some of the papers read at this Conference (held on Ninth Month 10, at Woodbury, N. J.), have been secured for publication in THE FRIEND.

The Committee appointed some time ago with the thought of holding a possible Conference on the question of amusements, reported that way did not open for holding such a meeting, and they were accordingly released. In these days it requires a certain moral courage to make such a negative report, and even those who were deeply interested in the subject (as were certainly the members of the committee itself) were glad that the committee was faithful to its best light. At the close of the session there was read, as usual in this Quarterly Meeting, a Minute of Exercises, embodying some of the subjects presented by concerned members during the time we had sat together.

The American Friend follows in the footsteps of The Friend (London) and THE FRIEND (Philadelphia) in appointing contributing editors. The four names just announced are: Margjorie Hill Allee, John R. Webb, Samuel J. Haworth and Frank W. Dell.

The Pacific Friend, in a report of Friends' Mission in Guatemala, C. A., notes that the fifth Quarterly Meeting was organized this year. In all twelve Monthly Meetings are reported.

An appointed meeting at Mount Laurel on the 18th filled the opened half of the "big house." It is reported as a favored time.

We have reports of the successful opening of some of our schools. It is expected that the second number of next month will be largely devoted to education and that interesting details of all our schools will be included.

A NEW Social Study by B. Seebom Rowntree is announced for publication. This book ("The Human Factor in Business," Longmans) discusses the ideals which industry should set before itself. It deals with the problems daily arising in a large factory, and the attempts to solve them made by a particular firm. The author writes as a social reformer and from experience gained during thirty years as an industrial administrator. The book is published in the conviction that the results of individual experience should be put into the common stock, that the nation may arrive the sooner at satisfactory industrial conditions and permanent peace.

H. W. PEET.

TEN THOUSAND copies of the German translation of "Friends and War" have been produced by the Quaker centre in Berlin, Dorothenstrasse, 11, under the title "Die Quaker und der Krieg." Preliminary distribution among two hundred people has led to many requests for further copies. One man in Upper Silesia has asked for 2,000 to distribute among members of his Society, and a clergyman has asked to be allowed to advertise it in his paper, but expresses his fear that the requests that are likely to follow the announcement may be "too irksome for Friends to fulfil." Requests for ten or twenty copies are continually being received. A supply of the translation is being sent to the Friends' Bookshop, 140 Bishopsgate, London, E. C. 2, and will be on sale there.

H. W. PEET.

We have received from Hubert Peet an appreciation of William Frederick Wells, whose death has been a great loss to English Friends. For over fifty years he was a member of the Six Weeks' Meeting and its clerk for forty-eight; since 1874 he served Devonshire House Monthly Meeting as Clerk; his connection with the Meeting for Sufferings dated from 1875, and for forty years he was the mainspring of the London Friends' Institute. So one might multiply the list of appointments and interests. It is no wonder it was said of him, "William Frederic Wells is not only an individual but an institution."

In reporting a meeting of the Young Friends' Central Committee The Friend [London] notes that the Young Friends' newspaper is contemplated. As expensive as printing is it is well worth the cost if it brings the scattered membership of our Society into closer relationship.

Two more centenarians are added to the list of Friends to attain that advanced age. The Friend [London] notes that John Harlock, of Banbury, was one hundred on the twenty-sixth of Eighth Month and The American Friend gives an account of the centennial celebration for Mary Ann Newlin Coffin at Whittier, California.

NOTICE.

A PUBLIC MEETING for Divine worship will be held at Centre Meeting-house, near Centreville, Del., First-day, Tenth Month 2nd, at two o'clock. The meeting will be under the joint care of Race Street and Arch Street Friends. Those desiring transportation from Wilmington will please communicate with Dr. Robert H. Maris, 1009 Jefferson Street, Wilmington, Del.

CARE IN INSURANCE

The Provident was founded in 1865 by a group of Friends for the purpose of protecting the estates and insuring the lives of members of the Society of Friends.

Later the services of this Company were offered to other people who were known to be of careful habits.

A careful company insures only those people who are good moral as well as health risks. This results in a low death-rate, which is one of the elements of low cost of insurance.

Care is important—in insurance as well as in other things.

EDITORIAL NOTE.

ON the front page of THE FRIEND a few weeks ago we printed from The American Friend a poem that had been attributed to Marcia Doan. She was not the author of the poem. It is to be found in a volume by John Oxenham, entitled "Bees in Amber," and is on page 13 under the title, "The Pilgrim Way." Evidently Marcia Doan had copied it as making a particular appeal to her, and there is something very appropriate in it in connection with her earnest character.—[Eds.]

INSIGHT.

From the viewpoint of modern science—particularly from the viewpoint of psychology, the Scripture record in regard to the youthful Solomon is little less than startling. The modern translation has the prayer for insight, which is the word used for wisdom and knowledge in the old version, "Give thy servant, therefore, an attentive mind."

This might have originated in the laboratories of Columbia University with professors Dewey and Thorndike presiding! The aspiration for insight, the means for attaining it—the attentive mind, give us aim and method for education and for life (if we count education and life separate entities) as nearly perfect as we have any right to expect, even with the discoveries of modern psychology in dealing with such an independent variable as human nature. But the ancient record in the new form does more than this. It stands as a scathing rebuke to the present time out of the far-away past. If we are optimists enough to feel that our age actually desires insight, can we see many encouraging signs that it is ready to take the hard road of the attentive mind to attain it? Do we, in other words, seek carefully enough to understand the requirements and implications of cultivated attention?

In some directions there are those who seem to regard insight and genius as closely related, and both of them as endowments in which the aims and efforts of men have small part. Indeed, the claim is sometimes advanced that man-made insight—that which is evidently the product of the attentive mind, is little if any removed from cunning. One should be on guard against it, say those of this way of thinking. With such misunderstandings of the process of progress—of the essentials of application and hard work in character building, it is useless to deal. Those who would reason together must start with common premises and some sympathy of feeling.

What, then, in the process of time (since Solomon, let us say) have we learned about attention that should be serviceable to average men under ordinary conditions? In the educational realm there have been some studies on these lines that have come to be regarded as classical. They were made in Germany by Dr. Kraepelin.* (So far as we know they have never been "under suspicion.") Dr. Kraepelin demonstrated, by making class rooms his laboratories, that children's capacities for sustained attention are very much overrated. We arrange for them a five-hour day and assume that in each school period of that day they shall give undivided attention to the work in hand. Of course they do not give it—cannot give it. In the quaint words of the learned professor Kraepelin, "Dame Nature comes to the rescue and provides them protecting armor in the habit of inattention." So while school life—our educational system, is organized on the basis of the attentive mind, it actually produces a life habit of inattention that spoils many individual careers, and is responsible in degree for many unhappy national characteristics. More recent studies in this line at Columbia University are responsible for the statement that five minutes of fully sustained attention are worth an hour of the usual attention of the average school-room type. One begins to have a glimmering understanding of the great pressure of school life, and of the poor average character of scholarship. We desire insight for our children as a product of school training, but we have failed to give them the attentive mind as the ready instrument (the labor-saving machine) with which to acquire it.

This most difficult point of mental training may thus serve to put in bold relief the character of the present time, usually described as sensationalism. The attentive mind, of course, must make liberal use of sensation. To speak without strict regard to science this is the stuff out of which much of its knowledge is made, but it learns how to exclude sensations that do not concern a present line of thought, it retires into itself and discovers relationships, determines perspective, and thus develops creative power. But it does something else. It becomes aware that this creative power represents the acme of human attainment. As such it brings a large measure of exhilaration and joy into life. It reaches the point where it seems trivial if not degrading to rest in "mere sensation."

We are constrained to cry out against a sensational age, we say (or let the newspapers say) "the populace is moving-picture mad," "it lives on thrills." Have we no way to make it more clear (so clear as to attract others) that the thrills we find in the fruits of the attentive mind as noted above are more real, more lasting, more uplifting, than any that "mere sensation" can afford? Can we not demonstrate much more objectively than we do that the choice is between husks and fruit, poverty and wealth?

As with shame-facedness we confess our failures along these lines, even in our own circle, can we suggest a ready way out—is there some constructive word to say? Let us be frank about it. The youthful Solomon did not choose the easy way. He "despised the pain." His whole soul was in the venture of faith. That is still youth's way—it proves Solomon a real character. May it not be that we are somehow at fault in presenting so small a portion of life, as having a spiritual direction, a spiritual outcome? Have we not surrendered too much to mere materialism in everyday affairs? We speak of "the spiritual content of life." As Friends, we like to appropriate the phrases, "a religion of life," "the communion of life," "the sacraments of living." Nor have Friends failed utterly to translate these into a type of character. Braithwaite, as quoted by A. Neave Brayshaw, says, "The result [of this condition of spiritual responsiveness] has been to produce a type of character which is probably the chief enrichment of Christianity hitherto made by Quakerism." This spiritual responsiveness and this type of character must have the "attentive mind,"—attentive to the world of nature and to the world of God, the spiritual world, if we must think of the two separately. What we have done in that direction as a Society, we have mostly done unconsciously. It has drawn people to our schools, to our homes. If now we should be much more bold, should make the conscious effort to develop a method, might we not add much more to the enrichment of Christianity and so of Life? Shall we not be more ready to cast our mite into the world treasury? Our proclamation of a better way will not convince the votaries of sensationalism. But if as a background of our proclamations, there are lives more serenely and more profoundly joyous than theirs we shall recommend the attentive mind not merely as the way to insight, but as the most certain way to fullness of life. Wisdom is still better than rubies.

J. H. B.

FROM "CREED AND LIFE," BY EDWARD GRUBB IN "THE QUAKER."

People often say, "It is no matter what a man believes, so long as his life is right." It would be almost as sensible to say, "It is no matter what a man eats, as long as his health is good." It is true that a healthy digestion may dispose of some articles of food that would violently disagree with a weakly one; but it is also obvious that our health depends in large measure on the wholesomeness of the food we take. Just so our moral life depends very largely on what we imagine the Universe to be. If the heart of Reality, or God, is what Jesus Christ declared and showed in Himself, that is a definite moral ideal and an inspiration to follow it. The way of Christ must be our way, and in following Him we shall not go wrong. But if He was a dreamer, and the world is built on different principles from those on which He lived—if, for instance, it is a world in which "the race is to the swift" and in which the strongest survive by crushing the weak—then His way of life is not in accordance with the nature of things and we cannot with safety follow it. We have to make up our minds what we are to think of Christ; we cannot afford to leave the question to the theologians, as if it were an abstract one that does not concern us.

The intellectual energy that was put into the framing of the Creeds of Christendom—misguided as it was, especially in anathematizing all who could not accept the formula that resulted—was not all wasted. The Creeds did at least preserve, though without reconciling them, the two things that really matter; that Jesus Christ was at once really Divine and truly human. They tried to account for this by the theory that two radically different natures were combined in a single person; but this theory depended on a philosophy about natures which can never be ours. The best minds in Christendom are now engaged in the search for a better explanation which will probably be reached in the light of new discoveries as to the meaning of personality, an idea which was not in the minds of the Greek theologians and which they had no word to express. But the fact that they did retain the two elements, the Divine and the human in Jesus Christ, is of priceless importance because it involves a thought of God which makes a vast difference to our moral life. It means that the Christian God is One who could express Himself, and has expressed Himself, in a particular fact in history; in the emergence of a perfect human life. It means that God for us is a Being with a definite personal character—a character like that of Jesus—and that our true life is a development into this character or image. Hence the Christian belief, when held with sincerity and understanding, vitally affects our life as moral beings; for, as has been said before, this depends in no small measure on the sort of God we worship.

CARRYING OUR MEETING WITH US.

After summer vacation time it is not unusual to hear from Friends of their experience with meetings. It is not the least of the advantages of Quakerism that it permits us to carry our meetings with us. The following instance is from The Friend (London):—

It is probably not uncommon for Friends who spend their holidays in a seaside place where there is no meeting to take the opportunity of attending other places of worship, and as a result to find themselves more than ever in love with our simple Quaker way. But Friends should realize that there are other possibilities when no settled meeting is within reach. Quite recently it occurred to a party of members and attenders on a visit to an East coast town to hold a Friends' meeting. A little company of eight persons whose ages ranged from the early teens to the fifties, settled amid the bracken in a secluded spot on the cliffs and found it in truth to be holy ground. The murmur of the sea and the flight of gulls contrasted strangely with the street noises of their accustomed London meeting, but their thoughts wandered lovingly to the Friends gathered there as they felt themselves overshadowed by the universal love. The elders among them were helped by the evident desire shown by the younger members of the party that the meeting should be held.

SHOW US THY GRACE.

Show us our need, O Lord; how lost, how helpless,
How poor, how sunk in sin our carnal hearts;
Show us how vain to change our sad condition,
Our best endeavor and our utmost arts;
Show us how weak we are, and how dependent,
How multiplied defeats our pride abase;
And then, O Lord, lest we despair too wholly—
Show us Thy grace!

Show us Thy grace, the great, the all-sufficient,
Infinite riches for our poverty.
Mercy of God for uttermost salvation,
Weapon that turns defeat to victory;
Gladness unspeakable and full of glory,
Beyond our needs, a vast, unmeasured space.
Lord, as we never yet have seen or known it.
Show us Thy grace!

—ANNIE JOHNSON FLINT, in Sunday School Times.

"BUT to be a pacifist is not to be a passivist."—DR. E. VIVONT BROWN.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING.

[We printed an account of Ohio Yearly Meeting last week. The following report is now at hand from a member and differs sufficiently from Watson W. Dewees's account to justify its appearance.—Eds.]

The Meeting convened Seventh-day morning, Ninth Month 10th, with about the usual number of our members in attendance. Edward T. Binns and Sarah W. Cooper from Pennsylvania, and Rebecca and Jesse McKeel from New York, were present with minutes for service among Ohio Friends. William and Eleanor Elkinton, Watson W. Dewees, Mary and Sara Kennard from Philadelphia, William Cornell, Anna Cornell and Elizabeth Richardson from Canada, John and Sina Mott and their son and daughter from Iowa, and John Fletcher and wife from Ireland, were visiting Friends in attendance. Their presence in our circle and their services among us were encouraging and edifying. Epistles were received and read from the six Yearly Meetings with which we correspond, and one from the first Yearly Meeting of Friends held in Germany. A concern arose in our meeting, that if replies were sent to these greetings from distant brethren and sisters, that they might not be merely formal letters, but that they might be written and sent to those addressed, as the result of a lively concern for a "growth in grace and in the knowledge of the Truth" in us, and in His children everywhere.

When the answers to the Queries were being considered, and at other times we realized that the religion of our Lord Jesus Christ is a "religion of power and of love," and that our relation to it is one of very vital importance, and that its principles are as thoroughly up-to-date now, as ever they were. Sane thinking in religious matters, pure and holy living, and a return to first principles, are living issues in our day, and lively and earnest petitions were offered that we may always continue to stand for "the Truth as it is in Jesus Christ." Religion in our daily living, in the home, in our schools, in our dress and deportment are real concerns with us yet. We do not all live up to our privilege, but our concern is, that, as we have known a partaking of the bounties of the Lord's table, we may experience a growth in best things as the years speed on.

Edward T. Binns and others expressed a concern to have an appointed meeting for the young and middle-aged. Their concern was united with and a meeting appointed to be held Fourth-day afternoon at three o'clock. This meeting was a solemn and a favored time. After a period of silence and of waiting, Edward T. Binns revived the declaration, "God so loved the world that he sent his only begotten Son into the world, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but should have everlasting life," and enlarged on the subject of God's marvelous love and His dealings with His children in a way that touched our hearts.

Ellwood B. Conrad arose with King David's exhortation to his son, "Solomon, my son, know thou the God of thy fathers, and serve him with a perfect heart and a willing mind. If thou seek Him early He will be found of thee, but if thou forsake Him, he will cast thee off forever;" and followed with a lively testimony suitable for the occasion. Many others spoke also and we were made to rejoice together, that in our day, as always, "there is a river the streams whereof make glad the whole heritage of God." The business of the Yearly Meeting was transacted with much unity and harmony.

Near the time for adjournment Fifth-day we were baptized together in tenderness and tears. We realized that we are passing away, and that never again will we be permitted to meet again just as we were that day. There may be some of our number who may be soon called to their eternal home, and some firesides will have a vacant chair, and we realized deeply that of some of us it may be said before the coming of another Yearly Meeting that "the places that know us now, shall know us no more forever."

Whatever may be our allotted time here, when the time comes for that glorious reunion in the world to come, may we all be there, to sing His praise throughout the endless aeons of eternity.

GEORGE G. MEGRAIL.

TESTIMONY-BEARING OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY TYPE.

The following item appeared in The Friend (London) of Ninth Month 8th:—

R. Barclay Murdoch writes of a recent visit to Bilthoven, Holland, paid en route to Germany, and of fellowship there with Cornelis and Beatrice Boecke. He says: "Many Friends are aware that Cornelis and Beatrice Cadbury Boecke have several times been torn away from their family (five little girls, the eldest but eleven), and imprisoned because of their unflinching testimony against war, and fearless preaching of the Gospel of peace and good-will. It may not be so generally known that, last year, the Dutch Government took away considerably over £200 worth of furniture, &c., for the non-payment of a military tax. Letters just to hand tell of the likelihood of another distraint for the same tax this year, and further persecution and prosecution because of the encouragement they are giving to young men who, for conscience' sake, are resisting and intend to resist the operation of the Conscription law. The drawing of lots for the purposes of this law takes place within the next few weeks, and our Friends earnestly desire the sympathy and prayers of Friends, that they may be upheld in bearing the testimony to which they feel called.

"Having felt called upon, in obedience to their Lord and Master, to surrender all their worldly investments and possessions, they are now entirely dependent upon their own industry for their subsistence. The principal means at their disposal for this purpose is photography, and they are producing some very fine views of the district, etc."

SINAI NOW.

I do not know anything which would just now be more healthy than the solemn introduction of the Ten Commandments into the parlor, into the club, into the counting-house, into society.

"Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor."

"Thou shalt not steal."

"Thou shalt not commit adultery."

It is a great and a deepening thing to lift the eyes upon this hill called Sinai and to listen to its bugle speech. Sinai lays a strong grip upon our chaos, and it transforms loose compromise into noble decision.

And surely if Sinai is needed to-day in personal life it is equally needed in corporate life. Morally anarchic influences are ravaging society. The imperative of the moral law is flouted as a myth.

The anarchy is touching marriage with its defilement.

It is desecrating the family.

It is dissolving every kind of sacred bond.

It is dishonoring covenants.

It is unloosening the sanctity of speech.

It is laughingly decrying the necessity of worship.

We have been forgetting Sinai, and I am afraid that the hill called Lucre, with its silver mine, has been taking its place.

Therefore I plead that, in personal and national life, Sinai be re-established in the mountain range of our ideals. Sinai is the sublime height of moral law. Sinai is the proclamation of God's most holy will. "Thy righteousness is like the great mountains." "I will lift up mine eyes unto this hill, from whence cometh my help."

JOHN HENRY JOWETT.

GUILIELMA CROSSFIELD is reported as expressing the following in Bedfordshire Quarterly Meeting: Sometimes our meetings are manifestly held in the power of God; why not always? She thought that the low spiritual level of our average lives accounted in large measure for the poverty of many of our meetings for worship. There will often be some present in a meeting who are careless or indifferent, but there ought to be enough power in a meeting to overcome and reach such.

WAR AND TRADE.

In planning the Hague Tribunals, Leagues of Nations, Disarmament Conferences, etc., it is well to remember that no machinery for settling disputes or for making military preparations less costly will prevent wars as long as the chief cause for war is left untouched. Unless the great casus belli of modern times can be chained it will in time of crisis over-leap all tribunals and drag nations into war, prepared or unprepared.

The present writer supervised recently the compilation of excerpts from standard histories on the causes of modern wars. The result was overwhelming testimony to the fact that since the religious and dynastic elements were eliminated or minimized (about the middle of the seventeenth century), the fundamental war-cause has been the trade question. This question has been of course at the heart of the whole modern movement of territorial expansion. It involves not only the question of protection vs. free trade, but the securing of raw materials, investment of surplus capital in backward nations, navigation laws, and many related problems.

The expansion of international trade that has come in recent times, as a result of the Industrial Revolution, is of course without parallel in recorded history. The value of Great Britain's commerce, expressed in millions of pounds sterling, was 11.1 in 1703, 62.3 in 1800, and 1, 32.3 in 1912. The foreign trade of the United States, including imports and exports, expressed in millions of dollars, was 162.2 in 1800, and 2,244.4 in 1900. A competent authority computing the world's commerce in billions of dollars, gives 1.5 as the figure for 1800 and 10 for 1899. This means an increase of 1,233 per cent. during the century. Unless the problem of international trade and finance can be regulated by mutual agreement on some basis of approximate justice to all nations, great and small, the great war-cause will go marching on.

An extremely serious aspect of the question is that in recent times, especially since the war, the great industrial nations have shown an intensified spirit of national exclusiveness in their trade policies. We Americans know very well how the pendulum has swung in our own country. In other countries the tendency to take up the cudgels of the trade war is equally marked. A pamphlet has been issued recently by the United States Tariff Commission entitled, "Introductory Survey of Colonial Tariff Policies." In its summary of recent tendencies (pp. 78-79) it shows how the open door policy has been losing ground steadily during the past twenty years. It then points out that during the same period "the establishing of preferential tariffs has been going on steadily." Not only so, but "since 1890 the whole preferential system may be said to have revived after the lapse of half a century." This change is called "the protectionist reaction from the free-trade movement of the middle of the nineteenth century." Then follows a summary of the facts as related to the policies of France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Japan and the British Empire. In recent years the British dominions and crown colonies have adopted, more and more, the policy of giving preference to British trade. For a long time England, true to her free trade policy, did not reciprocate. In 1910, however, began her movement toward the preferential policy. "The maintenance by the British Imperial Government of a preferential tariff policy can scarcely fail to lead to the further extension of such a policy among the Crown colonies. The war reinforced the spirit both of nationalism and of imperialism. The fiscal needs of the Government and the depression of industry alike suggest the exploitation of this spirit by the raising of tariffs and the enforcement of new or increased differentials."

This threatening aspect of international relations is perhaps not studied and emphasized enough among Friends. The one great lack of the All Friends' Conference in London was the nearly complete neglect, in the discussions, of the problem of international trade. The question was treated adequately in the English preliminary Reports, but not on the floor of the Conference. It seemed passing strange thus to overlook the most prolific cause of modern wars.

Selfish trade interests never overlook the problem. They see the issue in crystal clearness. They knew instantly the implications of the third one of President Wilson's Fourteen Points: "The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions." From the moment that point was enunciated the organs of certain American commercial interests, and their spokesmen in Congress, began to oppose the proposed peace program. One Journal came out frankly in opposition to the whole idea of internationalism, saying bluntly: "Americanism is Protection; Internationalism is Free Trade."

The present writer is not an advocate of immediate, complete free trade, although he feels sure the world must move ultimately in that direction. Certainly, however, the nations must come soon to some method of adjusting the problems of trade rivalry on a just and equitable basis. If we are now entering a period of unrestricted nationalistic trade rivalry, we are headed straight toward "the next war." It behoves us as friends of peace to recognize this great issue and face it unflinchingly.

"THE FRUITS OF VICTORY."

[This is the title of Norman Angell's new book. We trust many Friends will read it and that we shall have a review of it from one of them. The book is a veritable storehouse of invincible arguments against war—all war. The following extracts will give our readers the essence of some of the principal points.—Eds.]

"The outstanding facts of the present situation most worth our attention in this connection are these: Military predominance, successful war, evidently offer no solution either of specifically international or of our common social and economic problems. The political disintegration going on over wide areas in Europe is undoubtedly related very intimately to economic conditions, actual lack of food, the struggle for ever-increasing wages and better conditions. Our attempted remedies—our conferences for dealing with international credit, the suggestion of an international loan, the loans actually made to the enemy—are a confession of the international character of that problem.

"All this shows that the economic question, alike nationally and internationally, is not, it is true, something that ought to occupy all the energies of men, but something that will, unless dealt with adequately; is a question that simply cannot be swept aside with magnificent gestures. Finally, the nature of the settlement actually made by the victor, its characteristic defects, the failure to realize adequately the victor's dependence on the economic life of the vanquished, show clearly enough that, even in the free democracies, orthodox statecraft did indeed suffer from the misconception which 'The Great Illusion' attributed to it.

"What do we see today in Europe? Our preponderant military power—overwhelming, irresistible, unquestioned—is impotent to secure the most elementary forms of wealth needed by our people: fuel, food, shelter. France, who in the forty years of her 'defeat' had the soundest finances in Europe, is, as a victor over the greatest industrial nation in Europe, all but bankrupt. (The franc has fallen to a discount of over seventy per cent.) All the recurrent threats of extended military occupation fail to secure reparations and indemnities, the restoration of credit, exchange, or general confidence and security.

FORCE DOES NOT SOLVE PROBLEMS.

"And just as we are finding that the things necessary for the life of our peoples cannot be secured by military force exercised against foreign nations or a beaten enemy, so are we finding that the same method of force within the limits of the nation used by one group as against another, fails equally. The temper or attitude toward life which leads us to attempt to achieve our end by the forcible imposition of our will upon others, by dictatorship, and to reject agreement, has produced in some degree everywhere revolt and rebellion on the one side, and repression on the other, or a general disruption and the breakdown of the co-operative processes by which mankind lives. All the raw materials of wealth are here on the earth as they were ten years ago. Yet Europe either starves or slips into social chaos, because of the economic difficulty.

"In the way of the necessary co-operation stands the Balkanization of Europe. Why are we Balkanized rather than federalized? Why do Balkan and other border states fight fiercely over this coal field or that harbor? Why does France still oppose trade with Russia, and plot for the control of an enlarged Poland or reactionary Hungary? Why does America now wash her hands of the whole muddle in Europe?

"Because everywhere the statesmen and the public believe that if only the power of their state were great enough, they could be independent of rival states, achieve political and economic security and dispense with agreements and obligations.

"If they had any vivid sense of the vast dangers to which reliance upon isolated power exposed any state, however great; if they had realized how the prosperity and social peace of their own states depended upon the reconciliation and well-being of the vanquished, the treaty would have been a very different document, peace would long since have been established with Russia, and the moral foundations of co-operation would be present.

THE ECONOMIC DILEMMA.

"There are other considerations. A French journalist asked plaintively: 'If we want the coal why don't we go in and take it—by the occupation of the Ruhr. The implication is that France could get the coal for nothing. Well, France has taken over the Saar Valley. By no means does she get the coal for nothing. The miners have to be paid. France tried paying them at an especially low rate. The production fell off; the miners were discontented. They had to be paid more. Even so the Saar has been 'very restless' under French control, and the last word, as we know, will rest with the men. Miners who feel they are working for the enemy of their fatherland are not going to give a high production. It is a long exposed illusion that slave labor—labor under physical compulsion—is a productive form of labor. Its output invariably is small. So assuredly France does not get this coal for nothing. And from the difference between the price which it costs her as owner of the mines and administrator of their workers, and that which she would pay if she had to buy the coal from the original owners and administrators (if there is a difference on the credit side at all) has to be deducted the ultimate cost of defense and of the political complications that that has involved. Precise figures are obviously not available; but it is equally obvious that the profit of seizure is microscopic.

"Always does the fundamental dilemma remain. France will need above all, if she is to profit by these raw materials of European industry, markets, and again markets. But markets mean that the iron which has been captured must be returned to the nation from which it was taken, on conditions economically advantageous to that nation. A central Europe that is consuming large quantities of metallurgical products is a Central Europe growing in wealth and power and potentially dangerous unless reconciled. And reconciliation will include economic justice, access to the very 'property' that has been seized.

"The foregoing is not now, as it was when the present author wrote in similar terms a decade since, mere speculation or hypothesis. Our present difficulties with reference to the indemnity or reparations, the fall in the exchanges or the supply of coal are precisely of the order just indicated. The conqueror is caught in the grip of just those difficulties in turning conquest to economic account upon which 'The Great Illusion' so repeatedly insisted."

IMPARTIALITY IMPOSSIBLE IN WAR.

"That is the ultimate indictment of this war as of all wars: the attitude toward life, the ideas and motive forces out of which it grows, and which it fosters, make men less able to live together, their society less workable, and must end by making free society impossible. War not only arises out of the failure of human wisdom from the defect of that intelligence by which alone we can successfully fight the forces of Nature, it perpetuates that failure and worsens it. For only by a passion which keeps thought at bay can the 'moral' of war be maintained.

"The very justification which we advance for our wartime censorship and propaganda, our suspension of free speech and discussion, is that if we gave full value to the enemy's case, saw him as he really is, blundering, foolish, largely helpless like ourselves; saw the defects of our own and our allies' policy, saw what our own acts in war really involved which aroused our anger when done by the enemy, if we saw all this and kept our heads, we should abandon war. A thousand times it has been explained that in an impartial mood we cannot carry on war; that unless the people come to feel that all the right is on our side and all the wrong on the enemy's, moral will fail. The most righteous war can only be kept going by falsehood. The end of that falsehood is that our mind collapses. And although the mind, thought, judgment, are not all-sufficient for man's salvation, it is impossible without them. Behind all other explanations of Europe's creeping paralysis is the blindness of the millions, their inability to see the effects of their demands and policy, to see where they are going.

"Only a keener feeling for truth will enable them to see. About indifferent things—about the dead matter that we handle in our science—we can be honest, impartial, true. That is why we succeed in dealing with matter. But about the things we care for—which are ourselves—our desires and lusts, our patriotisms and hates, we find a harder test of thinking straight and truly. Yet there is the greater need; only by that rectitude shall we be saved. There is no refuge but in truth."

GUARDING THE SPRINGS.

[The great work for Temperance in the United States during the past thirty years is probably the most outstanding illustration one could cite of the principle that what goes into the schools comes out in the future nation. This fact makes one shudder for France as an announcement like the following is read. Over against the French situation we have had in the United States more than a million copies of a text book of history used in the public schools and teaching peace by the potent method of indirection. The United States History of our late friend Allen C. Thomas has had this great service. It was written to show "peace more strong than war." It is probably the most monumental item of Peace work ever accomplished single-handed.—Eos.]

France has issued official text books for use in schools that reveal her mind pretty clearly. "War," say these books, "is the noblest flower in the world." The child is asked the simple question, "Why was it good to be alive in 1914?" And lest there should be any ambiguity about the answer, the text book supplies it: "Because you would be the first to fight." Yet it has been demonstrated that big armies and big navies are no guarantee for the peace of the world. How is peace to survive? We need an educated public opinion. History must be taught in a new way in our schools. The tragedy of 1914 is still fresh in our minds, with its warning to give to the young, the new ideas which will bring in the Kingdom of our Lord and His Christ.

The distinctive and regulative article of the Christian faith is that its founder is the conqueror of death, and that He shares this power with all His followers. The Greek Church has never lost this witness or its gladness—and their wonderful salutation, "Christ is risen!" with its due response, "He is risen indeed!" rings round the world. When all Christian men and women really believe what that implies, and grasp along with it all the fulness of His message in making that new life visible among men, then will His Kingdom have truly come.

SOME FOREIGN ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

Man is the only animal who holds other creatures in captivity for personal enjoyment or for purposes of instruction. Some ants are said to keep other ants as slaves to do their work for them, but this statement draws heavily on our credulity. Among the interesting features of foreign cities are the Zoological Gardens. There you discover what those communities do to encourage innocent and helpful pleasures for the populace. Such resorts have an international value—they tend to broaden a knowledge of geography and to create a sympathy for distant states and their natural conditions. As far as I know the people of the British Empire emphasize the value of Zoological Gardens above those of other nationalities. Wherever you travel, the world over, you find that the folk who have distributed themselves from the tight little island in the North Atlantic have their invaluable exhibitions of tigers, lions and elephants. Northern Europe is a goodly second.

There is Copenhagen. Any sunny summer afternoon in that delightful old capital of Denmark you can board one of the clean little trains, with their superlatively polite conductors who always tip their caps to the ladies as they enter or leave the car, and soon quietly be wandering around the handsome Zoological Garden. Of course there is the regulation show of animals and birds. But the distinctive thing is the throng of happy families, or social parties, who gather around the little tables under the spreading trees and laugh and talk and sip coffee, tea or beer by the hour. As the long twilight of the far north deepens into night and the electric lamps send their rays over all, as the music softly vibrates down the broad pathways and blends with the hum of nearby voices one meditates more on the things of human interest about him than on the clipped and barred creatures he came to see. The latter become, for the moment, a secondary consideration.

One of the most ridiculous sights I have ever witnessed was behold one evening in the Zoological Garden of Amsterdam, Holland, when two chimpanzees were getting ready for bed. The crowd of people outside their cage laughed until their sides must have ached. One chimpanzee was trying to get into a gunney-sack and the other into a very big bath towel. The gunny-sack operation was the most difficult. The care with which arrangements and calculations as to the exact procedure were made, before each attempt, was absurdly human. With much wriggling and many underbreath simian expletives one foot would disappear, then the other, then the body, then an arm, but, alack! the last arm would get caught in the mesh of the bagging, and the victim would be stalled. His wrath became boundless. He would jump out of his garment, grab it with both hands and with fiendish wrinkles in every lineament and with glaring eyes slap it up and down on the floor until exhausted. Having satisfied his impotent rage, a period of profound meditation ensued. Then the childish play was re-enacted. The chimpanzee with the bath-towel did not have much better success. Finally, both wearily ensconced themselves in their "nighties," snuggled into a corner, blinked and yawned and, when we left them, were drifting off into monkey dreamland.

The London Bear-pits are exceptionally fine. They are made of concrete, so that the eye of the observer is on the same level as that of the bears. There is no railing to obstruct the view; there is a realistic rocky background and the big hairy creatures, with moist shining noses high in air, are often uplifted on their haunches. All makes an ideal pose for the kodlaker who can stand twenty feet away and take snap-shots to his heart's content. But does the sun always shine in London? When a clear sky favors you—and some summer days in that hazy old village can be very fine—you speed to the Zoo with your camera lest mist or rain dampen your ardor before you reach your quarry.

Across the sometimes placid Irish Sea, within a few hours of England, we voyage to the oft tumultuous shores of Ireland,

When I visited the Dublin Zoological Garden, I was shown some magnificent lion cubs remarkable for being the ninth generation born in captivity. They were strong, sleek and frisky—real young lions in spite of their abnormal heredity. It takes more than nine generations to banish the spirit of the lion, with his intrepidity and timidity, from most of us. But a lion with Irish ancestry—how turbulent we expect him to be after long breeding in such an environment! Each family of Dublin cubs is given the company of an Irish terrier, and it is claimed that the juveniles are more gentle because of this curious association—queer, is it not!

Let us speed across two oceans and a continent and investigate the fascinating little Zoo at Kyoto, Japan. Our Japanese friends—like all of us—have much to learn, but full well they know how to apply their exquisite oriental taste to occidental usages. I visited this resort in early winter. The stock in hand was not large, but the gardening was a joy. It was typically Japanese with dwarfed shrubbery and picturesquely-fashioned trees—every twig and leaf seemed hung to produce the best possible effect of grace and beauty. Pretty shelving thatched roofs peeped from every corner. The motionless water in the tiny ponds perfectly reflected, as in a mirror, the restful scene. Do not forget this modest Zoo when you go to Kyoto—it is in a class all its own.

Next, three weeks distant by steamer—we seek Sydney, Australia, with its Zoological Garden that justly claims the handsomest setting in the world. It is on a steep hillside, several miles out of town, across the bay. One unusual feature of this garden is the elephant-track around which a big elephant slowly tramps with a bunch of lively antipodal kiddies on his back. The tiger and lion quarters are rocky and extensive and are admirably arranged for observation. The walks and walls, the flowers and trees are delightful, but the glory of all is the superb vista of many miles through the trees down the slope over the dancing water, with crafts of all descriptions on its surface, and the busy city mistily outlined against the dim horizon. You enjoy all this diversified gladness, including a short sea voyage across the beautiful rock-ribbed and tree-green Sydney harbor, by paying a very moderate sum.

It is a far cry from Australia to South Africa over the lonely southern Indian Ocean. This enticing land has but 1,000,000 white people, yet its relatively small cities have some of the best exhibitions of Zoology in the world. Possibly the fact that the Union of South Africa has an almost unbounded area, and is peculiarly rich in all manner of four-footed and creeping things, has something to do with the great attention paid to zoography by its people. Last year (1920) during a great drive in Zululand, in the eastern part of the Union, there occurred what was believed to be the greatest massacre of wild animals in history. All the Zoos throughout the colony are new but skillful landscape gardeners have without exception done good work in every one of them. A few years' culture produces luxuriant effects in that exuberant climate.

The most impressive lion I have seen was in the spacious and beautiful garden of Johannesburg, a city of about 100,000. His tawny mane hung in great fagged flaps around his huge head, whilst he looked disdainfully through it at the puny creatures who had trapped and held him. William Blake (1757) has written:

And there the lion's ruddy eyes
Shall flow with tears of gold.

Does the captive King of Beasts of Johannesburg pine for the dark strongholds and the old-time lordship of his native jungle?

At the extreme southern corner of Africa is the small town of Port Elizabeth. The "Snake Park" of that community should be enough to make it famous. Here the wayfarer discovers a unique contribution to the cause of science. Beneath the generous shade of splendid trees and besieged by the pretty flowers that surround an excellent museum, is the home of some two hundred reptiles. The snake Park is a rectangular enclosure, possibly about 60x100 feet in size, with a concrete wall around it just high enough for an adult to look over the top. The area where the snakes are shut up is somewhat lower than the feet of the observer. Within, close to the wall, is the pond filled with aquatic plants where disport water snakes of all sizes and sorts in apparent amity and fellowship. The park is agreeably laid out and its walks and grass, its young trees and shrubbery are well cared for. The brown-colored snakes sprawl or curl up on the brown gravel of the pathways, whilst those of variegated greens or yellows seek refuge in the trees, where it is difficult to follow their sinuous lines among the leaves and branches. Inside the park were four miniature kraals, or native huts, and into them crowded a wriggling, interlocked mass of reptiles until the keeper would overturn them and, with his long forked club, force his grisly charges to disperse in all directions. The keeper is a colored man and wears good thick leggings. He is very learned in snakely lore, and has written a book on the subject. To see him deftly handle malignant adders, pythons or cobras, whilst with angry necks and darting tongues they try to attack him, is a funny, gruesome sight.

Pretoria, one of the capitals of the Union of South Africa, with its 30,000 people and sparsely settled surroundings, seems all too small to support an institution devoted to the science of animals. On the contrary, Pretoria maintains one of the best equipped Zoos to be found anywhere and it will patronized. The pièce de résistance is "Joe," a wise chimpanzee. I was warned to keep a weather eye on him when entering the paddock to take his picture, in the act of holding a tin cup whilst his keeper poured water into it. Joe is a conservative—he reminds me of the passport officials of many countries I have been in since the armistice—he is suspicious of strangers, no matter how excellent their introductions may be. He has the gifts of a good alien officer.

One of the wonders of the Pretoria Zoo is a gigantic hippopotamus. He has had his troubles. Some years since a bystander thoughtlessly threw a bottle into his capacious mouth. Months of suffering and sundry critical surgical operations resulted. Sir Frederick Treves, the eminent physician and traveler, has written of the hippo: "It represents no cerebral faculties beyond a flaccid instinct to live, for it is little more than a mass of blubber provided with a mouth and floating in a pool." Whilst standing by the pool of this Pretorian beast he suddenly emerged, six feet away, and gaped the widest gape I ever witnessed. Surely he has a "flaccid instinct" to eat, if nothing else, for I looked into an enormous cavern of fiery red!

It almost seems unfair to incarcerate God's creatures within the narrow confines of a Zoo. But after all is said we must admit that they are mostly well provided for. My ideal of animal and bird liberty has been found in the whale and albatross. Possibly both are too big to be successfully restrained. To behold schools of the former gloriously spouting in the seven seas or to watch the latter, with magnificent sweep of wing sailing between lowering skies and the heaving southern ocean, gives one a sense of the eternal freedom that God designs for His creation. I have never seen a whale or an albatross in a Zoological Garden, and do not expect to find them there!

BOOK REVIEWS.

"THE SALVAGING OF CIVILIZATION."

Many people who have been working and looking for a better social order in the world have likely felt grateful for the championing of their cause by England's masterful writer, H. G. Wells. Had his health permitted, he would have lectured in this country last spring, but the Saturday Evening Post was recently chosen as his mouthpiece to bring six messages to the American public. And now the Macmillan Company has published these in book form.

"The Salvaging of Civilization" is his theme, and he makes some most interesting deductions from history and bold suggestions for the future. One would consider Wells an optimist rather than a pessimist. But for such a thorough going "Evolutionist" his opening argument is rather startling. He says: "There are some things that it is almost impossible to tell without seeming to scream and exaggerate, and yet these things may be in reality the soberest matter of fact. I want to say that this civilization is tumbling down, and I think tumbling down very fast: that I think rapid enormous efforts will be needed to save it; and that I see no such efforts being made at the present time."

Wells has long been a keen student of history as well as of human nature, but of course his observations are colored with a rather materialistic point of view. As he leaves God out of these interpretations of history and suggestions for the future "salvaging of civilization," true Christians will likely discount many of his suggestions. Perhaps therefore it is the more important for us to study his message carefully and not be misled. In the first place many "efforts" are being made by churches and groups of people to make the world a better, safer place to live in; and God is at work among the nations of the world "to take out of them a people for His name" (Acts xv: 14), and as in the first century God is "adding to the church such as are being saved."

But Wells is looking at the great outstanding facts of the larger groups of people as he sees them. As a result of recent travels in Europe he contrasts the "moral" of 1920 with that of 1919 and of 1914 and finds no cause for any encouragement. Rather than the "moral awakening" expected after the patriotic altruism of the war period, he discovers a decided moral slump. Perhaps even Wells would agree with Cora Harris in her very keen analysis of present-day religious tendencies in "My Son"—when she says: "Patriotism is far more emotional than religion and not nearly so lasting in its effects on character."

The remedy for this world situation H. G. Wells believes, to be education; a complete and unified system of school and church education throughout the world. This will develop a generation of people who will learn to think in terms of a World State with regard and appreciation for all races and all nations. If our United States of America could develop a unity of purpose with the help of the railroads and the telegraph and telephone, the other states of the world should be able, with our modern means of communication, to create a spirit of mutual understanding and co-operation. A system of government is suggested for such a World State. We would do away with all "diplomacy" because it would be a World Nation, and thereby we would do away with all war. War has always been a state of mind; and education, he argues, will change this state of mind. "If Europe is to be saved from ultimate disaster," says Wells, "Europe has to stop thinking in terms of the people of France, the people of England, the people of Germany, the French, the British, the Germans, and so forth. Europe has to think at least in terms of the people of Europe, if not of the civilized people of the world. If we Europeans cannot bring our minds to do that there is no hope for us. . . . Fresh wars will destroy the social fabric and Europe will perish as nations fighting."

This is quite true; but Wells seems to forget that since William Carey went to India and the first Foreign Missionary Society was formed over 125 years ago a small minority of the church of Jesus Christ has been thinking in terms quite beyond even the civilized nations of the world; for to those of Christian education "there is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free . . . for ye are all one in Christ Jesus."

But let us continue with the Wells argument. He diagnoses the disease of the world to be a great lack of cohesion or mutual trust or pulling together. His picture of Europe closely resembles the conditions prophesied by Daniel concerning the divided ten kingdoms of the old Roman Empire; the feet of the huge image being made of iron and clay mixed,—signifying the autocratic power mixed with the shifting and unsteady power of socialistic godless rule. Wells says, "Our modern communities are no longer cemented, they lack organized solidarity, they are not prepared to stand shocks and strains, they have become dangerously loose mentally and morally."

That is the great clew to a great proportion of the present social and political troubles of the world. We need to get back to a cement."

Then follows a startling suggestion which is the main point of this review, for such a periodical as this. He says: "We want a Bible. We want a Bible so badly that we cannot afford to put the old Bible on a pinnacle out of daily use. We want it re-adapted for use."

For one who has so energetically "criticized" our Bible, denying its inspiration and authority from God, and leading many into unbelief, it is indeed significant, though not quite consistent, for H. G. Wells to pay such glowing testimony as he does to the influence which this Bible has had on our civilization. He says that "without it (the Bible), our present civilization could not have come into existence," and "it is the book that has held together the fabric of western civilization." This is unexpected testimony from a hostile witness. Incidentally, however, he thereby denies his own belief in Evolution, which would claim that the Bible would be a product of a higher civilization, rather than the cause of such a civilization. Eloquent testimony this, that it isn't man's book,—but God's Book.—WM. H. RICHIE.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

TWO FAST FRIENDS.—The Boston Evening Transcript has an interesting account of the friendship which exists between "Single G," perhaps the world's greatest race horse today, and "Breeze," a "Highland terrier," a breed of dog not popular in this country, for though intelligent these dogs are not beautiful.

Many dogs have tried to win the friendship of "Single G" but in vain. He would kick every canine intruder out of his stall or fiercely bite him.

"Breeze," who was given to the race horse's caretaker, soon sought to be on friendly terms with the beautiful horse, but in vain. Finally, when "Single G" returned to the stable one day after exercising, he saw "Breeze" with four little pups in his stall. The proud bay resented the intrusion and "Breeze" resented such treatment. After a time "Single G" walked over to the little family, sniffed at them and seemed to decide to adopt them. Since then horse and dog have been great friends.

When "Single G" goes to a race "Breeze" is his faithful companion and caretaker. When the famous horse is led out to the race, "Breeze" excitedly barks and jumps and shows great interest. Before the checkrein is finally adjusted the horse puts his beautiful nose down to "Breeze" and the dog responds.

When in the "cooling process" the racehorse is taken out for gentle exercise, the shaggy little dog seizes the rein in her teeth and leads her big friend. At feeding time "Breeze" watches that the horse may get his due portion and keeps guard when visitors are about that all may be right.

The driver of "Single G" says that he never knew a better or more intelligent horse and "Breeze" is evidently his peer in this respect.

Race horses are nervous animals and are greatly petted and indulged, so that the gentleness of "Single G" and his appreciation of "Breeze's" friendship are noteworthy. It is said that these good qualities of this noble horse are due to the influence of his little friend, "Breeze."

"To George Fox the ocean of darkness" was transformed into "the ocean of light" through his vision of Christ. He saw, as others too have seen, that the cross of Calvary was the supreme manifestation of the triumph of good over evil, and of what that victory costs the Divine heart of love. Perhaps if we knew more we might see that in this way, only, can Love perfect manhood, without weakening that manhood.—EDWARD GRUBB.

FIGHTING THE FAMINE IN RUSSIA.

Moscow.—(By mail to Philadelphia, received Ninth Month 24th)—Health Department Train No. 10 leaves to-night for Samara and Orenburg. For a week all barriers have been down in Russia to the outside world, and correspondents, foreign business men and members of relief missions are all pouring in together.

I am going down to-night on the Health Department Train with two cars of "Quakerfood" selected to supplement the many cars of meal donated by Russian peasants. Together with our codliver oil, cocoa, beans and sugar, the breadmeal will make a fairly balanced ration for children. The Quakers will distribute 300,000 feedings in Samara, the central city of the famine, and then go on to Orenburg with 200,000 more. Food trains containing gigantic relief will follow to points designated and kitchens will be set up. It is a logical and a good plan, but it leaves Samara, a large central famine city, for several days more without food. So Quakers are pouring food into Samara, to keep 30,000 children there alive until the main relief comes.

The Health Department of Russia is a wonderful organization. The train on which I go down to-night has, besides many cars of food, a traveling bake-shop that bakes a ton of bread a day, a kitchen-car that cooks 1,000 portions at one boiling, a dispensary car beautifully arranged, but pitifully short of medicine, a waiting-room for patients, sleeping quarters and dining-room for the staff, and a bath and laundry. It will travel like a fast passenger train, carrying the relief which the Russian peasants themselves have given out of their own poverty.

The Health Department is non-political and under doctors' control. It has thousands of clinics and sub-stations all over Russia. It works quickly. We went to Dr. Trebugov, the head of transport, with our offer of food, and in three hours our wagons were assigned, our permits issued, our food properly divided among the three neediest districts to where trains were going within a few days. We had only to load the wagons, seal them, put our own personnel in charge or allow their doctors to handle, as we chose. It was up to us. We could work in any way we chose through them, and we could work quickly. If we had not automobiles enough for loading, they offered us theirs. They are tackling an enormous job and doing it well. But their own organization is reported breaking in the distant famine districts because of the starvation of doctors and nurses. They have the organization, but they have not the food, because all Russia hasn't it. Unless this Health organization is kept intact, pestilence will sweep Europe. As I came from Warsaw to Poland, I saw no other power competent to stop it.

All the way up from Warsaw, traveling by fast courier trains, I saw tens of thousands of Poles, returning to Poland, hastened by the famine. They are being repatriated in orderly fashion, crowded in box-cars, fed at way-stations, quarantined on the way. But the ration is going down from half a pound daily to a quarter pound. As long as there is anything, they will get it; when there is nothing ———!

At Baranowice, a Polish quarantine station, there were 12,000, when I passed, in the camp which accommodates 4,000. The rest were sleeping in the fields waiting their turn.

All the way from Minsk to Moscow were signs of the great spirit that is stirring in Russia in the common fight against famine. Boys in a single garment of homespun linen, and without shoes, got on the train with official dignity and municipal credentials, selling papers for famine relief or taking collections and giving proper receipts. Papers announced that the peasants of Jaroslavl had given 1,000,000 poods of potatoes (4,000,000 pounds), their entire surplus, asking no money in return, but only salt and a few clothes. The Central Co-operative, of which I began to hear ever more and more as I went through Russia, had pledged one pound in every pood of its grain turnover. Workers were giving "Saturdays." Women were melting their wedding rings, not individually, but in large groups and by general vote.

It was inspiring; it was terrific; but it was pitifully inadequate. For the famine involves a district of over 20,000,000 people, stretching 1,500 miles from north to south, and several hundred miles from east to west, a district on which Russia normally depends for much food. This district has now neither food nor seed; the terrific drought has burned everything. For two months past peasants have been baking clay, bark and ground roots into their bread. All Russia has not enough food to feed them.

In Moscow I met a teacher from Boguslav, a district south of Samara. His gaunt yellow cheeks told the tale of his own hunger, but he had left his own baby of a year and a half in Boguslav and had come to Moscow to plead for food for the rest of the children. He described the line of people, old men, tiny children, passing up and down and begging, walking dead folk. In a little while they dropped and were really dead and were shoveled into their graves. But nobody cared; there were too many; death was not a subject for comment. The worst thing, he said, was to see the starving mothers, trying to nurse babies, and finding nothing at all to give them.

A band of American workmen, crossing Siberia, described the famine refugees to me. They first met them in Irkutsk, crowding the railroads. They had been shipped quite regularly by Government order. Many had farming tools with them and intended to settle in Siberia. They were not starved, for they had left early and were rationed along the way just as I had seen coming up from Poland. Some were sent south to Altai and some to Irkutsk to the coal mines.

An American ex-teacher had been stricken with malaria and came up from the Crimea to Moscow six days and nights by train with a temperature of 104. His wife sold nearly all her clothes for extra food to save him. He still believed in Russia, he still wanted to help, but he said he had to leave in order to get food to regain his health. The first quinine he saw was in Moscow.

It comes as a shock of surprise to learn that the Government is actually undertaking planting crops. It was estimated that 15,000,000 poods of seed were needed; that 9,000,000 to 10,000,000 were perhaps obtainable. The Foreign Trade Bureau bought over 2,000,000 in Sweden and the United States. The Department of Agriculture has been trying to collect 9,000,000 here in Russia. It is now announced that 5,807,500 poods have already been shipped. It is a race against time. It must be planted in the next two weeks. Those who know the peasants assure me that the seed will go into the ground even while the people eat bark; for the first thing the peasant thinks of is the sowing. And there are strong local committees who will control the distribution. Nothing, I think, of all I have seen in Russia has given me such a sense of the power of this people.

The next characteristic that strikes one is the way the children come first. The health trains of the Government are not even attempting to feed adults. For everywhere children are being gathered into institutions or receiving stations, and shipped by trainloads out of the famine districts. The feeding even of children is pitifully inadequate. But they get the best that there is.

All that Russia can do will not be nearly enough. Foreign relief by millions is needed. One way or another this help must go out to the districts. Thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands will die anyway; not all can be reached even with the best of intentions. But millions can be saved and the famine district can be put on its feet. The organization exists; and the peasants have shown their trust by ceasing their flights; they are simply waiting, for death or for food-trains to reach them.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

"From the moral and religious standpoint, we must do all in our power to convince the world that the real defences of a nation are the practice of justice and good-will and service to all, and that if these are forthcoming, armed defence is needless."—EDWARD GRUBB.

WHAT BOOKS SHALL WE READ FOR THE CONFERENCE?—The Peace Office is receiving inquiries about the best books on Disarmament and the Problems of the Pacific, the two great subjects to come before the Washington Conference. If anyone has not yet read Will Irwin's "The Next War," he should do that first in order to get a general idea of the military and economic problems to be considered.

The Macmillan Company is to issue shortly a low-priced book of about 150 pages, by Arthur Bullard, entitled, "A. B. C. of Naval Disarmament and the Problems of the Pacific." This ought to meet the need for a brief, popular hand-book for general circulation.

A debater's hand-book on "Disarmament," containing reprints of the best literature on the subject from all points of view, is soon to appear.

The Carnegie Peace Endowment is to publish a series of pamphlets on Disarmament and Far Eastern Problems, which will be of great value to those who wish unbiased information on these two subjects which the world will be seriously considering.

There are numerous books on the Problems of the Far East, but it is difficult to recommend any one or two as covering the entire ground. The following are worth reading:

"American World Policies," by Walter E. Weyl; "Contemporary Politics in the Far East," by S. K. Hornbeck; "World Politics," by Paul S. Reinsch; "The Stakes of Diplomacy," by Lippman; "The Problem of Foreign Policy," by Gilbert Murray.

It is, perhaps, unsafe to do so, but we offer the suggestion that perhaps the best weekly paper for one to read who wishes to keep in close touch with the Disarmament movement and the proceeding of the Washington Conference is "The Literary Digest," which many Friends have already in their homes. This gives editorial opinions on both or all sides of the subjects it discusses and thus has some advantages over the "New Republic," "The Nation," etc.

AS SCIENTISTS SEE THINGS.—At the recent meeting of the British Association at Edinburgh some of the speakers urged their fellow-scientists not to lend their talents to the development of chemical warfare, with its apparently unlimited possibilities of destruction of mankind. Barclay L. Jones, who attended the sessions of the American Chemical Society last month, reports there was no suggestion there that scientists refrain from the kind of research which develops war chemicals, though the hope was expressed that control of the potential energy of the atom would not be gained until nations learned how to settle their differences peaceably.

THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE.—The Assembly and the Council of the League of Nations have named eleven men to constitute the International Court of Justice, and the opinion seems to be that a wise and representative selection has been made. The eleven judges are as follows:

John Bassett Moore, United States; Viscount Finlay, Great Britain; Dr. Yorozu, Japan; Dr. Andre Weiss, France; Commendatore Dionisio Anzilotti, Italy; Dr. R. K. Hornbeck, Brazil; Dr. B. T. C. Loder, Holland; Antonio S. DeBustamante, Cuba; Judge Didrik Nyholm, Denmark; Dr. Max Huber, Switzerland, and Dr. Rafael Altamiray Crevea, Spain.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

THE sudden death of Joshua W. Hurley on the 31st ult. is a serious loss to the Pocono circle and to the Manor project. He had a distinct concern to make the Manor express something of the standards and aims of Quakerism. The Friend (London) has recently noted the success of the Smiley Brothers in this field at Lake Mohonk. Their experience has been an outstanding demonstration of the practicability and popularity of the "gentler manners, purer laws" of Quakerism, in building up a summer retreat from the blatant distractions of modern life.

THE initial First-day evening-meeting of the season was held at Twelfth Street at 7.30 on the 2nd inst. There were about thirty persons present. It is the expressed desire of the Quarterly Meeting that all its members should share, as they have opportunity, in the concern to continue these meetings. Also that members of other meetings in and near the city should have them in mind, and be faithful to any drawing to them.

Something of the principle that prompts Friends to maintain Embassies, in foreign cities, has force in these evening meetings. Most always there are seekers present eager for an extended hand of fellowship.

DR. HILDA CLARK, of Street, England, was one of the pioneers of the Friends' Relief Mission in France in the early days of the war, and laid the groundwork for much of the medical relief which was subsequently carried on, especially the Chalons Maternity Hospital. She was the first English Friend to go into Vienna after the peace, and built up the Friends' Relief Mission in Vienna, of which she has been from the beginning the executive head. Edith Pye, another English Friend, co-operated with Dr. Clark in the opening of the Chalons Maternity, and throughout the war remained the Directress of that work. When the Friends' Mission was withdrawing from France, she was instrumental in securing the establishment of the Chalons Maternity Hospital as a permanent institution, and obtaining funds for the erection of the building. Since she left France, she has been Dr. Clark's assistant in Vienna.

Both are well known to all returned workers from the French or Austrian fields, and many other Friends who have met them either in England or in visits to the field of relief work.

THE wide distribution by the Peace Committee during the summer of Will Irwin's "The Next War," has doubtless brought much encouragement in its train. Here is one item. A Friend who resides at Ship Bottom told in a Friend's family "off shore" that after several had read it she had given it to the Life Saving Station near by. This prompted the "off shore" Friends to send copies to the isolated Life Savings Stations at Tucker's Beach and at Little Beach. Perhaps a week later there came a violent telephone call after the Friends had been an hour in bed. One of the Little Beach life-savers was at the other end of the line—he wanted to say that the men had read the book and had been so much impressed with it that they wished to get copies for themselves. It was explained how this might be done, and we have no doubt the good work "is marching on."

THE gift of $10,000 to Chengtu University by a wealthy Chinese Christian will encourage Friends in their work at that important centre.

THE following item is from The American Friend: "The city school board of High Point, North Carolina, honored one of its faithful teachers by selecting as the name for the newly established grammar school on Russell Street, 'The Emma Blair School.'" This Friend has been teaching in the public schools for many years and is now Principal of the school in Russell Street.

IT is understood that Seeborn Rowntree will be in our country during Tenth Month. Apart from his leadership in the great cocoa industry, he is an author of distinction in sociological lines. His latest book has just been noticed in THE FRIEND.

THE following item is from The Friend [London]: "E. Maria Bishop, while with her brother, C. E. Bishop, at Belleville, Canada, felt drawn to visit Friends at Bloomfield and Wellington on the twenty-first ult. A united meeting for worship was held at the Bloomfield (Hicksite) meeting-house in the morning, and was well attended by Conservatives, Progressives and Liberals from the five meetings in the two villages, which are six miles apart. It was a time of real worship and spiritual fellowship, when the spirit of unity was manifest. Another united meeting was held at Wellington (Progressive) meeting-house in the evening, and several attended from Bloomfield.

WIDE publicity has been given to the opening of the Peace Portal at Blaine, Washington, on the sixth of Ninth Month. Some months ago we noted that a piece of the supposed timber of the Mayflower at Jordans had been carried over seas to be used at the portal. The exercises were under direction of Samuel Hill, and Friends were represented. This may revive the memory with some of another occasion in which our dear friends, John H. and Mary P. Dillingham were his guests. At that occasion, the opening of a new meeting-house at Maryhill, Oregon, J. H. D. was the principal speaker.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The following is from one of our regular readers who is not a member with Friends. Her attitude toward Isaac Pennington shows that in what Fox called the "universal spirit" she is very much a Friend.—Eds.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FRIEND:—

I have been much interested in an article in your issue for September 8th on the "Forgotten Prophet," Isaac Pennington, and his books. Perhaps your readers may like to hear of a small edition of extracts from this wonderful writer called "Selections from Isaac Pennington. It is compiled by Mary W. Tilston, editor of the familiar and valuable hand book, "Daily Strength for Daily Needs," and was published in Boston in 1892 by Roberts Bros. as one of a series known as the "Wisdom Series," all of great value. This small work contains a brief sketch by the writer, and many extracts from his works containing much spiritual help and inspiration. A copy was given me in 1908 by my friend, Dr. Alfred C. Garrett. I trust the book is not out of print, though the firm of Roberts Bros. has long since disappeared. I hope some of your readers will like to know of this little book and will care for it as much as I do.

Allow me to describe myself one of your ever devout readers.

THE QUAKER TEACHER.

From John Forsythe, pioneer Quaker teacher in rural Pennsylvania, to Isaac Sharpless (a lineal descendant), master builder of the small college, there is a range of several generations, each of them contributing liberal toll to the same high calling of teaching. Nor is this one family amongst Friends at all singular in this particular. The honor roll of those of the Society who have distinguished themselves in educational work is impressive. It must mean at least these two things. The Friend has had some very special qualification for teaching and the general public has recognized this and has appreciated it.

One need not seek far to discover a very evident reason in Quaker training for the special qualification here noted. By profession as well as training the Quaker is an individualist. He looks upon personality—the personality of the child, as well as of the adult, as a sacred thing. What else is this personality but the direct effect of the action of God's spirit upon the individual soul! In all which the Quaker anticipates what is sometimes expressed as the contribution of modern times to the profession of teaching, viz.: the discovery of the child. For centuries educational discussion had revolved about the trivium or the quadrivium, about the relative value of subjects of study or about the merits of discipline as distinct from culture. Very often, in all this, the child that was set in the midst, was overlooked as anything other than a receptacle to hold the fruits of all this dry learning. The real Quaker teacher, however, by what he was if not by what he consciously did, had a different attitude, and that attitude bore much good fruit. Thus it came to pass in many communities that the bulk of the teaching, before the public school system became operative, was actually in the hands of Friends. A memory of fifty years only, goes back to a village school where the teacher was a Friend and practically all the pupils were non-Friends. This school was conducted by a Monthly Meeting. In order not to pauperize any, each child was expected to bring a two-cent piece each week toward the expenses of the school. Were it possible to have statistics to show the number of similar schools in Pennsylvania and New Jersey between 1800 and 1850 and the number of pupils in them—especially the number of non-Friends, it might be a revelation to some who look upon such children with suspicion.

In all this work the Friend was too much of an individualist to inculcate any sectarian views, and as a matter of fact, although these schools were most often supported in part at least by Preparative Meetings, they brought small grist, if any, to the Society's mill. Certain traditional matters were closely observed by most of the teachers, and although these were not inculcated they became fastened upon communities. Some of these to this day fall into our peculiarities of language most naturally, and much more important than this by far, they respond in liberal numbers to invitations of "concerned Friends" for public meetings in those neighborhoods.

How much the fact that the Quaker teacher's method revolved about his sense of the value of the individual, influenced the drift of modern education to the discovery of the child previously referred to, could be little more than a subject of speculation. It could not have been an inappreciable effect. Very likely it is amongst those most potent influences, of which life is so full, that can never be measured and acknowledged.

If the Quaker teachers' gift to the past has been thus potent, what is to be said of the present? Individualism is not all of life. There are group interests and responsibilities. One must learn how to function in this field, learn how to make adjustments. So important is this that a prominent educator defines education as the power of adjustment. It must also be admitted that a right recognition of the individual is basic even in the process of adjustment. The Quaker teacher of the past began at the foundation in any event.

Beyond the recognition of the individual, however—beyond group functioning and the power of adjustment, a new field has now opened up and a new challenge is sounding in the ears of all who in any way are called to lead the coming age. Democracy it is said has failed—the will and way of the majority lead too often to destruction. How can the decisions of men be given the spiritual values of life? How can the judgment of the vote mean anything more than the passing passion of the hour? In the course of some spirited discussions along these lines it has been more than once declared by men of distinguished insight that the Quaker process of reaching decisions has in it a principle of profound import for democracy. Is it not with Friends the principle of a rule of unity rather than of a rule of mere majority? How, then, is this principle to be extended in practice? How are the young to be trained to it so they will instinctively transmit it in every environment to which they shall come? Is this not very much an uncultivated field even amongst ourselves? Shall we not hear the challenge, shall we not answer the call?

EDITORIAL NOTE.

WE had expected to include in this number several educational articles from our school principals. These are to be deferred privileges, mostly because it is desired to "try out" some new plans and ideas before reporting on them. It may be quite as agreeable to our subscribers to have the educational matter distributed through the year. Education should be a leading subject in many of our issues.—[Eds.]

EDUCATION AND NURTURE.

The following is an extract from an article on Ignorance. The author is one of the masters of Leighton Park School.—[Eds.]

Education is the chief factor in our nurltural environment. The way it works is like this. The child enters the world with all kinds of potentialities, inherited or unique. It depends upon the nurture whether these things can develop or not. Education should give a liberating environment in which all the powers of mind and heart can find food for development; but an environment that will starve the animalish propensities, usually referred to as ape, tiger and donkey. This is the social part of our problem. This nurture is under our control and a great deal of the ignorance is caused by the failure of man to remedy the conditions of social life. The other part of our problem is the personal aspect. Although the nurture may act in some ways as a liberating influence without our realizing it, in other ways the question whether we remain ignorant and undeveloped depends upon us. We can close our eyes and cover the windows of our hearts, we can refuse to listen and so miss the fuller life which is within our grasp. We can, if we wish, spend our time with the muck-rake in our hands and "miss the many-splendored thing."

If we desire bodily culture, we know how to achieve it, if we desire mental culture we know that it comes by the exercise of the faculties of the mind, if we desire to know God's will and to experience the guidance of His Spirit in our lives, we must exercise the spiritual faculties. Jesus has shown us what these are and how we can use them. Thus ignorance can give place to wisdom and we can know ourselves as sons of God.

ERNEST E. UNWIN.

HOW MUCH SHOULD OUR CHILDREN KNOW?

[Unless our attention is specially directed to the subject, it is difficult to realize how much expert study is now given to education, and what progress has been made in appraising the regular educational processes to which our children are subjected. Certain standard tests are now very much in use. The Headmaster of the Washington School in New York City, Philip W. L. Cox, has recently written at length of these tests. It is undoubtedly a technical field, but some general knowledge of the subject is imperative if we are to have an understanding appreciation of what our schools are doing.—Eds.]

STANDARD TESTS AND SCALES.

Fortunately we have scientifically constructed tests and scales in several fundamental subjects, in terms of which standard achievements for each grade have been worked out for thousands of children of each grade. We know, for example, that if we use the Woody-McCall arithmetic tests, third grade children should add nine examples of increasing difficulty correctly in eight minutes, fourth grade children should add fourteen examples, sixth grade children sixteen examples, and so on. Similarly, for subtraction, third grade children should subtract six examples correctly, fourth grade children eight examples, fifth grade children ten examples, and sixth grade children twelve examples. And so for multiplication and division we can determine in what degree each child is below standard in this specific skill, just as we can know by use of weighing scales, what children are below standard weight, or, by use of a measuring stick, what children are below standard height.

If we use the Ayres spelling scale, which has in columns of equal difficulty the words that are known to be actually used in letter writing, we know that third-grade children should spell the words of column H with an accuracy of 92 per cent., and of column J with 84 per cent. accuracy; that fourth-grade children should spell these columns with an accuracy of 98 per cent. and 94 per cent., respectively; that fifth-grade children should spell them with an accuracy of 100 per cent. and 98 per cent.

By the use of the Trabue supplement of the Hillegas scale for written composition, which contains graded samples of English composition, such that the general merit of each sample is known in terms of other samples, fourth-grade children should be able to write composition as good as sample 3.5, fifth-grade children as good as sample 4, sixth-grade children as good as sample 4.5, seventh-grade children as good as sample 5.

In penmanship, the Ayres scale of legibility is so arranged that sample 60 on the scale is just as much more legible than the sample 50 as sample 70 is more legible than sample 60, just as we know that six inches on a foot rule is just as much longer than five inches, as seven inches is longer than six inches.

If a pupil writes faster than standard rate but with poorer quality, he needs to be made to write more carefully; if he writes too slowly, but with higher degree of legibility than is normal for his grade, he needs to be speeded up. But if he writes too slowly and with too low a degree of legibility, he becomes a hospital case—he needs special treatment.

In silent reading, the Curtis reading tests measure rate of reading and comprehension. Third graders are expected to read 113 words a minute with a comprehension of 78 per cent.; fourth graders can read 145 a minute, with a comprehension of 80 per cent.; fifth graders read 168 words a minute with a comprehension of 93, and sixth graders read 191 words a minute, with a comprehension of 95, and so on. If a pupil reads too slowly and comprehends well, he needs to be speeded up; if he reads rapidly and comprehends little, he needs to be slowed down; if he reads too slowly and comprehends too little, then he needs definite instruction in the fundamentals of silent reading. For the lower grades, there are used in similar manner the Gray tests for oral reading.

THE LITTLE LAMB OUT IN THE COLD

[Another poem in dialect, if it voices the call of the true Shepherd cannot be other than helpful to the readers of THE FRIEND.—B. F. WATSON.]

O li'l lamb out in de eo',
De Mastah call you to de fol',
O li'l lamb!
He hyeah you bleatin' on de hill;
Come hyeah an' keep yo' mou'n' still,
O li'l lamb!

De Mastah send de Shepud fo'f;
He wandah souf, he wandah no'f,
O li'l lamb!

Ile wandah eus', he wandah wes';
De win' a-wrenchin' at his brens',
O li'l lamb!

Oh, tell de Shepud whaih you hide;
He want you walkin' by His side,
O li'l lamb!

He know you weak, He know you so';
But come! Don't stay away no mo',
O li'l lamb!

An' af'ah while de lamb he hyeah
De Shepud's voice a-cullin' cleah—
O li'l lamb!

He answah f'om de brambles thick,
"O Shepud, f's a-comin' quick!"—
O li'l lamb!

"THE LATER PERIODS OF QUAKERISM."

With the appearance this month from the Macmillan press of Rufus M. Jones's two volume work, "The Later Periods of Quakerism," the task planned by John Wilhelm Rowntree and re-shaped and expanded after his death has been completed. The Rowntree series, as it is called, "devoted to the history of the origin and development of Quakerism," comprises six volumes: "Studies in Mystical Religion," and "Spiritual Reformers in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries," by Rufus M. Jones; "The Beginnings of Quakerism," and "The Second Period of Quakerism," by William C. Braithwaite; "The Quakers in the American Colonies," by Rufus M. Jones, assisted by Isaac Sharpless and Amelia Mott Gummere; and the subject of this review.

The entire series should be read by every Friend who aspires to be well grounded in the development of mystical religion and the history of his own religious Society.

Human nature has an almost irresistible pull in the direction of extremes. A new truth breaks into the mind and life of a seeker. He gives it to his world unshackled, prescribes no limits of application, and leaves it to do its work in the hearts of men. After the passing of the first generation those who profess the new truth are prone to use it not as a working principle, but as a fixed idea applicable only within narrow limits—thus caging within conformity the truth that should make men free. This is the theme of the first chapters of Rufus Jones's book. It is pointed out how George Fox's mystical revelation of the Light of Christ in the heart which resulted in a spiritual revival in the hearts of thousands of men and women of all classes and transformed their lives become comparatively lifeless in the eighteenth century. It was then that the Society of Friends began thriftily to garner the Seed of Truth which Fox and his followers had flung far and wide, trusting God for the harvest, like the sower in the Gospels. This inwardness of the religious life, which is technically known as "Quietism," was often very beautiful in its results, and produced in many individuals great refinement of thought and feeling and exemplary lives. True inwardness of religious experience must be the root and groundwork of all real accomplishment in spiritual things, but pre-occupation with one's own inner states to the exclusion of interest in the souls and lives of others, does not result in a contagious religion. The religion of Jesus Christ and of all who are really His disciples, has always been characterized by a contagion of spirit, but the fear of "creaturely activity," produced in many Friends of this period morbidness and aridity.

The ministry in the Society in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, was not, on the whole, vital, so that young people who craved a more concrete or emotional type of preaching sought it outside the Society; doctrines which modified and changed the Quaker interpretation of Christianity crept in from the sects round about, losses in membership from estrangement and needless disownments were customary; education secular, Biblical and interpretative of the Quaker message was at a low ebb. But just at the moment when a true religious revival was sorely needed and might have been expected, when a "new social spirit" (a chapter heading) was animating English Friends and to some extent American Friends through their anti-slavery activities, came the tragedy of the separation of 1827. The two chapters on "The Great Separation," and "The Second Tragedy of Separation," are masterpieces of fair and impartial history and analysis. Barbara Blaugdone, one of the first intrepid publishers of Quaker truth, after dealing with some troublesome magistrate or judge used laconically to note in her journal, "I told him my portion." Rufus Jones has told each branch of the Society "its portion." The most prejudiced on one side or another will acknowledge that the facts have been fairly placed before the reader. It is a sad tale and all Quakerdom must feel its implication in the mistakes of a common ancestry that so deplorably divided its forces and influence.

The account shows clearly that differences at the time of a separation are not often such as cannot be composed by patience, forbearance and love. But after a division takes place, each side emphasizes and enlarges the points of difference, and fears to seem to be imitating or following the opposing side in deed or doctrine or even phraseology. The result is that after a period of years there are real differences, and the process of closing the gap becomes a slow and difficult one.

A striking instance of failure to reach satisfactory results through opposition is shown in the experience of Thomas Shillitoe, a tender-minded and able minister, who came to the United States from England, and with other English visitors, helped on in ways at which we stand aghast, the separation of 1827. He was convinced that Elias Hicks emphasized too exclusively the doctrine of the Inner Light. On Thomas Shillitoe's return to England he was confronted with the publication called "'The Beacon'" and the writings and teachings of Joseph John Gurney, all of which rejected entirely the doctrine of the Inward Light, which was the foundation stone of the revelation of George Fox and the teachings of the early Friends. Thomas Shillitoe felt obliged to defend the testimony which he had just been trying to modify in America, and died with a prophesy on his lips of ill for the Society if the teachings and influence of Joseph John Gurney had sway. John Wilbur is "told his portion" along with the rest—he saw clearly the faith as revealed to the fathers, but he was "backward looking" and his message failed to inspire a genuine revival of religious fervor and true evangelism.

Through all the years of this tragic history, Rufus Jones clearly shows that if the Light of Christ had really shone in the hearts of opposer and opposed, the self-will, self-righteousness, resentments and recriminations, which marked words and actions on all sides during the years of the separations, would have been eliminated and in the fulness of time a united body would have moved on to fulfil its mission in tolerance and sympathy and love of the brethren. To admonish in love and to suffer in silence is often the part of parents when children seem inclined to stray. That may sometimes be the lot of the true lover of his religious society. To denounce and oppose is too often in both cases to invite calamity.

The chapter on "The Great Migration" is an account of the counterpart in Quakerism of the American romance of moving west, which Vachel Lindsay celebrates so vividly in his famous poem "Johnny Appleseed." But the largest section of Friends that went west were driven by another incentive than the love of adventure or the desire for new lands or the hope of gain or the quest for better conditions of life. The "great expansion of the Society in America was due primarily to the desire of Friends to move away from the environment of slavery." It is a chapter of absorbing interest, telling of the labors of Friends with their slave-holding neighbors before they felt they must withdraw.

"Memorable Quaker Customs" is the heading of another chapter full of interest and instruction, since it shows the strength and weakness of Quaker methods of business and social procedure.

The chapters on "Work on Behalf of Slaves and Indians," on "John Bright and John Greenleaf Whittier," on "Friends in Education" and other subjects must be read to be appreciated. They give us hope because of our common heritage and lead us to the "Review and Forecast," in which we see our shortcomings and catch a glimpse of possibilities yet untried.

Only once in awhile does a book arouse the highest pitch of enthusiasm in the mind of a mature reader. These volumes gave to their reviewer new light on the past and new hope for the future of our beloved Society. Would that they might be everywhere read and help to understanding, unity and love among "all bodies bearing the name of Friends."

HAVERFORD COLLEGE.

"The present is not the time in the world's history for a man to shut his eyes and drift," said William Wistar Comfort, President of Haverford College, in the opening exercises held in Roberts Hall. He urged the college body to make the best of its time in the coming year.

Haverford opened its eighty-eighth year with the greatest registration ever known at the Quaker institution. Two hundred and twenty-two students are enrolled on the list of the Main Line college, thirteen more than the then record-breaking enrollment of last year, which totaled 209. These 224 are divided among the graduate students and classes as follows: Graduate students, 4; seniors, 46; juniors, 45; sophomores, 62; and freshmen, 67. Between eighty and one hundred men applied for the freshman class this year, but the entrance examinations eliminated a good many, and but sixty-seven satisfactorily passed the requirements.

Several promotions took effect with the opening of the new term. Leon H. Rittenhouse has been raised to professor from associate professor of engineering. Frank D. Watson, former associate professor of sociology and social work has been made professor. William B. Meldrum, assistant professor of chemistry, has been made associate professor. Dr. John A. Kelly, who served as instructor of German last term, has been made associate professor of that branch.

Additional dormitory accommodations in old Founders' Hall were constructed during the summer and these are barely sufficient to take care of the enlarged enrollment. Haverford has always been noted for ample class room and laboratory equipment and these will not be taxed in the least this winter.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

Westtown School opened its one hundred and twenty-third year on the thirteenth of last month, with two hundred and two pupils in attendance, 106 boys and 96 girls; of these, 59 are new, 32 boys and 27 girls. The total number, though in excess of three and four years ago, is less than during the past two years, the diminution coming mostly in the number from other Yearly Meetings, on whom the present financial stringency, together with the heavy traveling expense, comes with especial force.

Nine members of the faculty were in attendance at summer schools during vacation, the majority being at either Columbia or Harvard. Caroline L. Nicholson resumes her position in the German department, after a two years' leave of absence for service abroad.

The results in the College Board examinations in Sixth Month were fairly satisfactory. Twenty-four pupils in the Senior, First and Second classes took the examinations, with a total of seventy-eight papers, of which 86 per cent. were successful. Four Senior girls took the comprehensive examinations, and all were accepted, four of the sixteen papers being spoken of by the Mt. Holyoke authorities as either "distinguished" or "excellent."

A group of the officers of the Student Volunteer Movement have been at the Farm House for a few days, as has been their custom for three years, holding their annual fall conference. Besides holding their business sessions at the school, they have been in acceptable attendance at our meetings for worship, and have addressed the boys and girls in the First-day evening Collections. The men in the group, some of them former college athletes, played our boys in baseball on a Seventh-day afternoon, but were hardly able to hold their own against the School team.

A one-day's conference has also recently been held at the Farm House by a group of twenty or more ministers from the Baptist churches in Philadelphia.

WILLIAM PENN CHARTER SCHOOL.

The William Penn Charter School opened its two hundred and thirty-third year on the twentieth of Ninth Month with an enrollment of 578—the largest number in its history. It was decided by the Overseers to make no further effort at increasing the rooms and numbers, but to keep the general level of attendance the same as during the past school year, when we opened with 572 boys. This is consonant with the policy of several colleges and other schools, who feel that intensive and thorough work is preferable, especially in these days of size and over-organization, to an elasticity which sacrifices personal attention.

There are few faculty changes. Carl M. Sangree, having accepted a call to a church in Massachusetts, has relinquished the Bible teaching in the Junior School to Henry Lewis, of New York, a son of William Draper Lewis, himself a former student at Penn Charter. Everett S. Kelson, of Maine, a Colby graduate, and John W. Spaeth, Jr. (Haverford, 1917, and for two years a master at the Hill School) have taken up work in the departments of Latin and Mathematics. Jane H. Everett and Elgarda Teunis have joined in the teaching of grades five and one-two respectively.

Six of the staff have had the advantage of summer school work, mostly at Harvard and one at New York University. Four of them will spend spare time in the University of Pennsylvania graduate courses.

The athletic facilities at Queen Lane have been improved by the erection of two grandstands and by the appointment of a member of the graduating class whose afternoons will be devoted to the supervision of recreation among the smallest boys of the School. It is interesting to note that the game of soccer is receiving more attention, and that there has been a concerted effort on the part of some forty boys to put the game of golf upon a team basis. During the summer the Boys' Tennis Doubles Championship of America was won by a member of the School.

But these out-door matters are incomplete without a feeling of responsibility among the boys for their future citizenship. For this reason Penn Charter has joined in the weekly School Service letter from Washington, which will be interpreted periodically before the Senior School by the head of the History department.

The results of college entrance were gratifying, and the staff of the School were pleased at the selection of two 1921 leaders for important scholarships,—one at Haverford and one at Princeton.

Beginning with the next academic year, no boy will be enrolled in the graduating class who has not acquired six points of College Entrance Examinations or attained an average of eighty per cent. in his studies during the previous year.

The opening is marked by a splendid spirit of co-operation. It is hoped that the boys will derive much benefit from the mid-week Friends' meetings and that more of the Quaker spirit will identify itself with Penn Charter than in previous years. There is no one so idealistic and internally receptive as a boy between the ages of twelve and seventeen.

Headmaster.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL NOTES

School opened on Ninth Month 10th, with an attendance a little in excess of the number a year ago. There is every prospect of a slightly larger enrollment throughout the year than the 345 pupils who were on our roll last year. The increase of pupils is mainly in the High School Department, though the Elementary School is holding its own.

Our two graduates who competed in the College Entrance Board Examinations for Mayor's Scholarships at the University of Pennsylvania did themselves and the School credit. There were twenty scholarships to be awarded and eighty-five candidates. One of our candidates stood seventh on the list of successful competitors and the other thirteenth or fourteenth.

Of the six post-graduates who were here last year, two have entered Wellesley College, one Swarthmore, one Wheaton College, one Connecticut College for Women, and one the Drexel Institute.

Of the twenty members of last year's Senior Class, two have entered the University of Pennsylvania, and one each has gone to Haverford, the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, Vassar, Wilson, and the Maryland College for Women. Four are taking courses in kindergarten training, one a course in physical education at Temple University, and another was awarded a scholarship at the School of Design on the merit of her work at F. S. S. Two are at the Philadelphia Normal School. Three members of the class are completing their preparation for Harvard, Haverford, and the University of Pennsylvania at other schools, while still another is taking an additional year at Dana Hall. The two remaining members of the class are pursuing advance studies along the lines of their special interests. This class has a remarkable record in that every single member of it is pursuing some line of advanced work in the year following graduation.

Caroline E. DeGreene has to our great satisfaction resumed her place at the head of the French Department, after a year's absence for rest and study abroad.

Nellie J. Davis has returned from a year spent at Stanford University and Columbia, where she took her master's degree, to be welcomed by many in the English and History classes of our Junior High School who were her pupils while she was teacher of our F Class.

The new teachers on our staff have given it added strength, and we believe that we have never had a stronger teaching force.

Mary Bufkin Jones of Concord, Mass., is taking the headship of our English Department. She is a graduate of Smith College and a teacher of unusually wide and successful experience.

E. Leslie Nicholson is putting a great deal of life and energy into his work as Director of Physical Education, bringing to it much inspiration from his summer at Springfield Y. M. C. A. Training College.

Florence Willett, who last year acted as a substitute in two of our Friends' Schools, is teaching our I Class. She took a summer course at Columbia University, as did Anna Garrett, assistant in the Primary Class.

Mary Brinton has joined our staff as special assistant in Physical Education for the girls and to help in the office. Ernestine Estreicher, a college graduate, teaches two periods of Latin daily at the School, taking sections of classes which are too large for our regular teachers.

Henry Arnold Todd and his wife report a delightful summer in Sicily, Italy and the south of France. They spent a month in Rome and the rest of the time in visiting places of interest in connection with Roman history and literature.

A drinking fountain, the gift of the Class of 1921, has been installed in the hallway at the Cherry Street entrance.

Extensive improvements and repairs to the buildings were made during the summer vacation. Cement floors were laid in some of the basement rooms and maple floors in the assembly room and several of the class-rooms and halls. Additional new metal lockers were placed in the girls' dressing-room, and there was a great deal of painting and varnishing done throughout the building. Electric lights were installed in the rooms which were not already provided with them. The general impression is that our school building was never so attractive.

GERMANTOWN FRIENDS' SCHOOL.

[Stanley R. Yarnall has kindly permitted us to use portions of his report to the School Committee in regard to the opening and prospects at Germantown. This is our largest meeting school.—Eds.]

School opened under good auspices on the 20th inst. [twentieth of Ninth Month] with a very large attendance. When we went over the list at the end of the day, we found that there were absent, of a total enrollment of 578, only thirty-one pupils in all. These were distributed as follows:—7 in the High School, 11 in the Intermediate School, and 13 in the Primary School. Of these 11 were prevented by sickness personally or in the family, making 20 only who were absent because their parents did not come back in time to have the children ready for school. When the Kindergarten opened on the 26th, every one of the pupils was present the first day. By the end of the week all the pupils were back but eleven, of whom seven had colds or were prevented by health complications.

The opening of school has been remarkably smooth, and the pupils show unusually good spirit and a high degree of earnestness. The work of the Student Council has steadied and stabilized the older pupils in their attitude toward the school problems and the school discipline. A Junior Student Council is being organized in the Intermediate Department and that is having an excellent effect on them.

There were only four changes in our teaching force, and of the new teachers only one is really new to our School, Anne E. Maxfield, who takes the place of Elizabeth Brown in the Fourth Primary Class. She has long taught in other Friends' schools, and through her brother Francis's connection with our School and her connection with many of our teachers, fits in very naturally to the school life.

Frances W. Perkins, who assists in the Physical Department of the Girls, is an old graduate, familiar with the life of the School, and the same is true of Eleanor Shane, who is taking the position vacated for the year by the absence of Catherine E. Dobson.

Of our teachers, all of those who have charge of French classes either spent the summer in France or in foreign travel, and Irvin C. Poley traveled extensively in England and on the Continent.

D. Lawrence Burgess and Dorothy Brooke took helpful courses at the Columbia University Summer School.

Hadassah J. Moore studied at Johns Hopkins University, and Eleanor Shane at the University of Pennsylvania.

Alfred Dominovich and Alfred A. Smith were successful and much encouraged by the initial year of Flying Moose Lodge which they conducted as a boys' camp, with the assistance from our teaching force of Herman P. Breininger and Joseph H. Price, and D. Lawrence Burgess for the latter part of the summer.

All of our teachers and office force were at their places at the beginning of the school year.

The Commencement exercises on Sixth Month 8th were conducted with dignity, to the satisfaction of the friends of the School. The Commencement speaker was John Erskine, Professor of English at Columbia University, who made a stimulating and original address.

Of the graduating class numbering 34, 15 girls are entering college and all the 11 boys.

It is interesting to know that Louise S. Birch succeeded in winning a place for herself on the Honor List of Vassar, but it seemed best to her mother, much to the regret of Louise's teachers, to have her entered at Wilson College instead of Vassar.

Edward G. Pennock won one of the four Corporation Scholarships Haverford College granted to the four pupils standing at the head of the class in their admission averages.

A few changes have occurred in the enrollment as reported by the Admission Committee at the meeting on Sixth Month 2nd. At that time the total enrollment for the new school year was given as 575. It now stands at 578, 266 boys and 312 girls. Only one class in the School is up to the full enrollment of 50, 25 in each section, although practically all the classes excepting in the Primary School and the three upper classes of the High School are within one or two of that number. We have been particularly careful in the class of pupils admitted to the School, and some who are not particularly desirable are not returning. Several boys throughout the School have been demoted for their own good and in a way that will react favorably on the classes they have left. On the whole, the student body seems consistent and gives promise of a good school year.

The experience of the year so far seems to prove that the raising of the tuition rates has not been an undue burden on the families represented by the School. In justice to those whom we want to have here and who do find difficulty in meeting the tuition charges, it will be necessary each spring to let it be known that Friends and others who wish to apply for scholarship help should feel free to lay their needs before our Admission Committee.

In the absence of the Chairman of the Property Committee, I will report for the interest of the Committee but not in a final way, that the matters referred to that Committee have in large measure been attended to. Harrison, Mertz and Emelen hope to complete in all details their work at Wistar Brown field by the end of next month. They have been delayed by difficulty in getting stone for foundations of the tennis courts. The ground has all been graded and the cinders for the track and the foundations for the courts are in large part in place.

The Property Committee, in addition to the contract granted in the spring, authorized the widening of the table originally graded for the girls' hockey field, so that it will now be large enough for baseball and other boys' sports. The table is being used daily by the girls for their hockey.

No major improvements have been carried on at the School itself, and minor improvements have been kept down to a minimum, consisting of certain small carpentering improvements in the way of shelves, cabinets, closets, etc., necessary minor interior and exterior painting, the oiling of floors, etc. The physical equipment of the School seems to be in good condition generally.

Two interesting academic honors have been won by former pupils of our School, which have probably not been brought to the attention of the School Committee. Leonard Carmichael, Class of 1917, after having gained the highest academic honors for his work at Tufts College, has won a scholarship at the Graduate School of Education at Harvard University. He was also offered a similar scholarship by the University of Pennsylvania.

Dr. Joseph M. Hyman, Jr., a graduate of the Class of 1914, was granted by the University of Pennsylvania Medical School a prize of $50 for leading his class during the Senior Year, and an additional one of $500 for leading the entire Medical School throughout his course as a student there. He is now an interne at the Pennsylvania Hospital. It is interesting to note that he won a Haverford Corporation Scholarship on graduating from our School, which he held for three years, completing his four years' course in three, graduating at the head of his class, and being chosen spoon man.

STANLEY R. YARNALL.
Principal.

NINTH MONTH 29, 1921.

MOORESTOWN SCHOOL NOTES.

The School commenced its second year (since the amalgamation) on Ninth Month 20th, with an enrolment of 215. This, in spite of the forced increase in tuition rates, is slightly in excess of the total a year ago. The number is almost exactly divided between boys and girls, the former leading by perhaps a half-dozen. Sixty per cent. of the pupils are Friends. In the High School Department there are 102 students.

In addition to the changes in the faculty announced in the early summer, W. Waldo Hayes will be in charge of the boys' athletics, as well as teaching some of the mathematics and science. He is a graduate of Swarthmore College, class of 1918, was in the Friends' Reconstruction work abroad and later had charge of the American Red Cross service in the Jerusalem district. Louisa M. Jacob has returned after a year's leave of absence, and her interest and enthusiasm will doubtless be, as in the past, a stimulus to the nature study work.

Football practice started at once and seven or eight games are already arranged. Other matches may be scheduled later. The girls are trying out for the hockey team.

Seven out of the nine who graduated last spring have entered three Friends' colleges: Haverford, Swarthmore and Earlham. There are at present in the School candidates for Bryn Mawr, Wellesley, Smith, Holyoke, Swarthmore and the University of Pennsylvania.

Our Headmaster, W. Elmer Barrett, in morning Collection three days after School opened, referred to the smoothness with which everything was then running, calling attention to a fact we all recognize, that the School machinery was operating more perfectly in that brief time than it had done in a whole month a year ago. There is nothing whatsoever to indicate that we might not have been running as a combined school for at least twenty years!

REPORT OF SUPERINTENDENT OF YEARLY MEETING SCHOOLS TO THE YEARLY MEETING'S COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION, NINTH MONTH 30, 1921.

[NOTE.—After serious illness last spring and weeks in hospital during the summer, Gertrude R. Sherer is still confined to the limits of her home surroundings in Worcester, Mass. The following report witnesses that her interest and spirit admit of no limitations, and the Yearly Meeting Committee on Education proposes to continue the schools under her care by correspondence for the present. Her able Secretary, at her office, No. 140 N. Sixteenth Street, will assist in routine work.]

This fragmentary report has been gathered from correspondence with teachers and principals of the schools.

Media has had several changes in teachers. After many years of efficient service in various Friends' Schools, M. Elizabeth Whitacre is taking a year for much-needed and richly deserved rest. Rebecca Williamson, who has taught in the School two years, is acting as Principal. Deborah S. Allen, Jr., has first and second grades, succeeding Helen Stratton. In addition to thorough Kindergarten training and much experience as a kindergarten, and in managing the Home and School Centre in S. Media, she has had two summers at Columbia. Ruth Thorp, who has had two years at Earlham, with this summer at Columbia, has the work of Third and Fourth Grades. Media is to be congratulated upon having for new teachers two Friends of their own meeting. School opened the 12th with an enrollment of 51, and an actual attendance of 38. The Kindergarten taught by our most excellent teacher, Lucie Logan Stephens, starts out well with 12 children, and lower grades are of good size, but there are only eight in Rebecca Williamson's room of Fifth and Sixth Grades. All the children are to have some work in manual training with Ruth Thorp, and nature-work with Deborah Allen, and some of the classes have sewing with Rebecca Williamson. The teachers are evidently entering into their work with vigor and enthusiasm, and I feel sure that the Media School will continue to be a very happy place of solid work and vigorous play.

London Grove is suffering from its success. The children of the Seventh Grade passed examinations and entered the Avondale Vocational High School. That one of our small schools can successfully accomplish eight years' work in seven years speaks well for the intelligence and diligence of the pupils and the earnestness and ability of the teachers. I expect our children who enter Avondale School this fall to maintain the very high standard set by the pupils from our School who entered last year, and were able to keep at the head of the class and win "golden opinions" from the principal and teachers. There were, at last report to me, 13 pupils in the School, divided as evenly as possible between Edith Wood, who has the lower room, and Helen Clement, who is principal and teaches the Fifth and Sixth Grades. Both are members of Fifteenth and Race Streets Yearly Meeting; both attended Columbia this summer, and are most enthusiastic over their work there. Ida Stabler, their superintendent from Fifteenth and Race Streets Yearly Meeting, reports a good start in the year's work, and regrets only lack of numbers. They are already taking advantage of these glorious fall days and have had a school picnic, with illustrated lecture in the evening, and seem full of plans for a year of much worth-while activity. The more I know of this community, the more I appreciate the willingness of a small number of Friends to bear the expense of this School, and the more I rejoice that the School in large measure seems to be repaying them for their sacrifice, by helping really to educate their children.

Fallington, hitherto our smallest school, yields that honor to London Grove, and opens with fifteen pupils, in the first five grades, a very congenial group, the teacher assures me. They have added to their equipment new tables and chairs and do a great deal of group work and work at the tables. Marian Leeds reports that Summer School at Columbia was "just great," and I can see from her letters that she has gained much from her work and observation there. She finds her children very interesting and thoroughly enthusiastic about school and its activities, is asking for books to read to continue her professional studies, and reports visits from two members of the committee. Teacher and Committee have worked together to bring in new pupils as older ones drop out at the top, and so maintain a school gradually increasing in numbers and well serving the community.

Lansdowne reports an enrollment of 76. Some have dropped out on account of increase in tuition and dull business conditions. Eleanor Paxson, a graduate of Swarthmore, and a member of Fifteenth and Race Streets Meeting, is successor to Sara Sawyer, in Fifth and Sixth Grades. Margaret James says: "I never saw the building look so clean and attractive." She and a member of the Committee went over the building hunting every place and thing that needed to be mended or changed; chairs and shades have been put in order, shelves made, and new desks purchased for one room. The Principal reports that teachers had everything ready for the opening of school, and that they have started in well, with hopes for more pupils later. "But anyhow," she says, "we have a lovely school family at present."

Hanna T. Mitchell sends in a fine account of Haddonfield. She herself has had a summer free from care and has evidently profited by her vacation and finds her teachers also rested and enthusiastic. She reports an enrollment of 75 and actual attendance on the opening day of 67. They have added a new teacher to their faculty, Doris Arthur, of Wilson College, who has had no experience, but Hanna Mitchell says "with Ruth Collins' enthusiasm and help to plan her work for a while, I feel sure she will develop into a good teacher." Another room for fifth and sixth grades has been fitted up with seventeen desks, all occupied. This change relieves Ruth Collins, who now has third and fourth grades of about 16 pupils. Lydia Kite has a strong First Grade and rather weak Second, and the Kindergarten so far has only three with "some possibilities." I hope the Committee and Principal will develop these fully. The Principal has Seventh and Eighth Grades with 18 pupils. Haddonfield has hitherto for some years had the manual training teacher from the public school, but he has resigned, and they have secured the services of a local carpenter whom they know, and who helped them with their playground equipment last year. He will give them one day a week, and with the older pupils do some practical work for the school as it is needed. Hanna Mitchell says he has very good ideas for the work and she is sure the children will like him. Haddonfield, by the way, has a most attractive school catalogue.

Frankford has made a wise move in becoming a primary school of Kindergarten and first four grades. With only two rooms and two teachers, the forty children in kindergarten and six grades last year presented a very real difficulty. The upper classes were very small—only one or two in a class—yet they multiplied the number of recitations, and while adding tremendously to the work of the teacher the pupils were not getting the benefit of class mates and of sufficient instruction. The 24 pupils now in school with a few more in prospect, and no doubt others to come in through the year, make a comfortable school for two teachers. The painting of the meeting and school houses has made school seem a more cheerful place, and better tables for lunch add to comfort of teachers and pupils. Winifred Olley's letter shows that she is very happy in her work, and encouraged by better working conditions.

Anna Gifford reports that the Downingtown School opened with twenty pupils in first three grades. Mildred Lee, of Fairhope, Alabama, who has been in the Teacher Training Class of the Johnson School there, is her assistant. Anna Gifford calls her "a good helper." Mildred Lee herself writes of her pleasure in "the most beautiful school building she has ever seen," in its delightful location, and in the "interesting and wide-awake children." The teachers are happily established in the very pleasant apartment provided them by a generous member of the Committee, and the varied activities of this progressive school are going on under the full inspiration of summer school stimulus. Anna Gifford was at Columbia.

Atlantic City has one new teacher, Mary Swain, for grammar grades. She is a Friend from Germantown, a graduate of Westtown and of State College, with one year's experience in a public high school. She and Elizabeth Scott and Margaret Scales all attended Columbia this summer. School opened with sixty pupils, which is a very good beginning, as the enrollment increases rapidly in the fall and early winter. Helen Forsythe writes: "The school-house is repainted and looks fine," but gives no further information. I can only hope this means all that my imagination pictures.

Christine E. Lemmo continues her work as physical director, and Margaret E. Norrell succeeds Jane Pearson as Director of Drawing. I should be very glad if Josephine Hopwood, who has for two years given lessons in Nature Study and Science once a week in the Lansdowne School, might extend her work to Haddonfield, Media and Frankford this year. She is a very fine woman and a thrilling teacher, who has a well-worked-out course in Nature Study, which in the upper grades becomes Elementary Science. Our schools are weak along these lines, and the teachers need the direction and inspiration of such a teacher. I should not advise sending her at present to the distant schools.

Of our 27 regular class-room teachers only nine attended summer school. This smaller number by no means indicates that teachers are losing interest in their professional training; but more than half of them have for two previous years attended summer school, and they felt the need of rest and recreation this year, and were encouraged to take it; and I am expecting quite as rich educational returns from their refreshing holidays as from their previous study. Of the 7 new teachers in our schools, 3 are Orthodox Friends, 2 are Hicksite Friends and one has one parent a Friend.

Our competition for prizes offered last year by the Peace Committee resulted in a good beginning of interest in the subject and in some passable essays on various phases of the subject of peace; but our efforts were crude, as our study had been in some cases hurried, and the final composition sometimes nearly frantic in its haste and confusion. I am expecting within a few days to communicate with the Secretary of the Peace Committee in regard to further co-operation of some sort between this committee and our schools, and I plan at an early date to urge each school to work diligently along this line throughout the year, and to make to them a few suggestions as to ways and means. The only effective way to get results in such work is to have the teachers thoroughly convinced of its vital importance, as "the international mind" cannot be induced by lifeless lessons given by unconvinced teachers.

Last year I felt that we were in some schools a little in danger of forgetting that we are, after all, Friends' schools, and that our work is a religious concern with meetings and committees, as it seemed to me, in some cases, we were neglecting our opportunity to teach the Bible to the children in our schools, in a way that could possibly make it of real value to them at any time. I am, therefore, about to redouble former efforts, and make a special plea to the principals and teachers to give ample time and conscientious effort to realize this important work. And I must in this connection express the profound hope that the mid-week meetings which our children attend may so meet their spiritual needs that no one can truthfully say of these eager-minded, whole-hearted little ones, "The hungry sheep look up and are not fed."

As usual this is too favorable a report, based, however, entirely upon data furnished by the principals and teachers. Yet I think it is not too much to say that the schools have never been so well organized and graded, and never so adequately provided with trained teachers. In our pride in the Yearly Meeting schools perhaps we should not forget the heavy financial burden felt by some local committees and meetings.

Respectfully submitted,

GERTRUDE ROBERTS SHERER,
Superintendent.

BOOK REVIEWS.

"THE SALVAGING OF CIVILIZATION."

That we may more fully understand the position of H. G. Wells and not be misled by his fancies, let us study another quotation concerning his plan for a "Bible of Civilization," which he proposes to be written by a large international committee, not saying, however, who will invest them with the needed authority to make it a "universal book," not to mention the spiritual ability or unity of purpose. Then he questions:—"If it is true that the old Bible falls short in its history and does not apply closely to many modern problems, then we need a revised and enlarged Bible in our schools and homes to restore a common ground of ideas and interpretations, if our civilization is to hold together." He does not, however, mention any "modern problems" which cannot be solved by New Testament principles.

"Now let us see," he says, "what the Bible gave a man in the days when it could really grip and hold and contain him," (as if it could not nowadays), "and let us ask if it is impossible to restore and reconstruct a Bible for the needs of these great and dangerous days in which we are living. Can we recement our increasingly unstable civilization?" He then endeavors to summarize what the Bible gave man as "a dramatic relationship to the scheme of things. It linked him to all mankind with a conception of relationships and duties. It gave him a place in the world and put a meaning into his life."

This is really but a small part of what the Bible gives man. He mentions the ethics, but leaves out the religion. Wells really misses the big things. He makes no mention of God or His Son Jesus Christ or the fact that this book answers questions which philosophy cannot answer, such as "If a man die shall he live again." He misses the fact that it speaks with God's authority in over two thousand references to a "thus saith the Lord." The great facts of Man's sin, of God's redeeming love in Christ, of His promises of the Holy Spirit's presence in the believer who becomes "a new creature in Christ," are things apparently beyond Wells's ken. But these are the things that have given our Bible its influence as "a cement" for civilization.

Each one may judge for himself how consistent Wells seems to be or whether he is but "a blind leader of the blind." We are reminded of Paul's words that "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned. But he that is spiritual discerneth all things." (1 Cor. ii: 14-15.)

We will hear Wells through. This new "Bible of Civilization" which is to be the basis of the educational program which is to bring about a World State with "peace on earth and good-will among men," will contain, he says, a Book of History, a Book of Conduct and Wisdom; a Book of Anthologies of Poetry and Literature; and finally a Book of Forecasts; all of them wonderfully illustrated with photographs, maps, charts and drawings. He estimates that forty million dollars would produce this "bible" and get it established in the nations of the world.

It is quite apparent the human element would be so strong in this "bible" that it would soon be out of date and would require constant revision and editing. Contrast this with our Bible which "came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit."

It is significant that Wells recognizes the value of prophecy and its practical influence on character. He suggests: "We want to make our world think more than it does about the consequences of the lives it leads, and the political deeds that it does, and that it permits to be done. We want to turn the human imagination round again towards the future which our lives create. We want a collection and digest of forecasts and warnings to complete this modern Bible of ours."

But what more simple and definite warnings could Wells want than those we have from the Written Word—"The soul that sinneth it shall die,"—"the wages of sin is death" or from Christ Himself—"What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" and "Who-soever therefore shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him shall the Son of Man be ashamed when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels." These words have not lost their grip upon human nature, because with the warnings are given promises: "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus," and "He that hath the Son, hath Life," and "to as many as received Him to them He gave the right to become the children of God."

Finally, Wells admits, "There would be forecasts that would have to be struck out because they were not realized, or because they were shown to be hopeless or undesirable, and fresh forecasts would have to be added to replace them." One naturally wonders who will be judge as to which "guesses" will be admitted to this "Book of Forecasts" and who will condemn others as being "hopeless" or unfulfilled. Compare the prophecies of our Bible concerning the Jews. If these had been mere human forecasts who would not have long ago ruled out as "hopeless" the promises to Israel to be restored to their own land. And yet to-day we see nearly a million Jews settling in Palestine with peace and prosperity attending them, and the persecutions of centuries have been turned to blessings, because it was a "thus saith the Lord." What man even twenty years ago would have dared prophecy this modern miracle—a Jewish university in Jerusalem?

If our civilization is "tumbling down very rapidly," it is because the faith of many in our Bible has been upset by the "destructive critics," and its "cementing influence" of the past is being neutralized by them. The Wellhausen-Driver School of "textual critics" have brought some helpful light upon portions of the Bible as literature; but many of their conclusions are proved incorrect by more recent and more accurate research. History and science are still being corrected and made to conform to the Scriptures, and as for the fundamental doctrines of our Christian faith we can take the words of Christ that "one jot or one tittle of the law shall in no wise fail."

Men and women to-day are more responsive than ever to the appeal of the Gospel, God's Good News of Salvation; and the appeal of God's written word. To those who have faith even as only "a grain of mustard seed" the realities and promises of Scripture are demonstrated, and Jesus Christ becomes increasingly real.

Kingdoms may rise and fall, republics and sovietts increase and decrease, educational systems come and go, the seasons roll round each year with increasing social unrest and chaos, and "the grass withereth and the flower thereof falleth away, but the word of the Lord endureth forever."

WILLIAM H. RICHIE.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

MARY'S INVESTMENT.—Here is a true story about a little girl, whom we shall call Mary. On her seventh birthday she received from her father, who lived in India, money with which to buy a Bible. No doubt Mary immediately began to picture to herself what a beautiful Bible she would buy, for the money sent by her father was enough to buy a very handsome one indeed. But before the Bible was bought, an idea occurred to Mary.

"Grandmother," she asked, holding out her precious money, "is there enough money here to buy two Bibles, instead of one?"

"Yes, dear," replied grandmother, "but what do you want with two Bibles?"

"Oh," said Mary, "I want one myself, and one to send to India, for some little Indian girl just seven years old, like me, who hasn't any Bible of her own."

And so it came about that Mary did not get such a pretty Bible as she had expected to get at first. But she didn't mind about that, for she was thinking, not about herself at all, but about the surprise birthday present she was sending out to the little unknown girl in far-off India.

A letter was written asking that when the book was given to its new owner, the name of the little Indian girl should be written on the flyleaf, and after the name the words, "From Mary—"

A new petition was added to Mary's evening prayer, for night by night, without fail, the little English child prayed to God to bless the Hindu girl who had a Bible like her own.

Years passed, and Mary grew to young womanhood, and in 1882 she went out to India as a missionary. One day, not very long after her arrival, she was visiting some zenanas with a native Bible woman who was a very earnest Christian. In the course of conversation, it somehow happened that the Bible woman heard for the first time the young missionary's name. A look of glad surprise crossed her face, and hurriedly putting her hand into her pocket, she drew out a book and eagerly signed to her companion to read what was written on the flyleaf. Mary looked, and read her own name! Yes, this earnest Christian woman was the little Hindu girl whom she had remembered so often in her prayers.

God had blessed Mary's first missionary work, for it was through reading that Bible that this native woman had become a Christian; and now that Mary was a woman, she was to have the joy of having as her companion and fellow-worker the very one for whom she had prayed so long ago, and so far away.—The Silent Evangelist.

REFUGEES SWAMP POLISH VILLAGES.

The flood of Polish refugees returning from Russia in a great wave on account of famine conditions has already swept into the agricultural districts in Poland, where it is quite overwhelming the little villages. Workers of the Mission, returning from the county of Drohiczyn, only about one hundred miles to the east of Warsaw, tell tales of appalling overcrowding and need. Two hundred refugees arrived on one train, and were dumped down on the ground in a place where there is not even a station building to offer protection from rain. A dozen cottages are left at this point of what was once a big village. All other buildings were destroyed by the war.

A woman was heard moaning and coughing on the steps of the railroad wagon in which the Friends were traveling. She carried a baby, and there were eight persons altogether in the family. They left Russia last spring and she caught cold on the long, hard journey. It was obvious that she was in a very advanced stage of tuberculosis. Yet she and her entire family of eight had been living for some time, not in a house, but in the windowless store-room of a more fortunate neighbor, a room with a dirt floor, already partly full of another family's possessions, and with no cook stove.

The whole family looked doomed. They had no horse and the man could get little work. The children were very undersized. They came from the Saratov district in Russia and they said it had been bad there for six months. Instead of jumping for joy at the sight of rice and bacon, as the peasant children in Poland usually do, these children sat staring apathetically, too far gone with hunger to have any strong feelings even for food.

The Relief Director of the Polish Government in this county reported forty-two deaths from starvation already this year, not counting those who have died from diseases which found them weakened by lack of food. Only two carloads of flour and one of corn have come into this district since the first of the year for the Government relief distribution. Wherever the land has been ploughed, it has given a fairly good harvest of rye, which is the mainstay of the peasants for bread. But only one-sixth of the land has been ploughed since the war. Most of it has gone back to wilderness. Fair-sized birch trees have sprung up in the damp soil, and the peasants have practically no horses.

One particularly great blow to the district was the recent burning of a village which was comparatively well-off. The peasants had returned last year and had a good harvest this year, practically enough to supply the whole village. It was all gathered in the barns when a fire swept the village by night, finding the thatch roofs and hastily-built wooden structures good timber. All are homeless and in utter want, dependent on a county in which already others are starving.

The great need is for horses and agricultural implements. Even the most apathetic of the hungry peasants and driven officials come quickly to life when the possibility of getting the use of horses is mentioned. The Mission is at present taking up with the Polish Government the possibility of an extended use of army horses for agricultural work this fall in Poland.

ANN LOUISE STRONG.

FRESH MILK IN POLAND.

WARSAW, Ninth Month 9, 1921.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

Those of the Polish Unit who are working on the fresh milk relief wish to make a special appeal to you for more funds. The work has progressed so satisfactorily that at present in twelve cities of Poland, Friends' fresh milk is being delivered daily to poor, underfed children. At the same time, thousands of Poland's finest, high-production cows are getting daily stronger and more able to serve the childhood of the nation when the Missions shall have left. At the time Rufus Jones and Wilbur Thomas were here, we based our future work upon collections from child institutions of marks worth eight hundred to the dollar. Now the same marks are worth only one-fifth of that. Our entire collection of marks will only make by the end of the year about two thousand dollars.

We know that there is great demand for relief funds, especially in Russia. The refugee work in Poland is very important, and it in the last month has received from London half as much as all we have spent for milk since our work began. But considering the difficulty of organizing the producers and consumers in and around every one of the fourteen cities, so that they work together and co-operate with officials and voluntary committees, we feel it would be losing a great opportunity not to go forward upon the foundation which has been built. The committees are working well, with a strong organization, and we are ready now to use every dollar to bring the fresh milk to children for four months.

We are coming into personal contact with such a large number of leading men and women of Poland that it is hard to estimate the full influence of this work. For wherever we go we give a new emphasis to the importance of saving child-life. A large number of principal landowners are gaining a new social consciousness. The actual work and solving of numerous details is being done voluntarily by the Poles. All we do is to keep a close control and assist where necessary. Everywhere gratitude is shown for our scientific help, and we now have a network of friends reaching out as far as twenty hours by train from Warsaw. Three workers are constantly traveling, and bit by bit the fourteen communities are beginning to know why we do this work and the principles for which the Friends stand. In a number of cities the chief governing official is on our committee of three or four or is co-operating in an active way.

We are also co-operating with hundreds of Polish children's institutions, and with the American Relief, our tuberculosis relief, and, if funds and personnel permit it, probably with our refugee relief, by supplying fresh milk to incoming babies on the Russian boundary.

When one knows all the methods and results of our fresh milk relief, it provides something that touches the imagination. We therefore would recommend that every bit of help which any one would like to give be sent for this relief.

Sincerely,

FRANK E. WALSER.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

Many Friends are feeling that the approaching "Disarmament" Conference at Washington and the general interest in possible ways of preventing new wars, give us no ordinary opportunity of spreading our views on the wrongfulness of war and the path to peace, and really entail a heavy responsibility on us to do so. Some among us have been seriously wrestling with the problems of peace and war, theoretical and practical, and have reached fairly definite conclusions as to what they believe and what they should do. Many of us, however, have gone little farther than to think "Friends have always been opposed to war" and "war is contrary to the spirit of Christianity," without any clear understanding of the problem or strong sense of conviction.

We urge upon all Friends, both for their own benefit and for the collective strength of the Peace testimony which our Society should be proclaiming at this time, to review carefully the grounds of their own personal objections to war and the Christian way out, as well as the basis of the objections held by the Society of Friends. Let those re-read Dymond's "Essay on War," for whom that presentation is the most convincing, or read the English Friend, William E. Wilson's "Christ and War," and "Foundations of Peace," or go to the New Testament itself for the direct Christian teaching. Do we not owe it to ourselves, to our religious Society and to the cause of Peace to clarify our ideas on this subject and thus be better able to help advance the cause of Peace?

The Peace Committee at 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, will gladly loan any of the above-mentioned books to Friends who desire them, and it will furnish free, copies of "Friends and War," the statement of the Quaker position adopted by the London All Friends' Conference of 1920, or Dr. C. J. Cadoux's "An Appeal to the People of the Christian Church," which is a very satisfying statement, brief and modern, of those who hold the Quaker position on war.

PRESIDENT HIBBEN to the STUDENTS of PRINCETON UNIVERSITY.—"The Conference at Washington is big with possibilities both for the present and future. And its decisions largely depend upon whether America takes a decided and insistent stand for reduction of armaments and is willing to lead the way. America's decision can be determined now, as in the past, if the people speak and urge with importunate demand what they all desire, but so far have only feebly expressed. The voice of public opinion should be heard with no uncertain sound."

"The one thing that will awaken the conscience of America is the united voice of the young men of our land—the men who would be the first to volunteer and do their part if war should ever come upon us, but who can be as equally determined to do their part now in order to remove those present war conditions which make war inevitable.

"I feel that this is particularly true of the young men in our universities. I wish to urge upon your serious consideration, therefore, the possibility of organizing a movement here, which, with the co-operation of the representatives of other universities throughout our country, might give expression to the convictions upon this subject which I am sure you must hold."

WHERE SHALL I SEEK THEE?

Where shall I seek Thee? Spirit Universal!

Or in the ether, or in cavern's gloom?

Can I approach Thee in some sacred building?

Prayer shall I offer at a martyr's tomb?

Not in the forest, nor in trackless desert,

Not in the lowland, nor on mountain's brow

Can I discern one temple more than other

Where Thou residest—omnipresent Thou!

Inward I turn in silent adoration,

Meet Thee within the precincts of the soul;

There to receive Thy blessing of communion,

There be Thy freeman, in Thy presence whole.

—ANNIE MARGARET PIKE.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

WILLIAM LITTLEBOY, one time warden of Woodbrooke, and known to many Friends as the author of "The Day of Our Visitation," is expected in Philadelphia shortly after the middle of the month. He is a recognized minister, and a lecturer and teacher of marked spiritual gifts.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN corrects a statement made in this column of THE FRIEND a few weeks since that his article in the Reformed Church Messenger on "Militarism" was not a prize-winning essay. It was. The statement was made after reading the article and the list of prize-winners in that paper. How we were guilty of the oversight is unaccountable, but we do sincerely regret it.

A. GERTRUDE JACOB, who has been for some years a successful teacher in Queens, N. Y. C., was of the Woodbrooke party in Norway this summer, as previously noted in THE FRIEND. She has written of her experiences in The American Friend of Ninth Month 29th. The following is one of her concluding paragraphs:—

"The thing that drew us together and held us was Woodbrooke. Its spirit was here, there and everywhere. There was no place where one could feel it more keenly than in the lecture hall. It was there that Dr. Rendel Harris brought Christ to us as a living being in the midst. To us the Fjord became the Sea of Galilee and in its beauty and the glory of the peaks around us we lived once again as children. And the spiritual uplift from seeing new vistas of Bible truth as well as the beauties of nature will stay with us as we return to take up life's problems again. It was there that H. G. Wood brought Christ's teaching to bear on the great burning questions of today, and showed so clearly how those teachings could be applied now. There also, O. F. Olden very ably touched on property rights, and J. Mansaaker and T. O. Dokk drew for us historical or poetical pictures of their native land through which we felt the burning love of country."

CARE IN INSURANCE

The Provident was founded in 1865 by a group of Friends for the purpose of protecting the estates and insuring the lives of members of the Society of Friends.

Later the services of this Company were offered to other people who were known to be of careful habits. A careful company insures only those people who are good moral as well as well risked. This results in a low death-rate, which is one of the elements of low cost of insurance.

Care is important—in insurance as well as in other things.

To be open-eyed, venturesome, fearless, may lead one into the midst of difficulties, but there is a joy in overcoming, an exquisite satisfaction in hard-won triumph which the slothful and timid soul can never know.—Florence Morse Kingsley.

THE UNIVERSE AND MY BROTHER.

I.

Two girls came out of the large Auditorium at Silver Bay. It was one of those nights when life seems as tremulous and vibrant as the starlight on Lake George. The girls walked down to the shore where the water lapped on the beach. Neither of them spoke for a long time. "The field is the world. What wouldn't I give to feel it that way—the way he does." John R. Mott had given the concluding address at a student conference. He had just returned from a trip around the world studying world conditions from the standpoint of the Kingdom of God. A sense of the whole filled the hearts of those students as they stood on the threshold of fuller life. Barriers had dropped; for a moment the great pulse of the world throbbled through young hearts; they "Saw life perfect and saw life whole."

They felt that instant how God so loves the world; how impartially He looks on all nations and races and classes and cares for the evil and the good day and night down through the generations as they pass

"From the great deep to the great deep—."

They thought how self-contained and independent each group had tried to be; how they builded great walls around their cities and their lives; how they let it out that they, even they alone, were chosen of God—His elect—the inference being that other men were barbarians, foreigners, aliens, Gentiles all. How paltry and stultifying all this must look to the Everlasting Father, the "God and Father of us all." The contrast burned itself into the minds of the girls as they looked up into a sky brilliant with stars—the contrast between the little circle of interests that men live and die for and the great round universe that God loves.

And one day if we grow up before we die it will come to us too that the world is round. When this concept sweeps through the mind it may easily blur our sense of personality. Statistics of poverty and despair skim over the surface of our minds and fail to bite in. It is a sort of skating exercise to reel them off glibly and impress ourselves with the breadth of our interest and the largeness of our concern. Do we pride ourselves on being world citizens, on our international consciousness,—skaters that we are over North America and Europe? Poland, Germany, Austria, England, Ireland, Serbia, Russia,—what matters it to us? On two continents wherever men hunger by the thousands, there the barriers drop and we give bread. Bread and ourselves as well.

So far are we achieving an international point of view. Some day God may ask us why we are forgetting the rest of the world. We may answer, it is too big. Which is true. It is too big. God knows we are not large enough to live in it all. Yet it is to be doubted whether a world citizen may live in any less. For this God made us spirit and not flesh only. Is it too hard to say that no one can accomplish fully the intensive will of God in his own one life without a glimpse at some inspired moment of the Kingdom as a whole? We would work as artists and not machines, doing the great will of the Master. God trusts us as co-workers—sharing His passion for the Kingdom—not as servants who know not what their Lord willeth, but as friends. The very small work to which we give our lives may be done with a large catholic spirit that shares the life-work of one billion and a half brothers, as branch shares the life of branch in the same living vine.

II.

A little child was crying in the night. She was lonely and afraid of the dark. "But," explained her mother, "don't you know that God is always near and you are not alone?"

"Yes," sobbed the child, "but I want somebody with a skin face."

Having achieved an interest that reaches round the globe, have we lost our sense of the individual? Do we think impersonally in masses—of nations and races and continents and the world, never breaking through to the personal? Not so does God love the world. The marvel of it is that such a great God stoops to the place where dwell "the meekest, the lowliest, and the lost." Unless we share this attitude with God our international theories will leave the world cold. Contrast with this sweeping impersonality Jesus' great thought of the Lover of the one Lost Life; of the joy there is in heaven over the one repentant sinner; over the son that was lost and is found. And to incarnate this great thought, how Jesus loved those friends of His, personally one by one—Peter, and John, Lazarus, Mary, Thomas, Philip. They were His friends, He said. Friendship involves a very personal relationship and love "a conscious unity of life."

Here we fail as Christians, most of us. A few friends we have who enrich and glorify life, but what of our reach across the conventions and artificial isolations to the man and woman and little child whose kinship to us is undiscovered? The Kingdom of God must be builded by just these very persons "and the night is dark." These must be found and won. The life of a Christian should be full of personal work and individualizing love. Is it possible that here is our Achilles' heel? We must think—not only how many Friends are internationalists and liberals and humanitarians, but how many are lovers and winners of men to the Lord Jesus Christ?

Paul says: "I can speak with the tongues of men and of angels, but am destitute of love—. And if I distribute all my possessions to the poor and give up my body to be burned, but am destitute of love, it profits me nothing." (Weymouth.)

If we are sensitive to spiritual atmosphere we too shall know that men hunger and thirst—not just for bread and condensed milk, but for love and the quickening word. But why argue what all know? We know, intellectually at least, that in Europe and Asia and Africa and the Americas there is stark poverty of soul. What our relationship should be to these "blind mouths" each must determine for himself before high God. The thing we may even then overlook is the fact of our unrealized relationship to these very individuals with whom we bump elbows in our daily rounds, whose hearts we never touch. Do the people around us here know that we love? Do they know that we care more for them than for the houses we live in and the clothes we wear? Or do we? We see someone in our meeting who slips in silently with a certain wistful hunger in her coming. Perhaps we meant to catch her after meeting and give at least the handclasp that speaks love, but she vanishes while we tarry—she and her silent sorrow. Or the clerk, who wearily measures off our purchase; the conductor who punches train loads of tickets and ours; the waitress, the elevator boy, the janitor, the plumber—persons with problems and needs and burdens like ours—persons, and not machines, persons whom God has given us this much chance to touch, and "the opening of the prison" to a few of them.

To these are we blind, that we minister not? Yes, we are blind. It is the kindest explanation. If we saw, we should give our all—even a widow's mite though it be; even three loaves and two small fishes. We could do no less.

These two startling facts then about God's kind of love; the bigness of it, reaching round the world and on into infinite worlds it may be; the individualizing of it reaching to the least with an intensity passing all the greatest loves of earth! As we think of our own religious life we shall undoubtedly discover that one or the other of these two emphases we signally lack. This we must consciously cultivate. If we have drawn the circle of our love very closely round "our own," we must bravely start out in quest of the larger family of God. By travel in other lands, by reading that carries us into fresh fields, by human contacts with people of other nations and colors whom we may find around the corner, in hundreds of ways if we set ourselves the task, we may stir the world passion lying unawakened within us. If, on the other hand, we are so gloriously captured by a sense of the great oneness of humanity that we never notice the hungry life next to us, may God to this "Stab our spirits broad awake." The little Christ-child crying on the river bank for someone to carry Him across—may God make us St. Christophers enough to answer the human cry, though with blind eyes we bear the burden of the Prince of Light.

As we think of our own religious group we may discover that we are losing out at this juncture on the personal side of Christianity. We are no longer driven to personal work by grim theologies. But we are the very people who protest that the compulsions of love are greater than the compulsions of fear. Love lays down its life for the brethren. To what lengths is the love of Christ constraining us? To what sacrifices? To what fastings and prayer? To what humiliations? To what boldness? To what winning of men?

The Society of Friends must keep on the high level of personal love. God could build the Kingdom had He living stones enough. Our hearts beat with high hope as we see it afar—the mystic city of brotherhood. But it will take more love than we have ever dreamed of, more persons who are little enough to "Pass the low lintel of the human heart," more shepherds who will brave storm and wilderness in the search, more "mothers and sisters and brothers of Christ."

Some day as we wait under the stars of vast heaven, it may be that God will share with us a vision of all the kingdoms of this world bound into a great cordon of love at last. And then He may gently lay on our hearts one or two as our very special charge—little ones that He would lead with our hands into the City of Love. Our task, our joy, is incomplete, until their faces too have caught the light of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

"———O Saul, it shall be

A Face like my face that receives thee; a man like to me,
Thou shalt love and be loved by forever; a Hand like this hand Shall throw open the gates of new life to thee! See the Christ stand!"

MOYLAN, Pa.

THE RICHEST WOMAN.

We were sitting at lunch in a small two-room building on the Russian border of Poland. It was headquarters for the Friends' Relief in the district. Outside, the large Red Cross auto-truck, with Y. M. C. A. chauffeur, borrowed for the trip from the camp at Baranowicz, was pulled up in the shade and carefully stripped of everything that might seem valuable to impoverished and pilfering people. It would take us back in the morning, thirty miles to the railroad, the post-office, the telegraph line and other connections with civilization.

Yet here, in this land of marshes and barbed-wire and returning refugees, they brought on the table good white bread and butter. We exclaimed over it, and then the District Worker explained:

"I have for cook," she said, "the richest woman in the village."

The door opened and the Richest Woman entered. Barefoot, pattering over the uneven board floor, with clean white kerchief on her head, and upon protecting her dress—a kindly, intelligent peasant-woman. "She is quite accomplished," bragged the District Worker. "She can speak two languages, Russian and Polish. Read and write? Oh, well, no; what do you expect?"

"How does it happen," I asked, "that you have the Richest Woman for your cook? Weren't there others who needed the work more?"

"Perhaps," said the District Worker, "but I took her for the same reasons the Germans took her, because she was clean and intelligent and a good housewife. I even hope," she added, "that in time we shall get rid of the bed-bugs with her help. I needed her, you see, for the same qualities that have made her the Richest Woman in the village."

I saw that there was a story and I asked for it. "What had the Richest Woman to do with the Germans? And how had she become the richest woman?"

"Wait a bit," said the District Worker, "until you have seen her background. Then you will appreciate her better."

All that afternoon we spent in seeing the background. We tramped along dusty paths in the desolate marsh country which century after century has kept the boundary of Russia safe against invasion. In the last war the Germans came thus far, but here they entrenched themselves and went no further, knowing that beyond this point they must pay too heavily for ground which they could never hold.

We passed line upon line of old trenches, now crumbling into themselves. We saw the solid cement dugouts and the partly-ruined barracks in the forests now inhabited by whole colonies of peasants. We saw the once ploughed fields now submerged beneath barbed-wire and the returning marshes. In the eastern distance was forest, and beyond, we knew, lay yet greater marshes, which the Russians did not even try to fortify by any trench-work, since they were in themselves impassable fortifications.

There had been little fighting here. Only the trenches and barracks and barbed wire for two years while the land went back to wilderness. Some of the peasants were driven far into Russia, by the Great Retreat of the Russian army, in 1915. But most of them were still here when the Germans came, and were gathered up in labor armies and sent back even to Germany to cultivate the fields from which soldiers had been taken. Then, after three or four or five or even six years, they had returned.

In one village they told us proudly how they had built since the spring every house that we saw there. All was destroyed when they came back, everything, everything! We looked down the village street to the marsh at the end of it and asked, "Is there much malaria here?"

"Very much, very much," came the answer. "Everyone! Two in my house are in bed today."

"Is there no better land than this?" we asked the District Worker. "It is such a pity that they should ever have rebuilt in a pest-hole."

"Oh, yes," she said, "but the high land belongs to a big estate which winds in and out among these villages. The old noble is dead, and the young one is in the city, and he sends word that no land is to be sold."

"But these peasants are on the borders of Russia, where lately the peasants have seized for themselves the land they wanted. Have you seen no symptoms of any such intention toward the better, healthier ground?"

"I have seen no signs of it," said the District Worker.

"Of course," she added, "if the Polish Government would drain these marshes! What is really needed in all this part of the country is a land reclamation program on a large scale. But the Polish Government has no money."

"And meantime?" I asked her.

"Meantime—we give them quinine," she smiled. "They are really very much better. We also sell them spades and ploughs below cost and secure for them the loan of horses.

The marsh was not so bad before the war. They are driving it slowly back by cultivation."

"But at what a cost of life," I thought, turning slowly away. I understood now why the Friends had decided to abandon this district, and also why the District Worker hated to leave. I knew that she would remember them often in the night, the people who would get no more quinine, lying in their wretched dugouts, shivering with malaria. I understood the bitterness with which she was preparing to go. And yet—there were not unlimited funds for all the districts in Poland, and there were other places which could be put quickly and permanently on their feet. We could not forever pour war-relief money into this swamp.

It was with this background that we walked back across the fields towards headquarters, in a village somewhat higher built and freer from malaria, yet still conditioned in its progress by the poor crops of the sour, reclaimed marsh-land. "Tell me now," I said, "the story of the Richest Woman. How did she get her wealth, and how much has she? How did she manage to rise above this background?"

"You might call it war-profiteering, or trading with the enemy," mused the District Worker. "Again you might call it spoiling the Egyptians, and exploiting the exploiters! She did not flee when the Germans came. She trusted to her own wit and shrewdness."

"The Germans said that her house was neat and orderly; Germans admire good housewifery; so when the rest of the village was shipped far back into Germany for field labor, she was taken only fifty kilometers behind the line and given the job of washwoman. Later she was promoted to cook for a group of the officers. Gradually she worked her way back to the front lines and to her own home village. She even managed to keep her husband and children with her to help with her work."

"Quite cleverly she began to improve her chances. There was one big feast she tells of, when three cases of vodka were brought into the house. She served it. By the end of the second case the officers were too drunk to know what they were drinking. She took half the remaining case and diluted it with water, and hid the other half to be sold later."

"Yes, it was a risk, but she had courage. And she was laying the foundations of her children's future. Little by little she collected small sums of money. At last, in the hour of the German retreat, came her chance. She went upon the great highway, in the Warsaw-Moscow road, and bargained with the retreating troops."

"I would like that cow," she said to an officer who knew her cooking. She bought the cow for a few rubles. "I would like a plough," she said to another officer; and he sold her cheap a plough that belonged to the army. She traded it later for a young heifer to another woman in the village."

"Bit by bit she acquired the livestock that meant wealth to a peasant. And even when the Bolshevik invasion came last year, commanding grain and horses, she met them all cheerfully, cooked for them, traded with them, and came out ahead in the end. She is a shrewder woman than you would think from her placid face. But her shrewdness is not hard-hearted; she gives much help to less fortunate villagers. Two of her cows are now loaned out to poorer families in the kindly way peasants have themselves invented for helping each other, whereby a family without livestock borrows a cow from a more fortunate neighbor and cares for it until it has borne for them two calves. In this friendly manner the Richest Woman is lending her cows to produce calves for the needier families. They will come back to her by the time she wants them—for her daughter's dowry."

"The daughter—it is for her that the Richest Woman is working. She is a pretty girl, almost of marriageable age. Her mother dresses her well. She sometimes wears shoes, even in summer. That, of course, is sheer vain-glory."

"Do her dreams for the girl include an education?" I asked, "so that she may read and write?"

"No, no! Should a girl who is to marry be peculiar among her companions? The dreams of the Richest Woman for her daughter include cows and a horse for a marriage portion. She will have her choice of the young men, having both beauty and wealth."

"And how much, after all, has the Richest Woman?"

"She has two cows of her own, besides the two she has loaned to neighbors," counted the District Worker slowly. "She has ten acres of land, a horse and a plough; she has two bull calves, five pigs and three hens. Her fall crop is 4000 pounds of potatoes. She has shoes for every member of the family in winter. She also owns three houses, but two of them she loans, rent free, to needy peasants. She is the village philanthropist, you see, as well as the Richest Woman."

We turned at last into the dusty yard of headquarters and the Richest Woman came busily out to greet us. "The potatoes they brought are no good," she said, "I give you my own potatoes."

There on the table lay a measure of well-grown potatoes from her own hospitable field, larger and better-looking than any we have been able to purchase. "How much do they cost?" we asked, but she waved the question aside. "What are these very potatoes?" she said.

"It is very gracious of her," I said to the District Worker, "but after all, how do you pay her? What are the wages that induce the Richest Woman to cook and keep house for you?"

"She will not take money. What use is money to her? Paper Polish marks, changing always in value. She is a clever woman and she will set no wage-scale. But she expects, from time to time, when we go to Warsaw, a return present for her labor. A piece of cotton cloth or even of wool. I think by winter-time she will expect an overcoat. She is acquiring clothing for all her family. It is worth much more, out here on this border, than money."

"Tell me," I asked, as we passed into the other room which served as store-room, bed-room and dispensary, "what do the other peasants think of her? Have they any sense of patriotism which condemns her friendly trading with various enemies over so many years?"

Even as I asked I knew the folly of my words. Patriotism? For what country? For the old Russia of the Czar which touched them distantly only to oppress? For the new Russia of the Bolsheviks which swept across their fields briefly, only to take their grain? For the Germans who left them good roads, but fields of marsh and barbed-wire? Or for the young Government of Poland to which they were given by treaty a scant six months ago, and whose language they do not even speak? What is any Government to them except commandeering of horses and grain? What could they think of asking from any Government except to be left alone?

However, the District Worker gave me an answer. "If the peasants think of her at all, except as a kind and clever and wealthy woman—if they pass any judgment on her war ventures, doubtless it is one of admiration that she, an untrained peasant like themselves, had courage and cleverness enough to face the peasant's age-long enemy and bring back both life and fortune."

"Their age-long enemy," I asked stupidly. "Do you mean the Germans?"

Even before she shook her head I realized that I was again thinking in terms of nationalism and western civilization. What does it matter to the peasant under what flag his enemy comes, or in the name of what culture his fields are laid waste? The peasant's ancient enemy is always—the warrior.

ANNA LOUISE STRONG,
(With the Friends' Mission in Poland.)

"It is the new mind that is of chief importance. Open your souls to the influences of the old ideals of humanity and the ideas of humanism, freedom, justice, and shut out the spirit of violence, privilege and intolerance from your mind, and you will discover the way of truth which leads to a peaceful and strong life, and which sets the soul at liberty."—Quoted by G. Currie Martin from an un-named continental writer.

A WORKING CREED

A friend I have who loves that ancient saw,
"Eight hours' toil, eight hours' wholesome rest,
And eight of worthy deeds." Yet, bound by law
Of busy modern life, he deems it best
To spend a tithe of every hour he lives
In "worthy deeds." A hail to one and all—
A word of pleasant thanks and praise he gives
To each that does him service, great or small.
I've seen the sullen beggar rouse, and mend
His shuffling gait, and set his shoulders square
To hear the brave, "Brace up! Good luck, my friend."
That came with ungrudging alms to salve despair.
No creed I place above his simple plan,
To do no harm and all the good he can.

—ARTHUR GUTTERMAN.

CHRISTIAN RECREATION.

Psychologists tell us that for every human instinct there is a corresponding social virtue or vice. The natural desire for fun, for recreation, then, is the basis of certain social virtues or of vices depending upon the training one has had. If the play instinct has not been rightly directed and developed it will crop out later on in some vice, unless definitely restrained by Christian convictions. This perhaps will explain why to so many young people the only idea of fun or recreation is the amusement afforded in "the Great White Way" of our modern cities.

This problem of wise recreation is a real one. Its importance was evident to our early Friends when they linked it with Bible reading in our Fourth Query. To those over twenty years it is too late to say "don't," but to the boys and girls of the teen-age—we should have a positive message and say "do."

Let us make clear in the beginning that there is a fundamental difference between recreation and amusement. Those activities which merely "kill time" are to be classed as amusements. True recreation can only include those activities which "impart new vigor," refresh and re-create in body, mind, or spirit; and leave one in better condition for another day's work. For instance, the gambler admits that card playing is fagging and enervating to his mind and body. It is therefore no recreation but only an amusement. Dancing rarely refreshes one in body, and never in spiritual life, so it can hardly be classed as wholesome recreation.

A large amount of time is consumed these days in the watching of others in games, theatres, moving pictures or similar spectacle. These "amusements" may have some recreational value, of imparting new vigor to mind and spirit; but the character of the scene will determine what the reaction will be upon one's spiritual life. For example, contrast the wholesome effect of a good college foot-ball game, track meet or boat race and the sinister influences radiating from the spectacle of a bull fight or prize fight. There are great educational possibilities in the moving picture industry and some leisure time spent in attending "the movies" may be of recreational value. But most of them will fail to pass the Christian's test,—"does it impart new vigor to my mind and spirit?"

The Christian should argue with Paul in his letters to the Romans and to the Corinthians that we are our brothers' keepers, we must not cause them to stumble. "All things are lawful for me, but all things edify not." As the personal representative of Jesus Christ, and as the Temple of God's Holy Spirit, the true Christian will not intentionally compromise even in recreation. He holds his leisure time in stewardship, to be used in helpfulness to himself and to others. "Whatsoever ye do,—do all to the glory of God." The Christian who "consciously belongs to Christ" will have a higher valuation on his time because of that ownership; he knows "Ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price," and he lives by it.

Let us use a little "grey matter" and some "consecrated common sense" and provide wholesome recreation for the young people.

What are the tests by which we may weigh the relative values of games, tests, stunts or exhibitions? True recreation will have definite physical, mental, moral and social values. If these are lacking there will be little "edification" and the game should be passed.

The physical benefits derived from recreation are: the building of new body tissue and muscle, the training of the senses, the proper co-ordination of nerves and muscles and learning adaptability to one's immediate environment.

The mental values of games are: the providing of relaxation to the mind, developing one's power of perception, rapid thinking and concentration, and the testing of one's present knowledge in ways which are both educational and entertaining.

The moral benefits of true recreation are: the development of will power, the training in restraint and self-control (required in contests to be a "good loser"), a sense of honor and fair-play, and to adjust differences. (Many times has a misunderstanding between children, or between teacher or parent and child, or even among college men,—been straightened out in the fellowship of a good game.)

The social values of play are: the making of worth while friendships, the developing of sympathy with another's point of view—(a game rule always works both ways)—to each side alike and the training of a group consciousness or loyalty (expressed in team spirit,—"Hurrah for our side!") This develops into business "esprit de corps.")

Finally, mass games or community recreation as it has been promoted by the Young Men's Christian Association recently in many communities has social value as a real democratic influence as a leveler of society. People who learn to play together can always better work together. Would not petty cliques among Christian people be dissipated by occasional play fests?

To safeguard the recreational life of our young people and at least show the way,—shall not the church through First-day School and Young Peoples' Societies take the initiative and provide every three or four weeks a "gym frolic," an indoor play fest, or social evening? The boys and girls naturally want to have good times together, and they should have them in fellowship with older Christian people. If the First-day School teachers or officers of the meeting will thus mix with the young people in wholesome recreation it will develop appreciation each for the other, as well as a more conscious loyalty to the meeting.

There should be some variety in the program of such an entertainment. There should be one or two active running games, then some ball tossing games, a relay test or two, then some quieter games. A "stunt" in which two or more contest or exhibit or sing together will entertain the group and add variety. There might well be a game which will in some way test the knowledge of the players, or perhaps a "charade." Then to close the program some group singing should be in a free and easy manner.

Other games which are more active which have appealed to young people in gym frolics are: "Ham, Ham, Chicken, Bacon," "Fire on the Mountain," an old Scotch game, "Link Tag," "Head and Tail Tag" or "Oyster Shell," as the Greeks used to call it, and "Slipper Slap" (in a circle). Then, too, there are many good ball games or relays which boys and girls can play together if the group is not too large, such as "Curtain Ball," "Corner Ball," "Corner Spy" and "Overtake."

Then there are innumerable quiet guessing games or tests which always make a pleasant evening. "A sensible party" is testing the senses with various things to smell, feel, see, hear or taste as numbered. Writing "Telegrams" is always fun, or guessing "Advertisements," or identifying the dozen or more things on an "Indian Head Penny," or other pencil and paper stunts.

Most of these games and many others may be found described in detail in that standard book by Jesse Bancroft, "Games for Playground, School and Gymnasium."

And so we see there is no excuse for us not planning wholesome recreation and giving our young people the sociable good times, which is their due, but which will not compromise their loyalty to Jesus Christ.

WM. H. RICHIE.

MOORESTOWN, New Jersey.

A MIRACLE.

"C'est un miracle." Monsieur said.

The past came sweeping over me like a flood. The surroundings were those of three years ago, yet everything was different. At that time a black cloud hung over every village in France, a cloud of fear and apprehension. Now that cloud had completely passed. If it had been succeeded by another, it was of an entirely different nature. Psychologically, the whole situation had changed.

Ailleville had been one of the first villages that it had been my duty to explore in my search for refugee families in those war days, now infinitely remote. A French village had been still an object of wonder and delight, with its ancient church, its compact rows of houses under overhanging eaves with the fragile beauty of roses trained over every door, its picturesqueness and its dirt. What misery I had unearthed among the victims of the storm that had driven them there for shelter.

This red-roofed cottage was one of those at which I had called on that first visit, but it had undergone some strange transformation. It was then a semi-ruin; desolation without and within. Now there was order and the marks of humble prosperity.

Never was there a warmer welcome than that which met this my second visit. I was surrounded by an atmosphere of rejoicing, yet it had been with difficulty that I had once gained admission to that gloomy interior.

How clearly it all came back to me. Beside the cavernous fire-place, Madame had answered my questions grudgingly, her back turned towards me. Henri, undersized, pale and lifeless sat upon the bed, mute and indifferent, his crutch beside him. He had no realization that the turning-point of his life had come.

I rubbed my eyes as I looked at the broad-shouldered youth with shining eyes, who held my hand. "I can do a man's work now," he said, "and I can go to the balls too, and dance through half the night."

The old father in patched corduroys, but with a glowing face, dropped his work in the fields to help his wife and Henri tell the story. We sat down to the cottage table garnished with a bottle of white wine and a big dish of sweet cakes which Madame had run out to purchase in honor of the occasion. We "trinked" our glasses, wishing each other long life and happiness. Over and over Monsieur repeated his phrase, "C'est un miracle."

"He was born a cripple, pauvre garçon, and never ran and played like other children. He was ashamed to be seen limping through the streets, so he almost never left the house till after dusk. It seemed as if the future could bring him nothing but suffering and misery.

"When we were driven by the bombardment from our home we found our way here, and for almost nothing bought this house, which, as you remember, was practically a ruin. See now how we have altered and improved it," he added proudly.

"Henri could do nothing in those days. When one is poor it is a great misfortune to have a crippled son. After your visit the infirmière came—full of kindness she was, and sympathy. She looked with care at his crippled leg which no doctor had thought could be cured, and she told us that there was hope, though she could promise nothing. There was a place, she told us, where Henri might go, and where every effort would be made to help him. It was called Sermazeix. We hardly dared to hope that anything would come of it, but the boy's whole future was at stake and we were eager to make the trial.

"For three months he was kept there under observation. The surgeon in charge feared that the trouble was tubercular and was doubtful of the benefits of an operation, but he decided at last to try.

"Four hours the boy lay on the marble. It was necessary to cut the bone of the leg through with a saw, above the knee and below it, and for weeks after it was in a plaster cast. But his recovery was marvellously rapid. He left the hospital only two months later—cured. There was no doctor in France who could have done that thing."

Madame broke in to contribute her share to the narrative. "Monsieur le Chirurgien was so happy himself at the result of the operation that he took both my hands in his as he congratulated me. There were tears in his eyes as he restored my son to me. He took both my hands in his," she repeated, evidently deeply moved at the memory, "'Behold your boy now,' he said to me."

Henri stood up and bared his knee pointing with pride to the long scar which ran for inches above and below it. I looked with wonder at his tall frame, strong and well-developed, and smiled back at the beaming face in which two grey eyes shone like stars. It was hard to believe that this was the same boy whom I had seen sitting drooping and apathetic in that room only three years ago.

"C'est un miracle," Monsieur reiterated for the twentieth time.

It was indeed a miracle..

FELLOWSHIP IMPRESSIONS.

The annual conference of The Fellowship of Reconciliation was held at Belmar, New Jersey, from Ninth Month 8th to 11th.

There were people present from all parts of the United States and with widely diversified interests. The fact that there were a larger number of young people, as well as many who were not members of the Fellowship, lent an enthusiastic interest throughout the Conference. It was noted also with satisfaction that there were members of our group who were unable to attend our annual meetings, due to distance or expense, but who were quietly extending our principles with very telling influence.

THE MINISTRY AS GOD'S VOICE.

[In response to a deep-felt desire that the spoken ministry in our religious meetings shall be maintained on a high spiritual level, direct from God and pure from His presence, the following paper was prepared by a Committee of the Preparative Meeting of Ministers and Elders of Chester Monthly Meeting, Penna.]

"Do you uphold and cherish a waiting, spiritual worship, and a free Gospel ministry, dependent upon the head of the Church, and exercised in the fresh life and power of His Holy Spirit?"

"Perhaps in writing of the ministry there is no way more appropriate to Friends than to consider the beauty and fitness of our third Query. Worship is in closest association with ministry. Out of a waiting, spiritual worship grows the expression of free Gospel Ministry, and further, the more reverent the worship the purer the ministry. Naturally, we must expect that the Spirit of God, visiting the waiting souls of men and women with His life-giving presence, will give His messages to whomsoever He will call to be His messengers. While it is true that a free Gospel Ministry is free because it is one of God's gifts to men, in a real Friends' meeting it is also free for the participation of all. God's gift of grace is free and every worshipper may be His minister.

There is a ministry of life and power, there is a ministry of words alone which profits no one. The one is lively and powerful because the Spirit of the Lord has called for it, the other

We find that there are members who have never attended one of the Fellowship gatherings, and of whom we know little or nothing until they are brought to our attention by the significant influence which they have exerted in their own locality. We suddenly observe:

"Who is this person who is so active down there in the South?"

The answer: "She is a school teacher. Yes, by the way, she is a member of the Fellowship."

The Conference this year laid stress upon concrete situations and immediate application of the Fellowship principle in various forms, while perhaps less time was spent upon labor movements.

A. J. Muste considered the problem of compromise. We were forced to conclude that after all we could not be absolutists and lead consistent lives. It behooves every man to know his own conviction and to be ready to compromise accordingly.

Norman Thomas led us to believe, in regard to war, that greater changes than a mere disarmament of armies and navies must take place before we can end war. There must be revolution economically and politically.

Taraknath Das, a Hindu, also an American citizen, told us how the tremendous non-violent revolution and the pursuit of a self-government was developing in India.

In open forum, many live suggestions were offered to Frederick Libby, in prospect of the course of disarmament propaganda this winter. He enlists enthusiastic co-operation and service of all who are interested.

Rufus Jones, on First-day morning, unified the discussion of the whole Conference by placing emphasis upon the power of the unseen forces at work to bring our plans and purposes to an end and to work for the creation of a new society.

NOTE.

The Executive Committee of the Young Friends' Committee met on Ninth Month 23, 1921, to discuss the arrangement and reorganization of committees for the winter's work. The energetic enthusiasm manifested by the group was most encouraging. A nominating committee was appointed to bring forward names of members of the standing committees to our next meeting.

END OF THE YOUNG FRIENDS' NUMBER.

is of small value because words alone cannot profit. The one is the message of the Lord through His message-bearer, the other is the message of the mind of man. But out of a real waiting, spiritual worship should emanate in all its purity a ministry of life and power as we testify with John of "that which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of life."

True ministry, then, is far deeper than even the best un-called for thoughts of men. There is a strength in the message of God, in the ministry proclaimed under His immediate guidance, which no other ministry can ever have. In the present day there are many conferences; there are good addresses on every hand. In various places and in many ways the Truth is being spread. In all this we may rejoice; we have no desire to reject any appointed service; there are many varieties of consecrated ministry. But the pure, living, powerful gospel ministry for which we are now pleading—that ministry which we want to see exercised in our religious meetings—is the Voice of God Himself, spoken through that messenger who has waited for the Voice. This ministry cannot be confused with the other. This is higher than the other as God's thoughts are higher than man's thoughts. This ministry rings true to the fiery cry of the prophets, "Thus saith the Lord."

Nor do we feel that long sermons are necessary. A few brief sentences are often more forceful than extended expressions.

Five words in the Spirit of Christ are of more service than ten thousand words apart from His Spirit. Particular encouragement therefore should be given to those who occasionally feel that Christ has given them a few words only to speak for Him. Not one of us can tell to how great a distance those words may reach, nor how full may be their meaning to another life. God's voice is of infinite power.

So, finally, we desire to cherish and uphold a ministry pure and true,—so pure and so true that all who hear will know that through Christ's ministers the Voice of God is sounding.

This paper was seriously considered at a joint meeting of the Ministers, Elders and Overseers of Chester Monthly Meeting. Full approval was given to it. The additional thought was impressively presented and emphasized that Gospel Ministry is the flower of pure worship. Can we but keep our worship pure and true, the ministry in natural sequence will bear its perfect fruit.

THE NATIONAL COUNCIL FOR LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS.

A REPLY TO FREDERIC W. WILE.

It is in my judgment usually bad policy to reply to an attack; nevertheless the National Council for the Limitation of Armaments is so young that the sincere friends of the movement might be disconcerted by an attack which was made upon it by the Washington correspondent of the Public Ledger in a recent issue. F. W. Wile is said to be a sincere friend of disarmament and is doubtless reliable usually in his statement of facts, but in this particular letter he is guilty of serious misrepresentation.

In the first place, his choice of seven organizations from the list that he had before him of those represented officially or unofficially at the meeting is misleading. He omitted the National League of Women Voters, the National Grange, the International Association of Machinists, the National Women's Trade Union League, the National Congress of Mothers and Parent-teachers' Associations, the Federation of Women's Boards of Foreign Missions, the Council of Women for Home Missions, the National Board of the Y. W. C. A., the American Legion, the American Union Against Militarism, the Fellowship of Reconciliation, the Foreign Policy Association, the Commission on International Justice and Goodwill of the Federal Council of Churches, the World Alliance, the Y. M. C. A., and the Intercollegiate Liberal League. An observer from the American Federation of Labor was also present. He also omitted to say that acceptances were received in addition from J. J. Burke of the National Catholic Welfare Council and Charles W. Holman of the National Board of Farm Organizations and the National Milk Producers' Federation. In other words, the gathering was not a meeting of fanatical zealots, but of representatives of all shades of public opinion in America, including the most conservative.

In the second place, what he gave out as private information was all contained in the minutes of the first meeting, which was held in Washington Ninth Month 8th, a full account of which was sent to the Press the next day. There has been nothing added to that program since. Compare the following statement of purpose with Wile's article; you will find it all here:

"The purpose of this Council shall be to unite and make articulate through the member-organizations the overwhelming sentiment of the people of the United States in favor of reduction of armaments.

"Specifically, its functions are:

"1. To suggest ways and means by which the work of the member-organizations shall be co-ordinated, duplication of prevented and unreachd territory covered.

"2. To co-operate with its constituent organizations and other agencies in maintaining an information service.

"3. To maintain co-operative relations with organizations in other countries having a similar purpose.

"4. To suggest to its member-organizations possible lines of action based upon the findings of its executive board.

"5. To organize and maintain an advisory board of experts in the fields of labor, economics, agriculture, government, international law and human welfare."

In the third place, F. W. Wile says that the Administration is disturbed lest harm may come from this movement. President Harding has repeatedly expressed the wish that the country might be aroused to the importance of the Washington conference. This movement is a sincere effort to bring about exactly this result. A similar movement, moreover, is going on in Great Britain under the leadership of the National Peace Council, which co-ordinates the work of twenty-five or thirty organizations and is building up a joint disarmament committee representative of a much wider circle. In Japan the International Service Bureau is a similar attempt at the co-ordination of at least a part of the disarmament sentiment of the country. Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, in an interview which he gave in London and which was reported in the New York Times of Ninth Month 14th, said: "It would be difficult to exaggerate the interest which both the governments and public opinion of Europe take in the coming Washington Conference on the Limitation of Armaments. Both the eyes and the heart of the world are fixed on that conference. If by any unhappy chance or if by interplay of mean and sordid motives that conference should fail to achieve President Harding's high purpose, I should not like my country to be held responsible for the economic, social and political disasters that might easily follow. Those who are leaders in finance, in commerce, in industry, and among the millions who work with their hands, should bring the whole force of their influence to bear to make the Washington conference successful and not permit it to drag out its weary length in futile theoretical discussions." The utterances of organized groups as well as individuals from all parts of the world are of similar tenor.

The people of the world are vitally interested in making the Washington conference a success. Dr. Butler's fear of "futile theoretical discussions" is grounded in history. An informed and alert electorate is the best safeguard of democracies.

The power of the National Council will lie, not in itself, but in the people back home, the ultimate rulers of America. Only as its members express their respective organizations will it even have influence.

I think that I have written enough to justify the existence of the National Council. As its temporary Executive Secretary, with temporary headquarters at 1811 I Street, Washington, D. C., in the parlor connected with the Friends' Meeting-house, I ask your moral and material support for the organization. Those who believe whole-heartedly in the progressive disarmament of the world will not hesitate, and will have no reason to hesitate, in giving us full support. Our sole aim, I repeat, is and will continue to be, to make the Conference on Limitation of Armaments a success.

FREDERICK J. LIBBY.

BOOK REVIEW.

"WHAT SHALL I THINK OF JAPAN."

This is the title of the latest book on the Far East and is most interesting and illuminating. The writer, George Gleason, Y. M. C. A. Secretary at Osaka, Japan, has been a resident in that country for nineteen years. He married a Friend. He vividly portrays the history of Japan since it was opened to the outside world. He deals with the political activities of the Nipponese government, its blunders and successes. The motives and processes leading up to the gradual absorption of portions of the mainland of Asia by Japan are revealed. The Korean rebellion with its wretched accompaniments and effects on the missionary life of Korea is narrated. Particularly informing are his references to the "Twenty-one Demands" on China, which demands in 1915 desperately threatened the latter country and were considered by many other nations as not being creditable to Japan.

The writer frankly discusses the international dealings of Japan. He explains some of them as imperative for the maintenance of the Japanese existence as a nation and as being founded on justice and international usage. He declares that Japan has simply imitated the grab policies of the Western peoples. Other dealings of successive ministries of Japan he does not attempt to explain or apologize for—some he deplores and condemns. He portrays the growth of militarism in the Empire—the struggle between the army and navy on the one hand and the increasing democratic sentiment of the country on the other.

The official position of George Gleason has afforded him unusual opportunities for studying conditions at first-hand. The book is replete with a fine lot of personal and other anecdotes illustrating the meaning of the author. The literary style is smooth and excellent. Many authoritative references appear in the appendixes to each chapter. Altogether this entertaining and useful book clears up numerous occasions of misunderstanding between America and Japan and may be of great value to both countries. It should have a wide reading. It is attractively bound in cloth, and is published by The Macmillan Company.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE OLD MAN'S STORY.—The old man sat in his arm chair beside the low door of his little cottage; before him lay the sunny streets of the beautiful village of Congénies, while all around him stretched the steep hillsides and the low slopes of vine-covered France. As the old man sat and gazed upon the rows of grapevines, terrace after terrace, hanging thick with purple clusters, he glanced now and then at the far hills and his face grew very thoughtful. Suddenly a light step was heard and a gay little laugh rang out; a smile lighted the old man's features as a little girl of six or thereabouts, dashed through the flower-covered gateway and up the stone path to the old man's chair.

"Well, petite Mignonne," said Pierre Rabinal, lifting the little maid gently to his knee. "And how art thou to-day? Hast thou come to cheer Friend Rabinal with thy chatter, or wouldst thou like to have him tell to thee a true tale of which I was even now thinking when thou didst arrive?"

"O Friend Rabinal, tell it to me!" and the dark eyes lifted in confident entreaty and the little one settled down in happy expectancy for the story that was to come.

The old man looked once more at the distant hills; "Seest thou," he said, pointing with his hand, "the steep hillside there far back upon the North? My story goes back to that hill and so long ago as the time when there were forests thick around it, and not so many houses here as now; our village of Congénies was very small indeed; only a few people had settled here and wild beasts were still about, lurking in the woods and sometimes fiercely attacking people.

"I was a younger man in those days, and strong and happy; we were never rich, my little one, in this world's goods, but I was ever blessed above measure by the protecting care and the loving presence of the good God. Thou knowest He cares for us every one—if only we will put our trust in Him. Well have I cause to know it, as my story will show to thee, Mignonne.

"I was in those days engaged to work for my neighbors around here; I pruned the grapevines and helped keep their vineyards in order. Besides this I had a small vineyard all my own which I had bought out on the hill thou seest; here I worked in the evenings, sometimes far into the night, for many things were needed for my Jeanne and the little ones—as thy father finds they are needed to-day for thyself and thy brothers.

"One night, it being bright moonlight, I could see to work quite late, and I was busy trimming and digging about my vines, when suddenly I heard a strange noise; looking up I saw close upon me a big wolf: its eyes were glistening and its mouth was open showing fierce, hungry-looking teeth. I knew that food was scarce that season, and that hunger had made the wolves very bold. I was all alone—no one could hear me if I cried for help—no one?—and I knew I was not really alone, for One was with me who had promised to protect His children at all times. Throwing down my grubbing hoe, I knelt down right there before that wild hungry beast and prayed to my Heavenly Father to save me. Thou rememberest how He saved Daniel from the lions; I was more afraid than I think Daniel was, but I soon got up from my knees, and taking up my grubbing-hoe, I looked straight at the ravenous wolf. I knew that I must not turn my eyes away or he would spring upon me, and that I must get back here to my home as quickly as possible; the hill is full a mile away; there was no road as thou seest now—only a stony path—if I stumbled and fell the wolf would be upon me; yet I walked that whole way backward, step by step—the beast following close to me, snarling and gnashing his teeth. At last, when I was almost here, there came a sudden noise in the woods, and the wolf being frightened, turned and with a last snarl at me, leaped away into the bushes.

"Thou mayst be sure I lost no time after that in reaching this house where I closed my door tight, and then what thinkest thou I did? Thou knowest surely that I fell upon my knees and gave thanks to my loving Father in Heaven who had stayed the mouth of the wild beast and had preserved His servant to reach home in safety.

"My child," here the old man turned to look upon the face lifted to his in childish awe, and his eyes were full of tears,—"My child, trust Him always; He is good to His children; He will be their help and their protection from all danger."

"CANDLES UNTIL THE DAWN."

[John French Wilson is not a stranger to a number of our readers. He is a Westonian and the husband of another (Anna Brinton). His poetical gift has won a place for him in Contemporary Verse, the All-Poetry Magazine for America. J. Passmore Elkinton suggests that we re-print the following from that magazine. We have their permission to do so, and also that of the author. The main caption is printed above, the sub-caption before each poem.—EDS.]

WE MEAN TO KEEP.

We mean to keep the rafters of old oak,
The graveled paths, the walls of good gray stone,
The sunlit rooms that smell of clean wood smoke,
The joys of lawns well watered and neatly mown.
We mean to keep them for our very own
And for our children's children's heritage,
Even if we and they must stand alone
Against the communism of an Age;
Yes, even if the very hands that wage
Unwarranted and suicidal war
Shall learn to cherish that which stirs their rage,
Forgetful of the things they battled for.
Thus may some beauty live, or have new birth,
And shall not perish utterly from the earth.

CLOUDS WITHOUT WATER.

The time has come for us who know the worth
Of stable things to speak out what we know:—
That no good thing can come of lawless birth
And every change is ill that is not slow.
That wrong endures while systems come and go,
And right survives the cruellest conqueror;
That nothing stands against the undertow
Which swallows back the broken waves of war,
But all returns to what it was before
And each new freedom breeds its million slaves;
And they who die to win it do no more
Than gird the planet with a row of graves.
Thus do the grinning gods of discontent
Deliver their profound arbitrament.

NOT FROM THE HILLS.

The Gods of Discontent would set us free
 From every bond of which free men are proud.
 They would unbind the slaves of Property
 To chain them to the chariot of the Crowd.
 They are the gods that ride with storm and cloud
 To knock in the dead of night on bolted doors;
 They are the gods whom men hear laughing loud
 And hideously, behind the smoke of wars.
 Not from the hills, but from the barren shores
 Of sluggish and untraveled seas they come
 With monstrous mutterings and guttural roars
 And thigh-bones beating on a snake-skin drum;
 Finding it good to see a black world swing
 Eternally around a starless ring.

BACK FROM THE WIND-BLOWN DESERT.

Let the old faiths be kept. There is no light
 In any land unless old fires burn
 Upon inviolate hearths. Eternal Right
 May lie too deep for any man to learn.
 We cry aloud for Justice; but we yearn
 For Might to break all things to our desire.
 Back from the wind-blown desert let us turn,
 Back to the only everlasting fire
 Of home and love; to joy that does not tire,
 Knowing the touch of dear accustomed things;
 Back to the lesser dreams whose long empire
 Outlasts the dream of Commissars and Kings.
 So shall we waken as from troubled sleep
 With new faith born of the old faith we keep.

THE APPEAL OF THE MOTHERS OF RUSSIA.

Russian mothers have appealed to the other mothers of the entire civilized world pleading that their children may be saved even though they must die. There is no higher spirit of sacrifice than this. It has something of the touch of the Christ in it. "He saved others, Himself He cannot save." "Greater love hath no man nor woman than this, that they lay down their lives that their own may live."

The Russian newspaper published in Prague has given the message from the mothers in Russia:—

"We Russian mothers who are destined to die this winter from starvation and disease, implore the people of the whole world to take our children from us, that those who are innocent may not share our horrible fate. We implore the world to do this because, even at the cost of a voluntary and eternal separation, we long to repair the wrong we have committed in giving them a life which is worse than death. All of you who have children or who have lost children, all of you who have children and fear to lose them, in remembrance of the children who are dead and in the name of those who are still living we beseech you! Have pity upon our children! Do not think of us; we cannot be helped. We have lost all hope, but we shall yet be happy with the only happiness that a mother knows in the knowledge that her child is safe!"

"ARTS AND CRAFTS" AND THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

One of the more interesting departments of the work of the English and American Relief Mission of the Society of Friends in Vienna is that which calls itself "Arts and Crafts." By conducting a small permanent exhibit and sale of laces, embroideries, and works of art in the busy offices of the Mission in the Singerstrasse, by supplying scores of artists and craftsmen with the costly materials from which articles of use and beauty are made or woven with rare skill and taste and pains, and by offering special and unique displays of the work of these people, upon whom the blight and economic distress of the war has fallen with a heavy hand, at prominent places of the city during the days of large conventions or fairs which bring an extraordinary number of strangers to Austria's beautiful capital, this unique relief work enables scores of talented artists and dozens of families of intelligence and refinement to continue to maintain a decent standard of existence and to continue to make the world more beautiful by the artistic products of their hands in the face of a steadily sinking currency and of prices that have doubled and trebled in arithmetic ratio as the months have passed until the cost of living is now almost two hundred times what it was in 1914.

Some of the most skilful artists and craftsmen of Vienna welcome the opportunity which the Friends' Mission offers them of displaying and selling their work and of obtaining the full amount of whatever price it brings, without commission or deduction. Visitors to the offices of the Friends repeatedly express their astonishment at the beauty of the embroideries and laces and art-goods of a great variety of design and application which may be found there. This department has just concluded an exhibit of the work of forty-odd craftsmen in its rooms at the Hofburg—the palace of the former emperors—during the week of the Vienna "Messe." Over a million kronen (approximately one thousand dollars) were received during the week of this sale and divided among the different exhibitors and artists who were in personal attendance and were thus able to make valuable friends and business connections with visitors from abroad. An order was received from a Dutch merchant for a million kronen worth of hand-knitted sweaters by one of the ladies who had brought a few samples of her work to the exhibit, and this order will not only serve to maintain her and her family throughout many months to come, but will also provide employment for ten or twenty other women who will fulfil the order as rapidly as the work can be accomplished. Another exhibitor, a manufacturer of small wooden toys of unique design, received an order from a foreign visitor for four hundred and fifty thousand kronen worth of his creations, while over thirty other exhibitors sold thirty thousand kronen worth each. So gratifying a result would not have been possible without the assistance of the Society of Friends, because the cost of renting shops and studios has become prohibitive for many of the most talented craftsmen of Vienna whose work has made the city famous.

TO THE QUAKERS.

Because you loved all children so,
 You came to children you did not know.
 You brought us love and you brought us food,
 And we who tasted have found them good.
 And many a little German face
 Now lifts to the sun its childish grace,
 Because of the friends they did not know,
 Who came because they loved children so.

THE teachings of the Gospel live and move and have their being in a plane of their own. The values they reveal and exalt are values for the soul, not to be measured by earthly standards. . . . He who does justice and loves mercy and seeks the good of others no less than his own will bring the right spirit to his public as well as his own private duties. If ever that spirit pervades a whole nation, it will be a Christian nation as none has ever yet been.—LORD BRYCE.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

EXTRACT FROM LONDON MEETING FOR SUFFERINGS STATEMENT.

"The Society of Friends is looking forward hopefully to the day of Universal Disarmament. While making no abatement in our testimony on this point, we welcome all steps in that direction.

"... We are thankful to know that President Harding is pursuing so earnestly the question of a Naval Conference.

"... It would seem important, however, that the nations themselves might, with manifest advantages, mark the beginning of the work of this Commission by declaring a naval holiday until its Report is before the public. The whole world is sick and weary of war and its aftermath of violence, suffering and hatred. The declaration of such a holiday would instil new life into millions of sorrowing people."

UNITED STATES PEACE PLAN IN 1914.

Peace people often fail to give credit to their government for its right efforts. Here is something to be proud of:—

Letters of the late Walter H. Page, just published, give for the first time the story of an attempt made by President Wilson to get Germany and England to agree to a disarmament plan in 1914, before the outbreak of the World War. Walter H. Page was U. S. Ambassador to Great Britain from 1913 to 1918.

Colonel House, the President's confidential adviser, went to Germany in Sixth Month, 1914, to try to interest the Kaiser in a plan for the three nations, England, Germany and the United States, to reduce armies and navies by an agreement. He found Germany seething with military spirit and no one in authority willing to help a plan to abolish war. In England his errand aroused almost as little interest, but for a different reason. There the thought of war was so far from the minds of all that none believed there was immediate danger. And this was less than two months before the outbreak of the Great War!—Current Events.

THE UNITED STATES REDUCED ITS ARMY.

Recent information comes from Washington that there are now approximately 6,000,000 men in the armies of fourteen of the most important nations of the world. France has one million men under arms, China more than one million, Great Britain 740,000, Italy 350,000, Japan 300,000 and so on. The United States has only 149,000, not counting the National Guard, which is very few more than we had in 1917, so that we may fairly consider that our country has practically demobilized, in spite of the fact that no other great nation has done so, except Germany, which has been requested to reduce its forces to 100,000.

JAMES BRYCE ON DEMOCRATIC DIPLOMACY AND INDIVIDUAL MORAL STANDARDS.

"... there arise from time to time certain broad and comparatively simple issues on which the people ought to be consulted before any irrevocable step is taken and on which the judgment of the people is more likely to be right than that of the ministers or officials who are conducting the negotiations. The people, if not fevered by passion, may have a sounder view of what is or is not worth fighting for than a set of officials, steeped in their traditions or prejudices. The people may have a clearer sense of what is just and fair, and a greater willingness to settle disputes peacefully than governing classes have usually shown. Public opinion is curious or apathetic about foreign relations partly because they are kept so much from public knowledge."

"Much more might be done than is done in Europe to keep the people informed and enable them to express their opinion on the lines of policy to which they are being committed. The first thing and the indispensable thing needed to enable the people to control those large issues of foreign affairs which they ought to determine is to give them more knowledge and more continuously active interest. Such an interest, such a participation should on the whole make against aggression and would tend to raise the moral standard by which the international action of states has been hitherto regulated."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

At the suggestion, we believe, of the Bishop of Woolwich, a course of lectures is being given next month to united gatherings of the Church of England and the Free Churches at Blackheath (London, S. E.) on "What the Churches Stand For." Besides lectures on the Established Church, there will be addresses on the Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists and Quakers. The latter subject will be dealt with by Edward Grubb, M. A., author of "What is Quakerism?" "Authority and the Light Within," and many other works.

H. W. PEET.

The following is from the speech of Samuel Hill at the laying of the cornerstone of the Peace Portal at Blaine, Washington: "War satisfies neither the victors nor the vanquished. Perfect peace alone satisfies. The instincts of human-kind have not changed by education and only slightly modified by religion. When war holds sway there are no religions. The dominant, though not the most widely accepted religion made its way by non-resistance. All great movements must so proceed if they are destined to prevail."

AUSTIN C. LEEDS is interested with other Friends in circulating some neatly printed cards in regard to disarmament. The first of them has Luke ii: 14 in bold type: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill toward men." The second is a call for daily meditation and prayer on this text as the best means to reinforce the President in the approaching Conference.

NOTICES.

GURNEY and ELIZABETH J. S. BINFORD are now in the Philadelphia district. They will be glad to address meetings in the interest of Japan. They can be reached by addressing J. C. Collins, Haverford, Pa.

The Yearly Meeting's Extension Committee desires some forceful statements of about 750 words regarding Christian fundamentals. If Christ is the Master of our lives we should be able to tell others what He is like. Manuscripts will be respected as confidential if so requested, but we believe that it will be possible from the consecrated effort of several authors to obtain material of wide usefulness. Please send material to the Secretary, at 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE autumn meeting of the Friends' Educational Association will be held at Westtown School, Westtown, Penna., on Seventh-day, Tenth Month 29th, at 3 P. M. Mary H. Lewis of the Park School, Buffalo, New York, will deliver the address. Her subject will be "Ideals, Aims and Results of the Park School Experiment in Education." This will be followed by a discussion on some of the problems of progressive education. In the evening, at 7.30 o'clock, all are invited to listen to an address, given under the auspices of the School, by Raymond Robins of Chicago, social economist and industrial expert. Following the afternoon meeting there will be opportunity for a stroll about the Westtown Campus. Supper will be served in the School dining-room, to which all those present are invited. Transportation will be furnished, free of charge, to and from Westtown Station.

HAJOCA BATH

With clean water waste

With the use of tile and Hajoca present-day plumbing, many a residence built a decade or more ago can be made equal in sanitary equipment to the luxurious new residence.

This beautiful built-in porcelain enameled bath is admirably suited for such remodeled work. There are no spaces under or back of the bath to collect dust or moisture.

The fixture is distinctive for its sanitary features and inviting appearance.

Visit our showrooms. This will materially help in any remodeling you contemplate.

AMBASSADOR ROLAND S. MORRIS

SAID:

"When I first went to Japan as ambassador, I was naturally limited by my unfamiliarity with Japanese ways. Gilbert Bowles was among those whom I often had occasion to consult and he never failed me. With his experience and keen insight, he invariably helped me to a better understanding.

"Sometimes people at home doubt whether it is worth while to continue the missionary work in Japan, where only a few individuals out of the teeming millions seem to be Christianized. Those doubters at home do not fully appreciate the value of an idea as a force. Japanese life has been tremendously affected by the ideas of early Buddhist missionaries promulgated centuries ago. Today Japanese life is being profoundly affected by the influence of the splendid Christian missionaries who have devotedly given their lives toward the work in Japan. The status of Japanese women is changing. A beautiful home life is developing throughout the country. The Christian missionary-statesman of the type of GILBERT BOWLES is needed more than ever. I wish to express my appreciation to you as a body for having helped to make it possible for Gilbert Bowles to be in Japan."

THE NEED OF AN ANCHOR.

The Scripture counsel against being carried away with divers and strange teachings is applicable in no small degree at the present time, and the need for the heart to be established by grace is as real now as ever it was. While it is likely that most of those who may read this paper are not much affected by the claims or pretensions of certain cults and "isms" which often attract the curious and the credulous, it is of consequence that our minds be on the watch against those specious influences which lay waste rather than build up, or which prevent an establishment in that which is immutably true.

The road which many have traveled in their search for Truth has been, it is true, a long and devious one; and if some whose faces are honestly turned Zionward are still under a cloud of error, it is not for us to set at naught their endeavors or their attainments. That which may be an occasion for concern, however, is that Christian people should relinquish any real good or real truth which they have known and believed in, and substitute something more "gaudy in appearance," but less satisfying in its nature. If convictions are loosened and then displaced by mere opinions or "winds of doctrine," the lost ground may not be easily measured nor always quickly recovered. Those who are in possession of a faith growing out of "the revealing of the Power of Immortality," do not on that account close their eyes against a growing vision, an enlarging view of the Divine purposes, but their safety and their service depend upon their keeping to that revealing, preserving Power.

It was an expression in George Fox's time that such and such persons "received the Truth in the love of it;" and how often we find the satisfying evidence and assurance that they "continued faithful." With beautiful simplicity Mary Penington records her own experience: "The Lord hath many a time refreshed my soul with His presence, and given me an assurance that I knew that state which He will never leave nor suffer me to be drawn from. Though infirmities beset me, my heart cleaveth to the Lord, in the everlasting bond that cannot be broken." And Isaac Penington, in terms less personal, exhorts the Friends at Chalfont to dwell in their habitations and feed on the food that the Lord would bring them. "So be not shaken or disquieted by the wisdom of the flesh; but feel that which settleth and establisheth in the pure power."

But apart from these considerations, we need stability of mind and a steady faith in order to stand against some of the influences that crowd upon us from "the strain and stress" of the times, and to maintain the standards of Christianity in the midst of the shakings now going on. We look with anxiety, if not with dismay, at the efforts being made to turn the achievements and discoveries of men into channels of human destruction, and we see the forces of evil seemingly joined in the abasement of good and serviceable gifts. But as it is not a time for apathy and inertness on our part, neither is it a time for despair, since the powers of evil cannot be finally supreme; yet, while using our endeavors to counteract their present activities, it is important that we see our right place and service.

Again, it is no easy matter to adjust ourselves rightly to the changing conditions about us, reference to which seems but a commonplace. We are emphatically in an era of activities and transitions, many of which are incident to the real progress of the world; but how to preserve poise and composure and discrimination in the midst of them is a question of some moment, "The still dews of quietness" are needed again and again, and they must be looked for in the interior life. Perhaps every period of advancement has seemed remarkable to many of the people who lived in it, and no doubt there have often been some who were disturbed at the outlook. There may have been something of "rush" and "clamor," let us say, in John Woolman's time, slow and quiet in many ways as that looks to us now,—though movements of tremendous consequence were taking place, too. Fundamentally, then, that age was not very unlike our own, and some of John Woolman's observations have a perpetual fitness: "To provide things relative to our outward living, in the way of true wisdom, is good, and the gift of improving in things useful is a good gift, and comes from the Father of Lights." Seeing, however, that such gifts were sometimes perverted, and inventions turned to a wrong account, he feels it necessary for all "constantly to attend on the heavenly gift, to be qualified to use rightly the good things in this life amidst great improvements."

Whatever, therefore, be the subject to which our interests and activities are related, we cannot have a better rule of life than that which John Woolman enjoined himself to observe: "Remember then, O my soul! the quietude of those in whom Christ governs, and in all thy proceedings feel after it."

"VERY FEW PEOPLE REALLY MEAN TO DO WRONG—IN A DEEP SENSE. THEY ONLY DON'T KNOW WHAT THEY ARE ABOUT." Even at the time of the world's greatest tragedy, Jesus was able to see that His death was due to ignorance. "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."—ERNEST E. UNWIN.

THE DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE—LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

Now that the Conference on Disarmament is assured, we may look upon it as a great light set over a darkened world. For though it is practical, little will be accomplished unless it is suffused with the Divine spirit of love and renunciation. Those who see it in its true significance must behold this spirit shining through all its being and acts. Out of "The Shadow" it emerges, sending its rays of hope and trust over the future. Below it the peoples of earth prostrate themselves in prayer for deliverance; while above it an invisible host of heaven, "the dead that have not died in vain," wait the fulfillment that must not fail. At last, in the history of a tried and troubled humanity, Power assembles to humble itself.

There is deep meaning in the fact that this is a practical effort to assist the coming of peace. It is true a certain wide scope is given by the inclusion of Far Eastern problems—but the intent plainly is to discover and disclose only the "relations" that nations should bear to each other that would avoid war. There are no problems of reparation and restitution. No new States are to be formed. Questions of the form of government that peoples should adopt are not involved. Governments in their political nature are to be lightly bound by the agreements to be reached. Peoples rather than autonomies are meeting to resolve to lay down their arms and unite in good-will and faith.

There must be throughout the world a thrill of joy at this procedure. Fear must cower into the darkness of oblivion. Hope must wing its flight into the sun of righteousness. The "Four Horsemen," halted on the precipice of barbarism, must retreat in headlong haste, borne backward by their own negation into the lost regions where torture forever dwells alone with terror. Death, famine, pestilence, know not peace. Generations unborn will rise up to call this Conference blessed—if only it shall be true to itself. And those of to-day who toil endlessly only to find their efforts cast into the furnace of hate and poverty will take new courage as they feel the benignity of fellowship cover the yearning earth.

No less than this, though we express it lamely, follows! This Conference is ideal because it is practical. Long ago Virgil wrote, "I sing of Arms and the Hero." Not so long ago Edwin Arnold wrote the epics of two saviors of the world—Heroes devoid of Arms. And we must see in this assembling of Powers, the Spirit of Sacrifice, if Public Opinion is at last to triumph over Diplomacy, and, we dare to say, Preparedness. Too long the Hero has been Militarism. Too long the ruler has been Government, acting in its own belief that the only way to secure peace is through ability to war. The peoples of earth welcome as never before the coming of peace through the destruction of the ability to make war!

As we look with infinite regret upon the red-flowing rivers of wrath that stain the past, so must we behold in this Conference the creation of the Fountain of Peace that shall fill the rivers of the future, watering many lands with help and harmony. No language is fulsome in praise of this effort, if only the feeling heart of mankind shall await upon its word. At every fireside, remote and near, true religion must kneel in devout prayer that selfishness shall not cross the doorway of this Council, that petty advantage shall not restrain magnanimity, that the will to do shall find the way, the easy way of the spirit.

Of a truth, this Conference is the greatest thing in the world. Humanity cannot go on in this mad orgy of war. The workman cannot work without tools; the warrior cannot kill without weapons. One step taken away from the bottomless pit of Destruction and the journey to Construction is begun. If the States of this world are ever totally disarmed the peoples that maintain them will never consent to the waste of a single dollar in warfare. Mankind has been too much concerned with the technique of peace, with agreements of Governments, with proportions of power; now—this Conference faces the Spirit of Peace!

And this Spirit of Peace is a combination of will and love to prevent war by no less a practical method than disarmament. What does disarmament mean if it be not that Governments shall be prevented from nurturing the power to make war? Can people arm themselves for "murder by wholesale" that have empty hands and empty treasuries that will not vote debts upon generations unborn and waste their own substance, by appeals to the use of Force—that always ends in settlement by cessation and compromise? Let the world acclaim this Conference for what it is—an effort to establish the reign of the Spirit of Peace by reducing the material means of war.—From The Commercial and Financial Chronicle of New York. (Submitted by Marriott C. Morris.)

JAPAN NOTES.

Encouraging accounts of Gilbert Bowles have come to us through recent letters. He has spent the past summer in a small village by the sea in the north of the island, living much in the open and leading a very quiet life. He returns to work in Tokio with renewed health and vigor. Minnie P. Bowles has passed much of her vacation in ministering to the needs of the sick in Tokio, going back and forth as the calls came to give comfort to the sorrowing and spiritual and material help to others.

Ryu Sato San has been very ill all summer with typhoid fever. She is somewhat better, but does not improve as rapidly as could be desired.

Work is being started on the new Tokio Meeting-house and on the addition to the girls' school building. These additions will greatly facilitate the task of housing the large First-day School, and will give adequate recitation rooms for the students in the day school.

Esther B. and Margaret Rhoads arrived in Japan in Ninth Month and are now on the Mission Compound, studying the language and making themselves generally useful. Wistar Wood on his way to China stopped in Japan and visited Thomas E. Jones in Mito and Karuizawa.

The long-hoped-for plan of Thomas E. Jones has materialized in a Christian dormitory in Mito for students of the Junior College. A house was rented large enough to accommodate twelve, and the first week it was opened there were eight students accepted. "Others have expressed a desire to come in later if room can be made for them."

A second son, Canby, was born to Thomas and Esther Jones in Ninth Month.

THE MISSIONARY AS PEACEMAKER.

At a time when, in the judgment of many, the future peace of the world is largely dependent on the maintenance of good relations between Japan and the United States, it is interesting to recall that a powerful force for peace has for years been exercised in Japan by Gilbert Bowles, an American Quaker missionary.

Recently, in recognition of his restoration to health after a long and serious illness, Gilbert Bowles was the guest at an important reception at Tokio and the recipient of a fine painting of the world-famed mountain of Fujiyama. "Barons and viscounts vied with one another in praising the Quaker missionary and his accomplished wife," says an enthusiastic reporter. Marquis Okuma, former President of the (Peace) Society, the last of the Elder Statesmen, and repeatedly Prime Minister, was prevented from coming, but sent a letter of warm appreciation.

Gilbert Bowles is the chief originator of the Peace Society in Japan, composed mainly of Americans and Europeans resident in Japan; and in religious, social and international activities he has done invaluable work in striving to interpret the great nations of the East and West to one another. Some time ago he was described by Dr. W. T. Ellis in the New York Outlook as "the model missionary" and "the American Apostle of Peace in Japan."—Taken from Workers at Home and Abroad, for Tenth Month, 1921.

THE DISAGREEABLE.

"And Samaria," (Acts i: 8).

"And ye shall be my witnesses both in Jerusalem and in all Judea, and Samaria and unto the uttermost parts of the earth." These words form a part of Christ's last words unto His disciples and part of His last effort to help them realize the enormity of responsibility which was to be theirs in the days which were to follow.

To be Christ's witnesses in Jerusalem may have seemed an easy task, but the stoning of Stephen is at least proof that the very centre of Judaism was not in sympathy with the message which the disciples were commissioned to give. It was Jerusalem and its indifference which called forth the disappointed cry from Christ Himself when He said: "How often would I."

... but ye would not." But the disciples were at home in Jerusalem and in Judea, much of the territory had been traversed in company with Christ Himself—they had seen His methods of work among these people, and a living example is very energizing. But when He said to them "And Samaria," these words must have fallen like a dead weight upon them. "The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans" was as true with the disciples as with the others. Only a short while before this two of them—and those two James and John—had wanted to call down fire from heaven and destroy a Samaritan village—if they could—and all because they had been unable to secure a night's lodging. This was because the disciples' "faces were turned toward Jerusalem," which shows the animosity no less vital on the Samaritan side.

"And unto the uttermost parts of the earth" was a prophecy which the Christian Church has not yet adequately fulfilled. It seems strange how long these world-wide assertions of Christ were overlooked or at least neglected. It is this generation which is really thoroughly awakened to its duty to those who sit in darkness and have not yet seen a great light. "The evangelization of the world in this generation" has become the slogan—"May these things be." Sometimes distance lends enchantment and to work for our brothers who are in foreign lands is easier than to work with and for our next door neighbor. It was no doubt such a situation as this which confronted the disciples in the words "and Samaria." As a matter of fact they did not go to Samaria until persecution in Jerusalem made them have to scatter abroad. Philip, you will remember, had a great revival here. Peter and John were sent up to establish the work. So that when it was ended Samaria proved a fruitful field for the evangelist. Was not this condition the outgrowth of the work of Christ Himself in the midst of these people beginning as he did with the woman at the well and enhanced by her call to her fellows to "come and see?"

This Biblical setting is a most interesting study, but we must also concern ourselves with its application to us. Have we each found our Samaria? Do we know the thing which we would least like to do and yet which ought to be done by us? Have we determined the disagreeable thing which must needs be done by us?—and by no other? Then we know our Samaria and the "and Samaria" must not be omitted or overlooked or neglected. Shall we wait till persecution, the closing of the opportunity in Jerusalem and Judea shall drive us to our task? If so, we may not find ourselves so successful as was Philip. There is no church, no community, no business, but what has its disagreeable parts. Those who hope to sail through life without drudgery are seeking that which even Christ Himself could not or did not avoid. The high places and the nice places may be pleasing to those who love to go through life with a blare of trumpet and the noise of drum, but the gracious spirit which loves to go to Samaria even, which loves to work unseen, which loves to bear the worst end of the burden—these are the shining ones after all. Would that the Church had more of them.

"And ye shall be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria and unto the uttermost parts of the earth." What sort of witnessing are we doing at home, among our neighbors, before those who, like the Samaritans, have false truths and seem to us as heretical? Those who have some religion, as those Samaritans had, are the hardest to work with, and many may who read this be glad to be counted worthy to do the disagreeable thing and be glad to work among those who to us are comparable to the Samaritans.—JULIA S. WHITE, in The American Friend of Ninth Month 29th. Reprinted with the author's permission.

GUILFORD COLLEGE, North Carolina.

SOME OF OUR QUAKER PERIODICALS.*

According to the records of the Haverford College Library there have been received there some sixty-four different Quaker periodicals, of which 27 are being issued at the present time. Of these twenty-seven survivals (may we hope of the fittest!) eight are published in England, three in the British Colonies (The Australasian Friend, The Canadian Friend, and the South African Ambassador, though this last is actually issued from London), and the remaining sixteen in the United States. This is not a complete list: India and Japan, and now Germany, have their papers and there are also several periodicals issued on the "fringe" of the Society. The newest is The Quaker, published in Burlington, 1920; the oldest THE FRIEND (now in its ninety-fifth year.)

It would be manifestly impossible to describe exhaustively each of the twenty-seven varieties, and I am limiting myself to six—three English and three American.

The English publications: Friends' Quarterly Examiner, appearing as its name indicates, four times a year. Friends' Fellowship Papers, a bi-monthly. The Friend [London], published every week.

The American papers, all appearing weekly: The American Friend; The Friends' Intelligencer; THE FRIEND (Philadelphia, sometimes called the "Square Friend.")

A word as to the characteristics of each of these six.

The Quarterly Examiner is, of course, the most dignified and scholarly of the lot, though that by no means is meant to imply that its thoughtful, often learned articles are stuffy or dry, or that there is lacking that quiet humor of the sort that never causes a laugh, but frequently a gentle chuckle of appreciation. The articles are longer than those in any of the other publications, and the subjects can be treated more exhaustively and carefully. It is a Quaker Atlantic Monthly, and of tremendous value to the Society. I find it too little known among American Friends, even those who love good reading for its own sake.

Let me read you a cross-section of the table of contents:

Halcyon Days in Cambridgeshire—a Naturalists' observations.

Treasure Trove from Germany, by Wm. C. Braithwaite, recently returned.

Five Articles in a symposium entitled: The Basis of Membership in the Society of Friends.

How is History Written?

The Value of Personality in relation to Property.

September in Somerset.

An article by Dr. Henry J. Cadbury, of Harvard, and three others, equally thoughtful and stimulating. It contains 108 pages—the articles varying from five to twelve pages each, the majority being about nine.

The Friends' Fellowship Papers have been appearing now for about fourteen years, every other month, first as the organ of the London Young Friends' Committee, but since the Jordans Conference in Eighth Month, 1920, as that of the Young Friends' Movement the world over. This fact should make it indispensable to any who have any serious interest in the Society. The articles are shorter than those in The Examiner, usually "snappier," if I may use the expression, and almost exclusively written from the point of view of thirty-five and under, though happily not quite always, for there are from time to time utterances by sympathetic older persons which are of inestimable value to the concerned younger membership. Like certain brands of ready-to-wear clothes, the Fellowship Papers are for young Friends and "those who stay young."

The Friend [London] is the weekly organ of London Yearly Meeting and performs much the same functions for English Friends as do the three American weeklies. The fact that they are all one body officially, in England (except for the little General Meeting of Fritchley) and a still smaller group, (which sub-divided itself from these Friends) enables one weekly to serve all the membership—indeed, The Friend is generally taken in, as they say over there, even by the conservative Friends above alluded to, who have never, as far as I know, published any paper of their own which was in any way their organ, even semi-officially. The Friend [London] has much of interest to those who have been to England and know English Friends and their conditions and problems—I myself am subscribing for all three of these English papers this year, but the scope of The Friend is necessarily much more limited than that of the other two, and its appeal on this side of the ocean would, I should suppose, be less, though as a matter of fact, I expect more American Friends know The Friend [London] than know either of the other publications we have been discussing.

Now to our own weeklies; all of them, till recently, published within a few squares of each other in Philadelphia, though now The American Friend is issued from Richmond—the "vatican" of the Five Years' Meeting of which it is the organ. The Friends' Intelligencer represents the Yearly Meeting at Fifteenth and Race Streets, and the seven affiliated Yearly Meetings which make up what is known as the "General Conference," held, I think, biennially. THE FRIEND (Philadelphia), the dean of all our Quaker periodicals, having appeared continuously since 1828, is not in any sense an official publication, but it represents the Yearly Meeting at Fourth and Arch Streets, and circulates as well pretty generally among the conservative Yearly Meetings (seven in number) in Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, North Carolina, New England and Canada.

Whatever may have been the causes which prompted the original launching of these three weekly papers, it can be said of all three of them that they are looking beyond the bounds which each technically represents, towards that larger Quakerism which is greater and higher than the mere sum of all its parts. Each of the three papers stands, too, for all that is best in its particular and special blend of Quakerism: The Intelligencer, liberal and tolerant of the honest opinion of every one, prints fearlessly a long letter from "Bill" Simpson; The American Friend, representing the great Five Years' Meeting, zealous and eager, and ever mindful of our responsibility for others, reflects that warm interest and zeal in its pages. THE FRIEND, of which I must speak discreetly, as I happen to be a member of the Board of Editors, stands, we trust, on that solid foundation laid two centuries and a-half ago on the one Rock, and strives to keep true to that which the early Friends re-discovered, and at the same time to keep always alert to those "new duties" which are forever being taught by new occasions. A. L.

(To be concluded.)

OLD BOOKS AT ARCH STREET CENTRE.

New steel shelving has recently been placed in the basement vault of Arch Street Centre, to accommodate the increasing volume of working stock of books on sale at the Bookstore.

There is in this vault and elsewhere in the basement a large number of old books and pamphlets which do not seem to be in demand; some of them were left on consignment many years ago; many are from second and third floors of the old Bookstore.

The following list is published in order that any persons who may have a right claim on any of them may remove them.

It is expected that if the owners or their representatives do not within a reasonable time claim these publications, the Book Committee of the Representative Meeting will make such disposition of the material as in its judgment seems wise.

HUBERT W. PEET, the assiduous English correspondent for Friends, enables us to quote the Expository Times in regard to T. Edmund Harvey's Swarthmore Lecture, as follows:—"Do not miss a single volume of the Swarthmore Lectures. They are, of course, Quaker lectures and they are often quite Quakerish. But when most occupied with the Quakers, they are most instructive—so near the mind of Christ is that Faith at its finest."

ROLAND S. MORRIS ON THE JAPANESE SITUATION.*

Roland S. Morris is a keen student of affairs and a speaker of great force and fluency and charm of manner. His address presented the case for the continuance of missionary effort in Japan, particularly on the part of Friends, most convincingly. As his subject matter was to some extent personal, it seems best to present this imperfect abstract in the first person.

"I am very glad of the opportunity to speak to this committee of the Philadelphia Friends' Foreign Missionary Association, to give my testimony to the value of the work which is being done in Japan under your auspices. In fact, I feel a debt of gratitude because of the importance to me of the help and advice of Gilbert Bowles during my stay in Japan.

"The time of my arrival was an especially critical one. The whole Orient was in ferment. In China there had lately been a revolution which had almost reduced that nation to chaos. The Russian revolution had lately passed through the stage which had brought to the front the most dangerous element of her people, and this troubled state of affairs had involved Siberia. Having come out with but slender preparation, I was heavily handicapped by lack of experience and knowledge. The probable attitude of the Japanese toward the various problems with which I was confronted was impossible for me to estimate. Under these circumstances I soon found that Gilbert Bowles was the best adviser to be had in Tokio.

"He carries on most worthily the tradition of the missionary statesmen of the early days. Some of these men went to Japan upon the great wave of missionary enthusiasm which followed our Civil War, and were already active before the revolution of 1867 which deposed the Shogunate and restored the Imperial House. Hepburn published the first English-Japanese dictionary. Verbeck was for years the confidential adviser of the Government in many lines, especially in educational matters. With these should be mentioned Brown and Davis, who aided greatly in the introduction of Western ideals in education as well as in religion. The college founded in the sacred city of Kyoto in this early period was the mother of the whole family of Japanese institutions of higher learning.

"The circumstances under which these developments took place were highly favorable. Representatives of the other Western powers who were in Japan had more or less interest in matters of trade. The market of the Orient were important to them. American capital and enterprise, however, were so concentrated on the task of developing the great West that they had no interest beyond the Pacific. It was only these men, whose errand was purely altruistic who included the trans-Pacific field in the scope of their interest and activity, and thus laid the foundation of the traditional friendships between the people of Japan and the United States of which we hear so much.

"Within the last two decades with the increase of our surplus of manufactured goods, the markets of the East have assumed an importance to us which they did not before possess. With the increase of trade contacts, it becomes increasingly difficult to maintain the high standard which the earlier relations had set. There can be no friction without contact, and now that the contact was established, it became the continual task of such men as Gilbert Bowles to explain to the Japanese why things are not as they used to be. This he is particularly well qualified to do. The men who are concerned in the administration of the government have to a great extent been educated at least in part in mission schools, or have studied in America or both. Over these men Gilbert Bowles has a great influence, born of perfect confidence in his sincerity and high respect for his judgment.

"One feels in dealing with Gilbert Bowles that the basis of his life is deeply spiritual. He is one whose strength lies in quietness and confidence. I cannot speak of the educational work carried on in the school on the compound where the Bowles' home is situated, nor can I tell about the evangelistic work; but of the work of this man as an interpreter of America to Japan and of Japan to America, I can speak. I went to him again and again, and he never failed me.

"Since my return, people everywhere have been asking me how much the missionary work in Japan is worth. I tell them I do not know, and ask how you can measure the value of an idea. When one considers the enormous influence which has been exerted on the life and thought of Japan by the ideas embraced in the Buddhist faith which came through China and Korea from India, he may well hesitate to place an estimate on the value to Japan and to the world of the ideas which the labors of the missionaries have set to work among the Japanese people.

"It seems to me that these apostles of Western ideas had before them a fourfold task. One subject was the reconstitution of the family. This has been to a great extent achieved, so that the position of wife and mother is far more secure than formerly. A second matter which has been very fully achieved is the providing of the means of education for everybody. In the old days, education was the privilege of a caste. A third problem was the readjustment of economic and industrial relations. This has not been accomplished, and we need look no further than our own failure to solve the same problems in the West, in order to understand why we have not been able to help Japan. We cannot teach what we do not know.

"The fourth department in which the West seeks to influence Japan relates to philosophy. What is life for? What are the fundamental rules of right living? The comparatively small results in persuading the Japanese to adopt the Christian philosophy which have thus far been achieved are due it seems to me in large part to the unsuitable form of the package in which the goods have been offered. Christianity is an Asiatic religion, but it has come to us through Greek thought and language and through Roman forms of organization, and the Japanese just cannot manage it. They do not know how to open such a package and make use of its contents. The contents are all right, but they ought not to be wrapped up in so many externals which are unintelligible to the Japanese mind. When they do find out what the essentials of Christian philosophy are, we shall have to let them dress these up in their own kind of garments."

AN ACROSTIC.

The following is forwarded by one of our esteemed subscribers, aged eighty-two years.

Many happy years thy portion be,
Years of ripening for life in eternity.

Dost thou realize as the years roll by,
Eternal life is surely drawing nigh;
All efforts we may use to stem the tide,
Reveal to us God's will we must abide.

From whatever point of view we take,
Reveals to us His laws we must not break;
In abiding trust we travel on apace,
Enduring to the final end of the race;
Not doubting the reward of eternal bliss,
Depending upon the Saviour's promise of this.

Be contented, kind and active, avoiding strife,
Years may be granted for a long useful life.

Jealously guard thy thoughts and tongue,
Scrutinize well all thou dost pass among,
Mindful of self ere with sin thou art stung.

*Abstract of an address made at Twelfth Street Meeting-house to Friends' Foreign Missionary Association.

SEEBOHM ROWNTREE IN DETROIT.

Detroit Friends were favored at their morning hour for worship, Tenth Month 14th, by having Seebohm Rowntree, and his son, Seebohm Rowntree, Jr., with them.

About ninety Friends were present and Seebohm Rowntree spoke about Social Welfare lines, with which he is very familiar, having devoted about thirty years of intensive study to this subject.

He and his son were concluding a three days' visit in Detroit as part of a four weeks' stay in America, during which time they are meeting representatives of all the largest business interests in Boston, Buffalo, Detroit, Chicago, Philadelphia and New York. They hope for an interchange of ideas which will lead to a better understanding of the reconstruction problems that are before the world. Holding, as Seebohm Rowntree does, membership in the Special Committee appointed by the English Government to study and correlate plans for social reconstruction, his ideas naturally are in accord with those of our Social Order Committees. Undoubtedly our various committees will learn much through his visit among us.

In his instructive address he led up to the conclusion that in the present crisis of the world's affairs, the one word for the solution of difficulties is Love. Some systems might have great value in building humanity, but back of all systems are the men, and back of the men the ideals to which they subscribe. In direct proportion as these ideals approach the ideals of Jesus Christ and are lived up to with the same fearless desire for right, that prompted him not only to live for his ideals, but die for them,—just in this proportion will man-made plans be successful. He laid upon us individually the burden of doing our part in whatever position we occupy, as being our service and our reasonable sacrifice. Thus he left us with inspiring thoughts that cannot but give us a larger sense of our responsibility.

He expects to spend about two weeks in Philadelphia and New York and it is to be hoped that many Friends will have an opportunity of meeting him. W. G. HEACOCK.

HONOR IN BUSINESS.

[We are reprinting this from the Canadian Friend for Tenth Month. As the acknowledgments show, it has had already a wide circulation. It is a most useful tonic at a time when so many believe moral standards of business are badly damaged.—Eds.]

The Buffalo Evening News tells a story of business honor which is well worth recording because, as it says, the transaction "threw a light on the new business spirit of the country that was very pleasing."

The largest shoe-making company in the United States bought a carload of leather from a tanner at a price of twenty-two cents a pound for an agreed-upon grade. Arrived at the company's plant, the leather was reported by an inspector not to be up to standard. Acting on the inspector's report, the company wired the shipper the leather was not of the specified value, and refused to accept the car. The tanner wired back asking the buyer to take the leather and pay him what it proved to be worth. This the company agreed to do. Upon unloading the car, and handling the leather bale by bale, the shoe company's experts found the shipment averaged even better than the original specifications called for. Whereupon the shoe company sent the tanner a check for the whole carload at twenty-two-and-a-half cents a pound.

The company's explanation for paying more than the original contract price for the leather was that, having made a new agreement to pay whatever the leather was found to be worth, and the shipment proving of better grade than called for, it was morally bound to pay a higher rate than specified in the first contract. The Buffalo Evening News adds this comment: This little business story speaks a volume as to the higher plane on which business is moving to-day. After the war lapse into elemental ruthlessness and selfishness, which for a time demoralized the business morals of this country, and the world, it is gratifying to have evidence that integrity and fair dealing have again come to be "the white man's way" in American business life.—Editorial in The Globe.

LETTER FROM JUSTINE DALENCOURT.

[The following was written to Hannah P. Morris, but is intended for Friends generally. Many of the readers of THE FRIEND have been at the house referred to.—Eds.]

FONTAINE LAVAGANNE, France.
Ninth Month 19, 1921.

Very Dear Friend:—

I have many, many times wanted to write to thee that I might hear from thee and tell thee of my welfare, since thou has been so kind as to be interested in me. I have wanted to thank thee for so often sending affectionate messages through Friends visiting Paris. But . . . life during these last years has been so full and perplexing that whether I would or not I had to put aside everything except what was strictly necessary.

A popular proverb is to the effect that "hunger obliges the wolf to come out of the forest" and this proverb is justified by the fact that, in spite of much work to do, I have seated myself and taken the pen to write to thee. It concerns a question of great importance which (after having gone to my Master to know whether I ought to present it to thee), I believe He approves of my asking thee to take an interest in it. This is the subject.

The lease for our house (67 Theatre Street, Paris) has about expired. The owner wishes to sell it. It is extremely difficult to find lodgings in Paris, but it is impossible to find an entire house as small as ours which will contain twelve to fifteen persons.

My committee of Friends (of which C. Braithwaite is Secretary-Treasurer) realizes the necessity of buying this house in which we can continue our work, a work which is now more useful than ever because its only object is to bring souls to Jesus Christ, the Saviour, and without sectarian bias, to extend a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. All around us the modern theology weakens faith. The fact that I am old and the fact that any day my Lord may call me to continue above His well-beloved service to which I am here apprenticed does not make less imperative the necessity for providing a roof for our "Ecole Pratique" and also a centre for our stations for the evangelization of women of the working class. It is an everyday experience that "God calls His workmen, but continues His work." Certainly in regard to that which personally concerns me it would be a (shall I say, terrible) test to have to seek another house in the midst of so many difficulties, to move and get settled again, but I have had other tests in my long life and my tender Heavenly Father has sustained me with inexhaustible kindness. He has not exhausted His resources of faithfulness and help. He will aid me again.

But everybody says this house was made for us. It not only has a garden, but at the end of the garden there is a little assembly room which comfortably holds sixty persons; on the anniversary day we crowded one hundred into it! In accordance with the desire of the Committee I have had it examined by a Parisian architect. He found that it was very well built with solid foundations and of good materials. He thinks that it only needs some repairs. The owner asks 100,000 francs for it. An expense of 120,000 francs would be incurred (about $8000 at present exchange). This includes cost of purchase and repairs.

How happy I would be and how much relieved if the Lord would put it into thy heart to interest the Friends around thee who love France sufficiently to be willing to assure the continuation of a work which has been the pioneer woman's work among women and which all the churches have respected, loved and imitated and there has been no friction because the work is carried on without ostentation in peace and tranquility. It would also be very sweet to me before being called on high, to have everything arranged for her to whom God will say

(as He said to Joshua): "J. Dalencourt is dead, now therefore arise!" What a delightful maternal rôle this would be! Catharine Braithwaite has undertaken to ask Friends to help in the purchase of this house. I hope, dear friend, thou wilt feel thyself called to help us. . . . On all sides I see work that has begun or that has started again as from the midst of ruins, thanks to the beneficence of American Christians. The comforting thought has come to me several times that my good Master will not permit our work, which is pre-eminently His work, to be the only one to which His fatherly care does not extend!

Shall I give thee some personal news? It appears that one is a very old woman when one is nearly eighty-three! Well, then, I am very old! This has come over me almost before I was aware. But I cannot ignore it for people load me with advice relative to this situation. They write to me: "Very dear and venerable sister," "venerable friend," etc. Yet I can do a good deal of work of different kinds, so that if I know any woman who worked more than I do, I believe I should be jealous of her! It is not at 67 Theatre Street that one talks of a day of eight hours! Yet my heart is weak and my sight poor. It seems that my eighty-three years bear witness to their passing. . . . Very affectionately,

J. DALENCOURT.

MARY DYER.

Backward through Time I look, I see
A comely woman, full of grace;
She stands beneath a gallows tree,
Yet radiant is her upturned face.

Below her stands a silent crowd,
Made mute by grim and nameless fears;
The pity none may speak aloud
Betrays itself in covert tears.

Her judges rise; their ill-spent zeal
Has brought about this awful day,
Still they must make one last appeal
Before they take her life away;

"Woman, you are full aware
Of your great sin; and, is it meet
That you, without the Church's prayer,
Should dare, alone, your God to meet?"

She answers—and her fearless gaze,
Like Stephen's, seems to pierce the skies—
"Already, through these last two days,
I've dwelt with Him in Paradise!"

What perfect trust! What faith sublime!
Triumphphant, steadfast to the last,
Till her great soul from life and time
Into eternity is cast.

Beside her faith, how weak and dim,
How wavering seems our own today!
How far we seem to dwell from Him
Who was her closest friend and stay!

O Holy Spirit, come, inspire
Our hearts with new and holy zeal,
That we may live like Mary Dyer,
And, dying, still Thy presence feel!

EDUCATION.

THE CALL OF THE WILD.

The problem of life and therefore of education is often found near the edges of the wilderness and the town.

You may have traveled to the edge of the cultivated areas and seen the attempted encroachment from the one side or the other. Sometimes a ditch runs between or a plank is set edgewise to resist the weeds and grass or there is a free-for-all scramble so that the garden's edge looks like the interlocking of fingers, here a tilted spot and there a riot of twitch-grass. One may see the same contest on certain ocean shores where landmen have planted trees and shrubs to keep the waves of sand from encroaching on the fertile land. It is very noticeable in those eastern lands where the sons of the desert and the sons of the soil compete with each other across boundaries set by desert sands and reluctant rains. Coming up one side of the Syrian mountain-ridge one notices the clambering green of orchards, vineyards, and grain-fields, while straggling down the other side are miles of sandy terraces dotted with squills and other unfettered growth. The secret there is that the moistures of the sea from the one side are precipitated on the hither flank of the country and are burned by the scorching winds of the other.

Civilizations have had to withstand social conditions analogous to those of nature. The ancient Babylonians and Egyptians lived in little circles of historical light with rich cultures as their peculiar treasures. Those circles with their centres a thousand miles apart were sometimes in touch at the rims, but more often were separated by Arabian barbarism. Out and around them lay regions then untamed. Those cradles of civilizations were often leaped upon by the wolves of savagery and the homes of the arts with difficulty saved from ferocity. It often happened, however, that the wildness about those devoted centres of light and learning was gradually encroached upon by traders and teachers of the finer ways. Often the conqueror of Babylon became its pupil and extended its cultural sway until the ragged or clearly demarked edges of the empire remind one of the contrast between the wilderness and the town.

Not only geography and history, that is to say, gardens and populations, exhibit the contrasts, but the individual person shows the same contest between the wilderness and the tilled or between the smother of sands and the defended soil, between the circle of light, of culture, and conscience and the surrounding wild.

What is the call of this wild? In spiritual things it is not alone a call to enslavement nor to seduction of the good. Is it not to mastery by the threatened good? The fatalistic Oriental inclines to a stubborn defence where he is not actually crowded back, but the best word both east and west is that the good shall go forward to convert the evil ground to good uses. The call of the wild is not necessarily the call of evil to evil. The wild is a realm of raw forces, materials and ideas. Its call is for a master workman.

We cannot really escape the call of the wild. Its lawlessness as it sometimes seems is very near to us. It threatens to engulf us. It would be a terrible place to be lost. One school affects to find much intrinsic virtue in it and cries out: "back to nature," identifying the wild with nature, though it is but one aspect of nature. The true summons is "forward to nature," to master the lower nature by the highest known. In truth there is no good in going back. All life is forward looking. After all, to change the figure, education is the unfolding of the volume of God as it is bound in man.

THOMAS SCATTERGOOD'S SERVICE IN THE PENNSYLVANIA LEGISLATURE.

The late James Kite had a store of anecdotes, which he was fond of relating. After a visit, during which he had entertained us in this way, he sent me two little home-made blank-books, closely filled with incidents, which, he said, "I have drawn from my mental store-house." Looking over these lately, the following seemed of especial interest, both as a remarkable instance of Divine guidance, and because so many similar visits have been made by Friends in the past few years. It is entitled "T. Scattergood's Service in the Pennsylvania Legislature."

F. T. R.

In the early part of last century, word was brought to Philadelphia that a bill would be introduced into the Legislature, then sitting at Lancaster, that would injuriously affect those conscientious in regard to warlike measures.

Such members of the Meeting for Sufferings as were present in the city were hastily called together to consider what was best to be done, with the result that Thomas Scattergood, Thomas Wistar, Jonathan Evans, and Samuel Bettie were deputed to go to Lancaster, and use what influence they possessed toward defeating the passing of the bill.

It was on a Seventh-day morning they were called together, and the bill was to be introduced on Second-day morning.

The four Friends started in time for them to get to Downingtown before dark, lodging at a Friend's house. They were desirous to set off early in the morning, that they might have the afternoon in which to interview such members of the Legislature as they might hope to have some influence with.

But T. Scattergood told his companions it would be needful for him to have a religious sitting in the family before starting. This was distasteful to the three Elders, . . . but the concern of such a one as T. S. could not be put by, and the sitting was held.

This had taken so much time that when they had gone so far as old Caln Meeting-house, they found the Friends just assembling. A discussion now arose as to what was best to be done. The more part thought that the matter they were charged with was so important, and the time so limited, they might safely pass on. At length Thomas told them that they might go, but as for him, duty required him to attend that meeting. But there could be no going on without him, so they went in.

Now Thomas had a communication addressed pointedly to an individual who was represented as having given way to wrong habits, that now help was offered, etc. The matter was so peculiar that Thomas . . . (afterward) "became doubtful of its propriety, and said to his companions that he feared he had made a mistake," to which J. Evans in his brusque way, answered, "Thou hast done well. Be quiet."

They dined at a house nearby, and were naturally desirous to get started as soon as possible, . . . but here again Thomas said that he must have a family sitting, . . . and this had to be submitted to. Now darkness overtook them, as they reached the last settlement of Friends, and a lodging place must be found. Stopping at a Friend's house, he said that it would be quite inconvenient to entertain them, on account of the illness of his wife. . . . At length he brought it to this—"If they were willing to take things as they were, the family would do the best they could for their accommodation." The three Elders thought that some other lodging must be sought, but Thomas cut the matter short by getting out of the carriage and saying that he should stay there.

Now it was very desirable that they get an early start in the morning, for the remaining ten miles must be covered ere the hour of the Legislature arrived, and they might interview some of the members at the door. . . . But here the obstructionist put in again. It was necessary for him to have an opportunity in the sick chamber. There was manifestly nothing for the rest but submission to adverse fate.

Thomas told the sick woman that her confinement there was altogether the work of the Adversary, and that if she would arouse herself with a "Get thee behind me, Satan!" she might be restored to usefulness.

It may well be believed that the morning's ride onward was a discouraging one. All hope of any good resulting from their mission was now lost by these unseemly delays. But Thomas was serene in the consciousness of duty done.

When at last they arrived at Lancaster, they found that not only was the Legislature in session, but the bill they had come to protest against had been put up for its passage, and its proposer, Michael Leib, was in the midst of a fiery speech, wherein those opposed to warlike measures were receiving very scant courtesy at his hands.

Under such circumstances came in the delegation, and as it entered, headed by the venerable T. Scattergood, a most remarkable influence came in with them, which spread itself over the assembly, nor could the orator himself withstand its effects. His words soon grew strangely sympathetic, and he finally ended by himself proposing to kill his own bill. And it was the united opinion of the three, who had been so unbelieving, that at no other time could the object of their mission have been so successfully accomplished as that in which they arrived. Nor did they have occasion to utter one word, "The Lord your God shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace."

We come now to consider the various hindrances.

At the next Quarterly Meeting a young man addressed Thomas Scattergood, asking if he remembered the meeting at Caln, and stating that he himself had been the one spoken to. That he had contracted a liking for strong drink, so as to become ensnared, but was now rejoicing in freedom.

And also a bright-faced woman came to him with acknowledgment; she who had been raised from her bed through his instrumentality.

Of the other we know nothing by results, but they were links in that chain of Providence, which brought the deputation to its appointed service.

HOMELESS BETWEEN POLAND AND RUSSIA.

Between Russia and Poland a million people are on the move. This is the estimate made by the general in command of the Polish repatriation camp at Baranowice. Other estimates vary from 600,000 to 3,000,000. Nobody really knows the exact number.

You see them driving along the dusty roads in that section of the old Ukraine which was given by last spring's treaty to Poland. You see them jammed in the freight-cars and moved forward slowly like freight, getting out during the long waits at stations to boil water for tea, or to stretch themselves after the long journey. You see them, sometimes several thousand at a time, sitting and lying in the fields where the border repatriation camp is filled to overflowing.

Farther to the west you see them, more scattered now, waiting in little family groups near the railroad stations, for the slow arrival of a cart from some nearby village to take them home. And then later on they reach home after six years' absence, to find a heap of ashes or barbed wire where their house once stood.

They are Poles, returning home from Russia. It is among these groups that the Quakers are endeavoring to bring, not only a temporary relief, of food for a few days, but substantial help in reconstructing their old homes by the loan of seeds and ploughs and the gift of wood to rebuild their houses.

In the early months of the world war, they were swept eastward before the retreat of the Russian army, which laid waste the villages as it went. They were scattered all the way from Moscow to Turkestan. The horrors of that retreat have been told again and again. There were so many fleeing that the harvests were eaten from the fields and the wells on the line of march were exhausted, and the roads were marked by lines of white crosses where the refugees had stopped to bury their dead.

For six years they have been filtering back from Russia, slowly, because of the frequent fighting on the border and the lack of transportation. This summer they have come more rapidly, since the signing of peace between the two countries. But now they are coming with a great rush, fleeing before the famine in Russia.

Nobody knows how many went over to Russia. Nobody knows how many died in that exile. Nobody knows how many will be coming back. All records have been wiped out by the war. Most of the government estimates range over a million.

In spite of the famine behind them and the greatness of their numbers, this movement of refugees is no mere stampede. The governments both of Russia and Poland are dealing with the situation in an orderly manner. When they reach the Polish side of the border the Polish Government takes charge of their reception. At first there were two large repatriation camps, Baranowice to the north and Rowno to the south, where refugees were to be kept in quarantine for five days, deloused, fed and registered. These camps, adapted for the handling of 4,000 refugees per week, have been repeatedly swamped by the great numbers, so that additional camps much farther away from the border have been hastily prepared, and refugees whose homes are farther to the west are sent straight through to camps nearer their homes.

At the camp farther west, built to handle 4,000, an influx of 22,000 refugees came all at once. The operating machinery went to pieces. The refugees camped in the fields with a scant supply of water and no toilets but open ditches. In two days the food gave out. Then the authorities, fearing that pestilence might develop, were forced to open the bars and let everyone through into Poland, half of them untouched by any disinfecting process and all with baggage that was not disinfected.

Eventually, they get home. If their house is gone, as it frequently is, they make a rude shelter of mud and straw or of trench material. In the few districts where there is plenty of wood, they build log-cabins. In the districts where German dugouts are left, they move into these. Sometimes they are lucky enough to find large curved sheets of corrugated iron and they build themselves a house that looks like a big barrel.

Then they begin to cultivate their land again. And here lies the great emergency this winter in Poland. For they have no ploughs, no horses, no seed, no food for the winter. Their hold upon life depends entirely upon what help the almost bankrupt Polish nation can give them in supplies, and the aid from relief agencies such as the Society of Friends.

The refugees, on the whole, do not give signs of having suffered from underfeeding while they have been away. It is the exception to see the marks of malnutrition. Most of the peasants are barefooted, but so they are everywhere in Poland. But these people left Poland because of famine and now they have left Russia in the face of the famine there, and it is because they are returning to their country which is in the same condition as it was when they left it that their problem has become one of simply fighting off death during the winter. With the aid of the loan of the agricultural implements, the seed, and the wood with which to build a shelter, they will be able to survive the rigors of a Polish winter and begin early in the spring to recover the ground which will support them and build their life anew. The numbers needing this relief are endless. Therefore the relief which is needed is endless.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

THE W. C. T. U. AND DISARMAMENT.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union, which has now joined our movement, is circulating through its 20,000 local unions, a mammoth petition to be presented to Secretary Hughes "shortly before the meeting of the Disarmament Conference." The petition reads as follows:

"We, the undersigned, commend the President for calling into conference representatives of great nations for the purpose of entering into an understanding or agreement for international limitation of armament to secure the peace of the world.

"We respectfully and earnestly petition you to use your influence to hold the conference to the primary purpose of the consideration of the reduction of armament, not allowing other issues to displace this fundamental task."

STATEMENT FROM THE GENERAL FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS.

... All the things that we club women work for—citizenship, education, public health, good institutions, conservation, home life, child welfare, art, music, literature—are arts and activities of peace. War sweeps them into the dustheap.

... Can we play only with the small things, the minor interests, when the world is making its choice? Which shall it be, war or peace, sanity or insanity, life or death?

F. E. POLLARD OF THE (ENGLISH) NATIONAL PEACE COUNCIL.

We are very much alive to the Disarmament issue. We are ourselves a Council that seeks to co-ordinate the Peace Movement, being a federal council of the Peace Society, U. D. C., Women's International League and twenty or thirty other bodies. We recognize, however, that a much wider effort is necessary, and we are building up a Joint Disarmament Committee, representative of a wider circle. It is too soon to say how far this will be officially representative, and how far only individually, but we shall go forward anyway with the effort to stimulate and co-ordinate. It will be a great help to know of similar bodies in your country and Japan; and we shall welcome all possible communication of facts and mutual encouragement.

DISARMAMENT WORK AMONG PHILADELPHIA FRIENDS.

Anne Walton Pennell, formerly Secretary of the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee, is again assisting with the work at the Peace office, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, and is acting as Field Secretary of Disarmament work. Her immediate task is to help Friends of our Yearly Meeting appreciate the unusual opportunity before them for Peace work, and their responsibility for arousing their communities to work for limitation of armament as a step toward permanent peace.

FRIENDS BEST PEACE CONTRIBUTION AT PRESENT.

At the recent joint meeting of the Two Friends' Peace Committees, Elbert Russell spoke on the subject of "Friends' Special Peace Contribution for the Present." He urged that while we ought to use all proper weapons in the cause of peace, our best contribution was insistence on spiritual values. Eight hundred million dollars spent this year for war meant just so much subtracted from educational and spiritual uses. We should emphasize the spiritual damage of war; the worst thing is not the loss of money but of character; in war we have to hate and fear and suspect others. Again, we Friends must contribute our religious conviction that war is always wrong. Most people make an exception of "this war"; the fears, pride and patriotism of people are played on; only Christian conviction will keep us from war. Stating that when people believe in a thing they will listen to all kinds of arguments in its favor, he said we must show that people can be safe and happy without dependence on arms, as William Penn's colony here proved. He urged that we must offer a constructive program to supplement outward disarmament. Our conception is of a nation working for its own good and that of other nations.

We must reshape our policies and make other nations safe to live by, good neighbors.

GENERAL DIAZ AND SPIRITUAL DISARMAMENT.

A visiting Italian soldier, General Diaz, is quoted as saying: "To realize world peace and concord we must disarm, not only in weapons, but also in the spirit and the passion that make for war."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

FIRST-DAY, the 30th, being a fifth First-day in the month, is Friends' Day at the Colored Home, Forty-fourth and Girard Avenue. The hour of the meeting is three o'clock.

In a letter from Cambridge, Mass., written to William B. Harvey, Emma Maria Bishop notes that she has been "spending a week-end with Sarah Elkinton and her daughter and son-in-law." They had been "over to Wellesley for the meeting there with the students. . . . Wm. Bishop and his wife were also there." "In the afternoon we were at the Cambridge meeting, about fifty altogether, many of them young men and women. That meeting has a real future I think."

"I greatly enjoyed the Cornell visit; there is a good nucleus of Friends there outside the students. They are starting a study group together and are going to take Neave Brayshaw's new book as a basis."

"Tunesassa, too, was a great interest and a real pleasure, but I felt much for the isolation of the little group there."

"From Boston I am expecting to go to Poughkeepsie to meet the Vassar girls at their meeting on First-day morning. I have written to the Oakwood School to propose if convenient to them a visit to that school also."

"I shall probably be back in Philadelphia by the end of the month."

ANNA J. HAINES has now been ten days or longer with her home circle. Her view of the Russian situation had been cabled from England in advance of her arrival here. The extreme need is confirmed and the willingness of the Soviets to co-operate attested. It is a happy circumstance that with first-hand knowledge, Anna J. Haines is reported as not feeling the situation to be entirely hopeless.

At the opening of the Representative Meeting on the 21st, Elim Palmquist, Secretary of the Federation of Churches, in Philadelphia, explained the scope of the activities in which twenty-eight varieties of Christians are co-operating. It was believed Friends might wish to join them, particularly in the present efforts for disarmament, and for a more definite interest in those juvenile delinquents, classed as Protestant, and needing Christian friends in the court-room. His appeal was received sympathetically and the propriety of appointing a representative was referred to a committee.

A letter from Bilthoven, Holland, signed by Cornelius Boeckx on behalf of Friends there, asked if there had been a mis-carriage of justice in the now famous Sacco-Vanzetti case. The Clerk had consulted Arthur Perry of Boston on the subject. He had conferred with prominent lawyers as well as with the head of the association for democratic control, and was present with such facts as he had been able to procure. The general impression that the men are to be executed on the 1st prox. is incorrect. That is the day set for filing exceptions to the trial held in the Seventh Month last. A new trial may be granted or if it is not, the Board of Pardons may review the case. Anything apart from the orderly processes of law would be deprecated by Friends, but every effort should be made to guard the case from the prejudices against radicals and so-called "slackers." To this end two Friends were named to join Arthur Perry as a Committee of inquiry and if there is a service for the Representative Meeting to call it together.

The Mennonites detained by the immigration authorities as reported some weeks ago had been released. A letter of appeal to Secretary Hughes for a recognition of Divine dependence by the Disarmament Conference was adopted. A pause of silent devotion was suggested as having no offence for any.

A Committee had been giving some attention to the character of news and of editorials in the public press. Some hopeful progress had been made. The Temperance Association has taken a desk at 304 Arch Street, and the hope was expressed that they might do something to correct the unfortunate treatment of the prohibition amendment by the newspapers. Too often this treatment has the tone of "contempt for law and for the Constitution." This was pointed out at last meeting by our friend William Bishop.

The sum of $500 from the Charlestown Trust was appropriated for a meeting house at Oakland, Cal.

Henry H. Albertson of Burlington was present at the meeting as successor to William Bishop, who was released by Burlington and Bucks Quarter at his own request.

CONFERENCE ON THE PROBLEMS OF THE ELEMENTARY SCHOOL.—A Conference of all the teachers in the elementary grades of the Friends' schools of both branches is called for Tenth Month 29, 1921, at 10 A. M., in the lecture room of Friends' Select School, Sixteenth and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia.

The Conference is to be conducted by Mary H. Lewis, Founder and Principal of Park School, Buffalo, N. Y., who will speak on the subject, "What Shall We Try to Accomplish in the Grades?" Following her address, she will discuss informally any questions that the teachers may present. Mary H. Lewis is recognized as one of the foremost leaders of the Progressive Education Movement, and we regard her coming as affording us a unique opportunity.

Those who desire it will be provided simple luncheon in the Friends' Select School dining-room at 12 o'clock at a cost of forty cents each. Notice should be sent to Walter W. Haviland, 140 N. Sixteenth Street, Philadelphia, on or before the 28th inst. of the number who desire the luncheon. This will be over in time for the 1.00 or the 1.25 train to Westtown, where an afternoon session of Friends' Educational Association will be held.

CARE IN INSURANCE

The Provident was founded in 1865 by a group of Friends for the purpose of protecting the estates and insuring the lives of members of the Society of Friends.

Later the services of this Company were offered to other people who were known to be of careful habits. A careful company insures only those people who are good moral as well as health risks. This results in a low death-rate, which is one of the elements of low cost of insurance.

Care is important—in insurance as well as in other things.

We are trying to send to Japan the very best that America has in ideals and standards of life. This is embodied in the Christian message as taught and lived by our representatives. Our work tends toward making international disarmament a fact and international friendship a reality. All who help to improve the physical conditions under which the missionaries live and work contribute to the effective presentation of their great message.

THE LIGHT WITHIN.

Assuming that philosophy and religion can often arrive at the same "facts" (though by diverse roads) it yet seems likely that in matters spiritual, religion has proved itself a surer guide, the progress of philosophy having been notoriously zig-zag.* One may not unfairly claim for religion the right at least of an impartial hearing on matters which concern its own "field."

Philosophy (but particularly psychology) has done service in confirming testimony which religion also bears. But it has earned one caution. For, at other times, while slighting religion's testimony, it proceeds itself to dogmatize upon that part of its realm which it shares with religion.

Modern philosophic opinion readily grants that the early Friends had a re-discovery of Truth, but laments that in the formulation of their doctrine of the light within, they were hampered by an outworn philosophy of their day—a "dualistic" conception of the universe, in which grace was no part of the "natural" man, but something supernatural or from beyond man's own nature—something added to him as a gift. Upon this (supposedly false) conception, is chiefly blamed a failure of Quaker doctrine to livingly appeal to the modern seeker.

Whether the universe be "dualistic" or not, philosophy may pronounce when she is herself convinced. With the word which is hers we have no quarrel. It has often been pointed out, however, that to suppose a unity in all things does not obliterate every boundary nor indeed fill all the "gaps." Of such absolute barriers, the most persistent is that occasioned by the presence of life.

Life has moved upon the surface of the inorganic and has transformed it, in part. "Matter" which never had life is "dead, being alone," but even that which once had vital connection, and yet bears the image of the organic—when once life has departed—is dead also. Wheat and chaff are both organic products, but the grain harbors the mysterious vital principle—quite extinct in its cast-off envelope.

*Galileo's theory was indeed condemned by the "church," but that conflict of authority would seem not so much a clash of philosophy and religion as between a true philosophy and a false. This is not to make philosophy smart for the mistakes of religion. The question was one of physics, and so most naturally belongs to the sphere of physics.

The "dualism" of the living and the not-living is still with us, but philosophy in her zeal to "unify and comprehend the universe as an organic whole" tends to level these distinctions or to minimize them. "With no unworthy aim," she goes about to justify the "calvinistic" aspect of nature by denying it. We share her belief in the goodness of God. When "all the returns are in" this fact will be only the more apparent. But, in the meantime, no good can come from being false to other facts.

In spite of these obstinate flaws in her unified system, philosophy persists in extending this leveling process to the spiritual world. Is it not doubtful whether, in her present mood, she is competent to correct the compass which served the pioneers? But she attempts it.

The testimony of early Friends may be briefly given as follows: Men, who naturally wander from God, are universally sought by a love that would draw them back. This love or grace or inward light of Christ, is Christ Himself, though in "a little appearance." Those who resist not this drawing or savour or enlightenment, but join with it, come to have Christ more fully formed in them. They experience what all are invited to experience, that Christ becomes "flesh of their flesh and bone of their bone." They feed upon Christ, a spiritual substance, whose flesh is meat indeed. This spirit, grace or true light (the transforming agent, actual or potential) is the universal gift of God, which witnesses against sin and evil, and overcomes them, in those who love its appearance. This unspeakably great and precious gift comes through Christ Jesus, who was put to death at Jerusalem, but who rose from the dead, and is a living Saviour and Redeemer and Guide to all who will have Christ to rule over them, and to these realities the Holy Scriptures give precious and ample testimony.

According to modern philosophy, "The Inner Light, the true Seed, is no foreign substance added to an undivine human life. It is neither human nor Divine. It is the actual inner self formed by the union of a Divine and a human element in a single, undivided life."

By thus identifying the light within the inner life of the individual (a union which early Friends witnessed both orally and experimentally) philosophy imagines she has escaped from "dualism." Be that as it may. What really matters, is this a true definition of the light within? If it limits the divine light to those who have actually joined with it, the definition has the calvinistic defect of cutting off a part of mankind (and the very needy, too) from its help. If, on the other hand, it identified the inner light with a part, even the highest part of man's nature, then the actual inner self is both human and Divine—a "dualism" fraught with dangers greater than those it seeks to correct, and raising questions that can only be answered by yes and no.

This conception further gives promise of light on the question of authority in religion, but the inner self proving to be not infallible, the inquirer must retake his staff and move sadly on. "The deep says it is not in me." The yet more urgent problem of sin, on this basis, fares not better. But, it is noteworthy, that where the defenders of this doctrine, unconsciously perhaps, return to the idea of a spirit within us but not of ourselves, their contributions at once become constructive. Of such helpful passages, there are many.

Let it be confessed that early Friends employed a now obsolete phraseology. For this, no one dreams of blaming them. Allowance must be made for this discrepancy. Barring some aberrations, which were promptly disclaimed, their message is clearly stated, and is remarkably unanimous. They proclaimed it by word, by life and by death. It should be seriously pondered "in the fear of the Lord" before the old calf-kissers are "scrapped." Even those who disagree with their "philosophy" intuitively recognize the worth of their testimony, and would be the first to protest against such an issue.

EDITORIAL COMMENT.

LAUNCHING THE MILLENNIUM.

The discussion of the Conference on Armaments has been uppermost in the public press for some weeks. It is interesting and it may be instructive to observe some outstanding features of this discussion. One is obliged to conclude that very little of the newspaper comment has escaped an evident flavor of partisanship. Very few of our writers and a very small fraction of the press have been large enough to think of the Conference in world terms or even to dissociate it from party politics. Those particularly who have accepted it as a new call to marshal idealism, have found themselves either affronting "practical statesmanship," or exciting the derision of professional correspondents, whose stock in trade is the assumption that they have "inside information." This latter class has been most free in the use of such expressions as "launching the millennium." These have been aimed in derision at pacifists. Even a sane writer like Hamilton Holt is found saying, "Don't expect the millennium to arrive in the wake of the Disarmament Conference." We would frankly associate ourselves with those who believe in launching the millennium. At best this expression can be no more than a figure of speech. Its plain meaning is that we must trust to the force of idealism for the progress of the world, if we are to have any progress. Evidently the hidden heart of the world is throbbing with this idealism. It broke through in such a flood of protest and appeal to the President that the Conference call was an irresistible necessity. If now the politicians can be prevented from breaking the circuit of this idealism, if the pent-up feelings of the millions can be made vocal, something more will result than a new concert of powers. The anachronism of war may unexpectedly meet the fate of a Goliath. Sometime (why not now?) it will die that way, and we shall all wonder why it took so long to put nations upon the same basis as persons, or as individual states, in the settling of disputes.

When physical force and relentless hate broke in vain upon Calvary the millennium was actually launched. Since that day there has always been a remnant to proclaim that "peace is more strong than war." Peace has Christ's strength of reconciliation. All the marshaled fury of a world war has passed, and the reconciliation has hardly progressed a step. Anachronism? Yes, and bitterest of all failures, has war shown itself to be.

PACIFISTS PRO-TEM.

If any have followed the current literature since the armistice, merely to collect the accumulating testimony to the oft-announced fact that "war is utter folly as well as utter wickedness," they would by this time have a lengthy bibliography. Altogether apart from the sober work of thoughtful political philosophers of whom Lord Bryce is the dean, ephemeral literature reflects a realistic side of the hideousness of war that would have been accounted treason three years ago. Andreas Latzko and John Dos Passos are extremes of this type of writing. It arrests the attention that a recent reviewer characterizes these two men as belonging to the class of "pacifists pro-tem." This characterization is intended as a home thrust of irony. We are inclined to think the thrust reaches farther than was expected. How many of us still have memories seven years old? How unanimous many peoples were then against war, not excluding sage newspaper correspondents and professional book-reviewers!

These out-spoken writers (a numerous train, of which but two are named above) may prove to be anything but temporary converts. It stands to reason that eye-witness converts are often the most determined. We have not ceased even to believe that the boys "who gave themselves to the conflict" are the most sure to be ready at the right moment to do a man's part to prevent any such future folly. It is a Major from overseas who has just been saying to an editor of THE FRIEND: "Believe me, we boys who have been in the conflict disbelieve in the whole institution of war." It comforts us therefore to see the "Legion" in Frederick J. Libby's list of organizations co-operating in the "Disarmament Council." If they are "pacifists pro-tem" now, they may be confirmed world patriots afterward!

SLACKERS.

The war psychology that came over peoples in a great wave gave many illustrations of methods that should have value in the moral warfare of the world. What, for instance, could be more complete than the general contumely suddenly attaching to the word "slacker." Even the most conscientious pacifist quailed before the word! Slacker he could not be! We all know how this feeling organized ambulance units and service committees, and how courageously hundreds of our best demonstrated their devotion and loyalty through these channels. They were not slackers and they proved it.

Now that the wave has receded it is in order to inquire what a slacker actually is. Are we confined to such a limited meaning as that of "one who will not defend his country?" Defence by arms at least is so rarely (if ever) called for, that the term is sorely limited if it must stop there. Certainly real patriotism connotes love of country—respect for law, a proper reverence for the Constitution. We need then a new wave of mass psychology. We need to find a way to put this label "slacker" on those who evade the last Constitutional amendment, on those who ridicule it, and even on those who are apathetic about such a fundamental matter as law observance. There certainly is a public sentiment on this matter that needs only to be rightly mobilized and vocalized to become more effective even than enforcement agents, as necessary as they are. Let us learn this lesson of war psychology and summon the power of public opinion.

J. H. B.

A COMING CONFERENCE.

Not to speak of what is only in preparation is a wise general principle. And yet we should like to share with readers of THE FRIEND the interest of a set of letters received in reply to questions sent out by a sub-committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting's "Extension Committee" (that on "the Religious Education of Our Children") so that those who expect to attend the Conference to be held on Eleventh Month 22nd, at Twelfth Street Meeting-house, from five to nine p. m., may come prepared to take part in the discussion, and others may learn something of the problems pressing upon the minds of those who have children under their care. The question which has aroused most general interest is, "How can we make our Meetings for Worship of more real interest to our children?" Replying to this one mother says, "We cannot, without radically changing the meeting,—which none of us want. Why not have a 'young' meeting at the same hour? Some person gifted in interesting little children could make the hour a very profitable one, with live talks, guided silences, and story-telling. A splendid opportunity for teaching the principles of Quakerism." . . . Another, "Can we make them feel their responsibility to the meeting, and how their attitude toward it may help or hinder the worship." A father thinks that we can make our meetings of more value to our children "by having the children on our minds more, and praying that we may be able to make our meetings helpful to them, by teaching the children that they themselves have a part in the meeting, and showing them how to take it."

A teacher feels that "It is a vital question, and one that those of us who attend mid-week meetings with school-children have very much on our minds."

"A teaching ministry,"—"a loving and sympathetic ministry" are spoken of as felt needs in some meetings, though one letter adds, "But children must always feel that our First-day meetings are more for the grown people than for themselves, that these meetings mean so much to their elders that the children may expect some day to be equally helped by them."

Finding that this subject is so near the hearts of many parents and teachers, it is planned to make it the theme of the main address of the Conference, in the evening, and also to have some account of the "Children's meetings," which have been planned in Germantown. A lively discussion also is hoped for. Indeed, the whole Conference is planned with ample time to really confer, and it is the hope of the Committee that no one with a pertinent thought or question in mind may be disappointed because time cannot be given to express it.

On the subject of religious literature, the letters express great divergence of opinion. Some parents feel that "there is too much so-called religious literature, some that we have real needs in one direction or another."

Violet Hodgkin's "Quaker Saints" is much commended in some letters, though one letter says we need books about "other than Quaker saints—Francis of Assisi, for example." Some letters plead for "more of the Bible, less of books about the Bible," yet others feel a need of certain explanations, especially of the Old Testament. We quote from one of these, "My suggestion as to what is most needed (question 2) is an understanding of the peculiar qualities of the Oriental mind and Hebrew literature. . . . This is sorely needed, to understand the great Hebrew library that we want our children to love and appreciate." Several letters refer to the need of a complete bibliography, arranged for children of different ages, and it may be well to say here that this is being done, by sub-committee No. 5, and two leaflets, "Bible Stories for Children," and "Books of Service in Bible reading and Bible Study," are already in print and to be had at Friends' Book Store. The fourth question as to the part our children may take in family worship also called forth interesting response. One Friend writes, "My mind reverts at once to my childhood's home, where, after morning Bible reading, each child, beginning with the youngest, repeated a text, going on by ages 'till mother's turn came, and then father's." There were ten of us, and our frequent guests responded also." Is not this a pleasant picture? Other letters refer to similar plans for verses, repeated or read in turn, or for hymns or readings chosen by the children. The responsibility of Friends' Schools in the matter of religious education is alluded to in several letters. Our First-day schools and Bible classes, the personal influence, and right preparation of teachers for them, claim a large share of interest.

One letter closes with a well-worded conclusion (referring to the family life), "I should like some one to stress again the familiar adage that here especially is 'example better than precept.'" "Talks with children on religious subjects may have great value, but the lives we live with them—moment by moment, have a far greater influence than any words we can say—except perhaps at a rare moment of inspiration. Our very beings are influencing the children every moment we are with them."

These extracts, gleaned here and there, fail to give any adequate idea of the value and interest of the letters. We can but hope that the coming together of some of the writers may be equally worth while, and that the Conference will be of real service.

A notice, with details of the program, will be given in THE FRIEND, as well as by the personal invitations. While the gathering is primarily intended to be of parents and teachers, any one interested in the subject is cordially invited.

"IN CHRIST THERE IS NO DEFEAT."

"Now thanks be unto God, which always causeth us to triumph in Christ."—(2 Corinthians ii: 14).

O holy Cause of blessed consummation!

Thrice blest forever is God's holy name!

"In Christ" is victory, and full salvation.

His all sufficiency His own may claim.

"In Christ," "God always causeth us to triumph."

Rejoice, O Christians, at the faithful word!

Abide "in Christ," and, by His strength envinced,

Be strong henceforward in your Mighty Lord.

And when the brief campaign in peace has ended,

When Christ the final victory has won,

The triumph song will sound throughout the ages,

A glad, sweet service upon earth begun.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

By the blessing of God above,

With the banner of joy unfurled,

We'll change the hate to love

In this sad sin-stricken world.

SOME OF OUR QUAKER PERIODICALS.

The function of each of these weekly periodicals, as also of The Friend [London], may be summed up under the following five heads:

1. To furnish rather brief "devotional" or "inspirational" articles or editorials—varying from written sermons, of the so-called "prophetic" type, to timely discussions of topics of general importance and interest.
2. Reprinting, that they may have a wider audience and later be available for reference and study, any especially worthwhile papers delivered at conferences, etc.
3. Publishing reports of the work of our many and various associations and yearly meeting committees.
4. Maintaining interest in Foreign Missions and especially in the work of the A. F. S. C. and the F. E. & W. V. R. C. in England, which I am convinced will be written down in history as one of the most remarkable pieces of Christian service the world has ever seen.
5. News items of many sorts: putting before Friends matters which ought to have their interest and attention, reviewing new books, and giving in particular those special notes of Quakerdom which without descending to the gossipy "personal columns" of the small town newspaper, are of the greatest interest to nearly all of us who love the Society as well as the principles for which it stands.

Then, too, there is a certain influence exerted outside, but this, unless we radically change the character of our denominational weeklies, must remain comparatively slight.

The united war-work of American Friends and the great London Conference last summer have made many Friends of all Yearly Meetings and branches feel more closely drawn together than ever they had felt before. Some would be glad to see one American Quaker weekly instead of three, which, of course, in a way, is wasteful and inefficient, when our total membership is probably not over 100,000. The A. F. S. C. material appears simultaneously in all three, and much of the best that is published in one will be reprinted in one or both of the others, thus bringing the matter to the attention of the entire Quaker public. But each weekly prints, of course, a large amount of matter that especially concerns its particular constituency, which one paper alone could hardly attempt, and while this may come in the not too distant future, it seems scarcely practicable to reduce for the present the number of our journals.

One great need of all our weeklies just now is, to my mind, a higher literary tone. This does not mean that the articles should be more serious, certainly not that they should be heavier or drier, but that they should be written with more care for their literary style, with more attention to the canons of good writing, with a little more regard for the final appearance of the article as a piece of literary craftsmanship. They should be edited always with a view to dignity and a restrained self-respect. Then far more Friends with "concerns" should be willing to write for these papers—seeking to know if there is not a duty for them in this matter, just as a concerned minister when he enters a meeting for worship, will seek to know what his right place is in that meeting, and whether there is a work for him there, of a vocal or silent sort. In other words, there should be, on the part of all our weeklies, the constant endeavor to live up to the sub-title which appears both in The Friend [London] and that of Philadelphia: "a religious and literary journal."

Now, of course, it is absolutely useless for these journals to be painstakingly edited or even issued at all, if nobody is ever going to read them once they are published. In one of the recent issues of The Young Friends' Number of THE FRIEND (Philadelphia) the editors asked, perhaps a little plaintively, "Are We Ever Read?" It is a serious matter. I do not know what the situation is with regard to the other Friends' weeklies, but I do know that a list was recently made out of households of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting (Arch Street) who were not subscribing for THE FRIEND. Our membership is less than 4,500—there were 500 households on this list, probably at least 1,000 individual members. I fear there is a number of other homes to which the paper may go, where it gets scant attention—perhaps one reader in the family, perhaps none. The practice of reading the paper each First-day in the family used to be quite general, perhaps it is the survivors of the ordeal who make up this black-list of 500! But it does seem as if our interest in the Society of Friends ought to extend at least as far as the regular reading of our denominational weekly, and keeping to that extent informed as to the thoughts and interests and activities and tendencies of our co-religionists. Our membership certainly should mean that much to us, it seems almost the irreducible minimum, if we are to be Friends in anything more than in name.

Those who maintain that they "haven't time for such dry as dust, antiquated drivel" are the very ones who know their journals least. Of not one of these weeklies can such an accusation be brought with justice. Perhaps you know this from experience—if you don't believe 'me, try it out and see. I know a young Friend who "married out" and who I suppose never darkens the door of a meeting-house once in the year. But the A. F. S. C. sent him THE FRIEND for a short term, free. After while it stopped coming. He missed it, and asked me why it didn't come any more. I told him if he would read it, I would gladly send it to him, and I know from remarks he drops from time to time that he not only reads it regularly but finds it interesting.

If we are prepared to venture a little beyond this irreducible minimum of Quaker reading, then by all means subscribe for The Friends' Fellowship Papers. These, as I have already pointed out, now represent Young Friends and their interests and concerns throughout the world. Time would probably fail most of us for reading all six of the publications discussed in this résumé, desirable as it might be in many ways. We mustn't let our reading be too one-sided. I myself do not take any American Quaker weekly but THE FRIEND, not because I am not interested in the others, but because I really do not know where I should find the opportunity to get them read. I do take all three of the English papers; not because I am an Anglo-maniac, but because they supply each one a real need. The Friend keeps me in touch with London Yearly Meeting and its activities, where I count a number of warm personal friends. The Fellowship Papers keeps me informed on matters pertaining to Young Friends here, in England, in India, Australia, South Africa, Germany, Ireland, New Zealand—everywhere. The Quarterly Examiner gives that thoughtful, scholarly treatment of Quaker themes which it seems to me is essential, if, in Lowell's phrase, we "would keep abreast of Truth."

I have said nothing at all about the two intensely interesting Bulletins of the Friends' Historical Society (Philadelphia and London), nor of the equally valuable periodicals devoted exclusively to missions, both at home and abroad, to peace, or to social questions. I have likewise refrained from commenting on any of the "fringe" journals, like The Ventureur, The World Tomorrow, Outward Bound, or The Ploughshare. The field of Quaker journalism is wider than many would suppose until they had investigated it—and of remarkable variety and interest. May this superficial commentary stimulate such investigation!

SURELY in these days nobody wants an easy life or an easy religion. "An easy religion is a horrible offence," said Carlyle.

Talk of "popular Christianity"! You might as well speak of popular typhus or popular crucifixion.

Garibaldi offered his men hunger, forced marches and death, but not a soldier left.

Ultimately, in the deepest sense, crucifixion is popular. "I, IF I BE LIFTED UP, WILL DRAW ALL MEN UNTO ME," said Jesus, who asked of the world nothing but a cross whereon to die.

Take therefore your share of hardness. There is no future for the Church till we enter it in spirit on our knees.—JOHN ALEXANDER HUTTON, of Glasgow.

EDUCATION.

[We have solicited the following papers from the Principal of Germantown School. They were read at a Tea Meeting in Germantown last Third Month. The aim of that meeting was to bring home to the membership the opportunities and privileges of a well-conducted school in establishing and transmitting Christian principles in a religious Society and in the community. There were several other papers or addresses more technical than these, but all of great value to an understanding of the special Germantown problem. The two papers herewith presented should be of general interest. We cherish the hope that they will quicken in other meetings something of the corporate interest that is now such an important asset of our largest Friends' school.—EDS.]

A PARENT'S POINT OF VIEW AND A COMMITTEE FRIEND'S CONCERN.

MARION HAINES EMLIN.

I am going to speak to you to-night from a different point of view from that of the earlier speakers,—that is, from the point of view of a mother of five children, all in our school, and also from the point of view of a member of Germantown Monthly Meeting, one who is most anxious to see the Meeting grow and develop along lines of greatest usefulness and power.

I might say in the beginning that our children represent every department of the School:—Kindergarten, Primary, Intermediate, and High School—so that we have a very good opportunity to know the School as a whole. It was six years ago that we started our two oldest children in the Kindergarten and the Primary. From that day to this my belief in the really democratic purpose of our school and my admiration and love for our teachers has grown year by year, and I can say with great earnestness, that both my husband and I wish no better preparation for their life work for our children than that which they are now getting. We feel that from Kindergarten to High School the influences working for their development are entirely satisfactory.

I wish to lay especial stress on our appreciation of the work in the earlier grades. It is in the Kindergarten and Primary that good habits in conduct and ways of study are being formed. We feel that the teachers are very much alive to their duty and opportunity along this line. Their loving care of each individual child in the formation of good moral habits is very unusual. They consult with the parents and enlist their co-operation, and also do a great deal toward inspiring new and better planning in the home life of the children. It is perfectly natural that a child should show one side of his character to his teachers and quite another at home. The working together of parents and teacher throws light on the child as a whole, and often helps very materially to solve some perplexing questions. A parent not long ago said to the Superintendent of the Primary, "I shall be so sorry when my children outgrow the Primary. It is so like a big family." Is it not a splendid thing to feel that we can count on such influences for the early years of our boys and girls? Let us not think for a moment that in order to make room for our enlarged High School we should help matters by giving up our Primary Department! Our whole beautiful scheme of character building from babyhood to college would be ruined, and our school would not be able to send out into the world young men and young women so well prepared either mentally, morally, or physically for their battle with life.

When I say that I feel that our school is entirely satisfactory in the training of our children, I do not mean to imply that it is incapable of development and growth. Any place of learning for the coming generation must change and grow with the new thoughts of the world, and that is what our school is doing. The teachers are watching with great interest the new ideals in education that are being tried in many places. They go to summer schools where they learn new methods, they visit schools around Philadelphia and elsewhere, in Baltimore, Buffalo, Pittsburgh and Chicago, where these new ideas are being demonstrated, and they come back to us to put into practice for our children the influences that make for real progress. The result is what we believe a Norwegian educator, after a recent visit to our school, truthfully said:—"You cannot believe how many features worth copying I picked up in the short time I was there. Other schools I found that had been more radical, but which, on the other hand, had something unfinished and nervous about them; but at Friends' School there was a calmness and tradition, and yet the school was fully modern."

A very important factor in the spiritual life of our school is Bible Study. At almost any time on Second-day, if you visit the school, you can attend a class in Bible Study or Social Problems based on Bible teaching. It was my good fortune not long ago to attend several of these classes in company with Dr. Hugh Hartshorne of Union Theological Seminary. He was very much impressed with the good Bible teaching our boys and girls are getting, and encouraged us to develop it still further. Certainly there must be many chances for a wide-awake teacher to help the scholars solve their every day problems by practical application of Bible teaching, and I know our teachers make the best possible use of opportunities in this way. In this connection it is interesting to remember that at the recent National Educational Conference which Stanley Yarnall, Elizabeth Roberts and I attended, special emphasis was laid on the fact that the greatest weakness of our public school system was its lack of constructive work for high ideals of thought and action.

And now I come to my second point—the relation of our Meeting to our School. The school, I believe, draws its inspiration from our Meeting, but I regret to say I think it is for the most part in a very indirect way. It is true that the Meeting appoints a large Committee to help the Principal and teachers manage the affairs of the School. It listens with calm attention every year to a School report throbbing with vital interests of the community. It marvels at the scope of the work being done, and sometimes raises critical questions as to the increasing size of the school. Aside from that, I feel the interest taken by the Meeting in the School is very impersonal, and the Meeting as a whole stands aloof. I am speaking very plainly, but having thought this over for nine years, ever since I became a member of the School Committee, I feel it is time to speak plainly, and what I say is from the point of view of constructive criticism. So many splendid things are happening on the other side of that little strip of hard-used playground that the Meeting should know, and that, if known, would bring added strength and inspiration to us all. Therefore, what I want to urge, is a greater knowledge of the School on the part of our Meeting as a whole. Let us visit the School! We shall be very welcome. Let us talk with the teachers about their work, their ideals, their interest in each individual child, and their hopes for his future, their interest in the Alumni, many of whom are making fine records in college, business, or constructive home work! Let us discuss the problems of the School, the need for more room for the High School, and a new Gymnasium! I wonder how many of those who have disapproved of the growing size of the School have taken the time to find the reasons back of this growth! We parents know because we attend the games and entertainments our children take part in, and see the vital effect that school spirit has on the whole life of the School, but this is a subject that cannot be discussed here.

These visits would reveal to us many things, and I feel sure would lead to a spirit of sympathy and understanding very necessary to both Meeting and School. There are many ways in which the Meeting could help and inspire the teachers, and the Meeting itself would gain untold strength through the broader field of service in the community opened by the School.

We should discover by our visits why we are able to keep our teachers with us year after year in the face of inducements of higher salaries and attractive work elsewhere. They often are tempted to leave us, for we do not treat them very well as far as salaries and equipment go, and the lure of college positions and higher pay have to be reckoned with. In talking over the matter, it is invariably the same answer: "We love the School and its spirit of Christian fellowship. We are very happy here, because we are allowed to work out our own ideals. We, therefore, have set aside other considerations and will work on, hoping some day for more money and better things to work with." This spirit of loyalty permeates the whole School, teachers and scholars alike, and it is greatly due to the wise leadership of our Principal, who has carefully fostered the spirit of loving sympathy and co-operation and encourages independence of thought and work.

We should discover also through our visits how often the teachers resort to very Friendly methods in trying to solve the practical problems of school life. Not long ago there was a very interesting example of this. It was in one of the Intermediate classes that a boy made himself very unpopular. His classmates all leagueed themselves against him and decided to "do" him, in the slang phrase. The feeling ran very high and the spirit of forgiveness was utterly lacking. After several sessions of the teacher with the whole class, two boys were delegated to consider the matter further, and decide what should be done. Two of the teachers met with these boys, and after wrestling with the spirit of bitterness and revenge, they finally came to the point where they could sit down together in a little Friends' meeting, with very satisfactory results to all concerned. Such an experience in the lives of boys of eleven and twelve cannot fail to have a lasting effect upon them, and such experiences are not isolated facts, but quite frequent happenings during the school year.

The weekly attendance at Fifth-day Meeting must not be overlooked in discussing the things that count for spiritual progress in our School, and it is there truly that our Monthly Meeting, through our ministry, does touch the School directly. We wish that the attendance on the part of members might be larger, and that the words spoken might reflect at times, even more than they do, our responsibility to these young people. Surely when we look into that sea of eager faces we must feel the need of giving them vital spiritual food. Can we not see the opportunities that lie before the Meeting in its power to influence those young lives, and through them their parents? Not long ago two mothers, not Friends, came to our mid-week Meeting. How many more would come if they were given an invitation? This whole subject needs further thought and adjustment. It has been suggested by one of the teachers in the Primary that we should have a Meeting for the younger children who now do not go with the others because of lack of room. Here is another possible opening for co-operation. I feel sure that many other ways of working together for our mutual benefit would be found upon further consideration. I have a very bright picture before me of a future with our Meeting and our School working along side by side for the spreading of the knowledge of right living throughout our community, broadening the sphere of contact of both, embracing evident opportunities for service, and diligently searching for those not so evident. Surely if that spiritual co-operation can be brought to pass there is no telling to what extent our influence for good may reach. Mutual sympathy, interest and understanding will instinctively grow up among us, our problems will be mutual problems for the furthering of the good of the whole. I trust that this picture will not long be merely a dream, but will soon grow into a reality worthy of the position we hold in the community.

THE OPPORTUNITIES OF A PRIVATE SCHOOL TO EXERT AN INFLUENCE IN THE COMMUNITY.

DOROTHY BROOKE.

The word "opportunities," as it is used here, means, I take it, the possibilities for promoting ideal citizenship, and therefore it would not be an extreme statement to declare that with the exception of parents, the teacher is confronted with greater and more numerous opportunities for developing such citizenship than is any person of any other existing profession; and because of the very vastness of this privilege, the responsibility is increased out of all proportion (to that responsibility) of any other profession. The school—any kind, anywhere, may or may not be a powerful instrument for good in the Community. The fact that you limit your noun by the adjective "private" should not, and in this case I believe does not, affect the driving power which comes out of the life of the school.

When I came from many years of teaching in country public schools to the Germantown Friends' School (to stay I thought for a year or two), it seemed quite impossible that there would be as much chance for character development here as there had been in a locality where all white children within a radius of five miles gathered in one high school building for the purpose of acquiring that very indefinite thing we call education.

Nor did it seem probable that the opportunities for helping towards right living and thinking could be as great here as in the little district school which I taught for two years—the kind of district school we read about, with its one teacher and forty or fifty ill-assorted, poorly graded little children—all drawn from that class we call "poor whites." You who have lived in cities do not know what that implies unless you have done social work or taught among them. Unless you have been brought face to face with the need it is impossible to realize the opportunities to teach them what we consider bare fundamentals in physical and moral right living—to say nothing of the "book-learning." The work was more like that of a district nurse in its attempts to instill the appreciation of fresh air, soap and water. There were regulations requiring that a definite number of pages in the text book be covered by the victimized pupils, and this was checked up by rigid examinations given by the county authorities. The formal and crowded curriculum of the public school left little time to teach the great vital principles of Quakerism—it was only very indirectly that such teaching could be introduced, and I was determined to discover whether the opportunity for more socialized teaching could be found in a Friends' school.

As I think I have said to some of you before, it was rather a surprise and somewhat disappointing at first to find when I came here that on superficial examination there was very little real consciousness of the fact that it was a Friends' school. But as I began to penetrate into the real life of the place, I found that the underlying foundations of the whole vast structure were essentially Friendly in every sense of the word. My original idea of teaching here for two years and then returning to the public school began to fade into the background as I found the rich and varied possibilities and needs which came to hand.

The common denunciations of the private school are—first, that it is absorbing interest, effort, and money which should be expended on the public school; and, secondly, that it is necessarily an undemocratic institution. The answer to the first is that the time must undoubtedly come when the public school will be so excellent, so socialized that competition will cause the private school to drop off like a dead leaf. But that time has not yet arrived, and until it does a school such as ours is more than justified by the potentialities of the citizens we turn out.

Society is so organized at present that many of our children by reason of their more richly cultural environment and the multitude of their material possessions will become leaders of the next generation. Is nothing due to these leaders? I do not advocate a social order which is so constructed that the cultured and wealthy have more chance to govern than those of lesser opportunities, but we must face facts and change them. And the great opportunity of this Meeting lies just here. You have an even greater privilege than have the teachers—we are merely your serviceable tools, for it is through you that the School is made a fact. You make it possible for an influence to radiate from here that may vitally Christianize and democratize our present social processes. This may sound Utopian, but do we realize that we are shaping here the lives of more than five hundred people? Think what a heaven that might be in a community! In our School there is a small per cent. of the pupils who are members of the Society of Friends. Through you it is possible to give the world what it needs in the great simplicities and truths of our Quaker belief. It is a stupendous and wonderful piece of work.

The criticism that the private school is undemocratic is of course very often true, but it seems almost superfluous to say that to my mind Germantown Friends' School is pre-eminently a school where the whole spirit of the place tends toward democracy. This may be seen not only in our Student Council which is becoming each day a stronger factor in school life, but is obvious in the organization and fellowship among the teachers and in the relationship between the children and their teachers. The good order and generally courteous attention during our morning collection is a proof of this. The criticism of our students by one of our new teachers is that they have a sense of balance which he has found lacking in the other places where he has taught.

One way in which the children in some of our classes are receiving training in democracy is in the dramatization and working out of plays. The teacher divides the class into half or quarter sections. They retire to separate rooms and work in groups as industriously as if the teacher were present. The social pressure of the others is sufficient to keep down any too lively spirits.

An example of toleration and fair play is the way in which during the war the children of so-called enemy alien parents were treated at school. Though we cannot say that conditions were absolutely ideal, it is nevertheless a tribute to the spirit of our boys and girls that those children are still in our School.

I have tried to show that the first and most important opportunities of the teacher in the democratic private school is the chance for molding character along the lines of ideal citizenship. By ideal citizenship I do not mean merely passive morality, but that active life which is never satisfied with the status quo if it fall short of the highest ideals of the individual. There are concrete evidences of this which might be cited. Many of our graduates are giving their lives to service. And in the School there are definite ways in which we can see how pupils have completely reorganized their attitude towards life. One teacher said to a boy recently, "Do you notice any difference in yourself? Are you the same boy you were two years ago?" "No," replied the boy, "I'm not the same. Two years ago I was trying to get out of everything I possibly could." This pupil is one of our most solid citizens in the lower high school. Another boy in the Intermediate School has in the last two months taken an absolutely fresh start, thanks to the interest and influence of one of the teachers. He was lazy, untruthful and careless throughout the fall. There is now such an amazing difference in his quiet, earnest, helpful attitude that it is remarked on by all the teachers with whom he comes in contact. These instances could be multiplied had I time.

The second great advantage that we have over the public school is in the Bible Study which we have throughout the classes. Those of us who have taught in First-day School know that we meet the child here on an entirely different ground. There are all sorts of opportunities for the discussion with the child of his theories of life—one of the Intermediate Boys' Classes in Bible was discussing Moses' Commission from God, and the question was raised as to whether any of them received similar messages. They decided that they sometimes did, but not as often as was desirable. They worked it out until they arrived at the conclusion that it was rather a matter of accident whether or not they entered into communion with God each day. As homework for the following week each boy was asked to make out a program of his day from his waking to his bed-time. The class which followed must, I believe, sensibly influence most of them. A boy chairman was appointed, the day was blocked into three parts, and they carefully went over the programs which were very similar, always keeping the main point in view. They found that there were three times each day when they might get time to talk over their problems with God, and you may be sure that in addition to this great emphasis was laid on Meeting and its possibilities for Divine communion. There are very few subjects except the Bible which would permit a digression from the main course of study such as this, and yet it probably has much educative value.

There is one more opportunity which is almost a duty of the private school, and that is the great chance that we have for experimental work. This field is, I believe, practically untried by us except for the Primary Department, which is very much alive to the possibilities of more freedom and less formality in education. I hope very much that we can try this out in one or more classes. With our double sections it would be very easy to check up results. Perhaps we owe this much to education.

I wonder sometimes if all the individual members of this Meeting realize what they have here in this School. The growth has been so gradual—one thing has slipped into another so simply that it is easier for an outsider suddenly projected into the organization and life of the School to realize what a vital and powerful instrument it has become. It can make little difference now with what motives or ideals the work was begun. It has a dynamic personality of its own that is above the sway of the individual—a personality which may be used here and now to advance Quakerism or in its larger sense Christianity.

We enter a large cathedral—the shadowy, mysterious vistas, the streaming line of the nave, the soaring columns, and the richly blended light pouring from without through the "Divinely pictured window" all combine to cause a physical prostration. We feel as if we must drop on our knees, but in proportion our spirits leap up to do reverence to the almost overwhelming beauty of the place. We are momentarily one with the spirit of the man which through long years of effort—unlovely and painful at times—so crystallized in stone this reaching up towards the universal beauty of his God. We are constructing a like edifice here on our School grounds, only it is at once much more practical and far more ideal than the cathedral of stone, for we are helping here to build a commonwealth, a nation, a world brotherhood and our building blocks are living units with hands and brains and hearts. It is not often that we can see the whole blue print of our work—there are times when the press of daily routine blots from our minds the great design towards which we are working—there are moments of weariness when doubt and discouragement claim us. But they are transitory, and we are re-illuminated by those rare and precious moments when we glimpse the vision of our ideal and see our temple not made with hands rise before us in all its Divine splendor. It is then that we humbly thank God for our great privilege and pray that we may be made worthy of our further opportunities.

LETTER FROM DANIEL OLIVER.

[NOTE.—It is due Friends to know the point of view of the Service Committee toward the work in Syria under Daniel Oliver. The Committee agreed to act for Syria in receiving and forwarding all contributions made for that work. They also stipulated that they would make up the amount devoted to that work to $20,000 if the special contributions did not reach that amount. This they have done by using $7,000 of their funds. They are still most happy to act as transmitting agent, but special contributions to Syria are now rarely received. As one of the mediums of publicity THE FRIEND is inclined to believe that failure to keep the case alive in print, accounts in good degree for the falling off of contributions.—Eds.]

RAS-EL-METN, Syria.
Ninth Month 21, 1921.

WM. B. HARVEY:—

My Dear Friend:—Thine of the twenty-ninth of Seventh Month came to hand a fortnight ago. Thee can imagine that the news that the Service Committee had decided not to make any further appropriations for the work in Syria gave us a great shock. We feared they might make some reduction in the grant; we were not prepared for them to drop us all together. We have stopped all outside work. The spinning for the old women and widows—and the work for the girls in the carpet factory, and all the men and boys on outside work were dismissed three days ago. There remains the orphanages only, and if we do not get help we shall have to close these, too. The needs of Syria are still urgent.

The silk worm crop was a failure, and the price of silk, owing to the exchange, was half that of last year. So that people who have some land did not get enough to pay the taxes and the ploughing. The harvest, owing to the very small rainfall this spring, is very poor, and in consequence there is no hope of prices falling. There is no work to be had anywhere. Every one who can emigrate is leaving the country. It is not the time for Friends to curtail or close down the work here, and somehow I cannot believe they will. If it is necessary I shall return myself to America to plead the cause of Syria. In the meantime I beg thee to do all these possibly can to help the widow and the orphan, and the old women who have lost their all through the war. We do not want simply to give doles of food; we want to give work, by which they can earn what they can get. This applies to nearly all but the orphans. In the meantime we shall have to borrow money to carry on the Orphanage and to keep alive the worst cases.

With love from me all.

Thine very sincerely,

DANIEL OLIVER.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

LOOK BACK AND SMILE!—Mary lived in the same road as I. She was a busy little typist in the city, and so regular in leaving for her office, that when I heard the closing of the front door opposite, I knew the very minute to go and get ready to catch my train. From the first I took an interest in Mary; she was such a neat, tidy little person, and worked so hard to support herself and her invalid sister.

When I saw her start off for the city every morning, there was one thing that struck me particularly. As soon as she got to the third tree down the road, she turned to look back and smile to an upper window, where a thin white hand had drawn aside the neat, white curtain, and a kind, loving face looked out.

It was all as regular as clockwork. The bang of the street door opposite, the turn at the third tree, and the smile between the two sisters. I got to look for them. There seemed such an understanding and sympathy between them. It did not take long for me to get on speaking terms with Mary, and from her I learned that they were both Christians, and that the smile was also a God-speed for the one that worked in the busy world from the one that lay still all day and suffered at home.

For several years this went on, and then, quite suddenly, one day I heard the news of a death in our road. God had called the sufferer into the peace and rest of His Presence. A week passed by, and the funeral was over; the blinds were drawn up at the house across the way, and on a morning I heard the familiar bang of a street door. I walked to the window, and saw a black-clad little figure trudging off as usual. It was Mary. When she came to the third tree, I saw her hesitate, and look back. A lump came in my throat—there was no face at the window, the clean, white curtain hung in even folds, unmoved.

Then I saw Mary's head go down, as she stumbled along the road in a blinding grief that shook her frame.

I spoke to her later about it, and she told me that for weeks she used to feel that she must turn and look round, when she got to that familiar spot, but it was her concluding words that made me want to pass on her homely little story to you. She said: "I am so glad that in all the years that have gone,

I never missed looking back! On wet days it meant shifting my umbrella, on foggy ones standing still, but I'm so glad to think that as long as she looked for my smile, it was always there! Hers used to help me through my work—as did her prayers!"

Boys and girls who read this, many of you who still go to school, or to college, and some to work, there are perhaps faces at the window that smile you good-bye and God-speed at the beginning of the day.

It may be that mother is there, with your baby brother or sister in her arms; or it may be father, who waves his newspaper from the window; or grandma with her white hair—like a halo round her dear wrinkled face; and in that seeing you off and waving, they are wishing you well. How many prayers have followed us all to school and college and office from the dear ones at home!

But I want to ask you, do you always remember to turn back and smile, too? It may cost a bit of trouble when you don't feel like it, but it will bring you joy that will make up a thousand-fold.

For into each of our lives there comes a day when the face we loved best to see at the window looks out no more; when the parent, or brother or sister, who has walked beside us, and been our guide and helper for so many years, is taken away from us, and we have to go on the road alone!

Like Mary, happy will be our memories, not sad, if we can say truthfully: "We never failed to look back and smile."

Only one of the little things of life, do you say? Yes, but there are many of them, and, as Christian boys and girls who will one day be men and women, our thought and attention to these little things will mean much to our lives and to the lives of those about us.

You will all remember this little article long after you have read it and laid it aside. Perhaps it will help you to have more loving thought for those at home, in these days when many are forgetting those who need them most.

JAPANESE NOTES.

ONE OF OUR FRIENDS' SCHOOLS.

The school for girls on the hill called Hijirizaki is a standing proof that Friends are Friends the world around. There may be no other Friends' school that, while standing in the midst of a great city, commands a view of a perfect mountain on one side, and of one of the world's chief harbors on the other; there may be no other Quaker school-girls who address each other as "honorable," and bow to their teacher at the beginning of each class; but it is a real Friends' school all the same. The day begins with a class at eight o'clock, followed by a strenuous gymnastic drill, out-of-doors if possible; then come two more classes, and the half-hour of worship before lunch. The Philadelphian feels at home when he finds the girls assembled in silence, with black heads bent. The silence sometimes endures for ten or even twenty minutes before it is broken by a request for a hymn from teacher or student, or by Bible reading by the Principal or one of the teachers. More often it is shorter, and there is a talk of fifteen or twenty minutes' length. The topics vary with the individualities of the speakers—an exciting mountain-climb, one of Japan's most interesting women, or helpful thoughts on Christian living. There seems an admirable absence of haste and over-intensity in the school life that thus allows half an hour a day for worship, and perhaps half of that for silent meditation. After everyone has risen and bowed to the Principal, chapel is over, and there is what one girl calls a "merry, merry time" over the tea-kettle and the luncheons brought from home. On a sunny day the last part of the lunch-hour is filled with the talk and laughter—plenty of laughter—of girls out on the playground or tennis-court. Then come two more classes, and under Student Government behavior must not slacken as the day goes on.

After school, there may be a Christian Endeavor meeting, which is conducted with great simplicity and earnestness by the twenty-five or thirty full members—girls who are professing Christians. A large proportion of the other girls attend and seem very much interested. Here again there is a surprising amount of silence, but when a girl speaks it is always most simply and naturally. About thirty of these girls come from Christian homes, friendly or other, yet they seem to be able to control the spirit of all the rest to such a degree that the school atmosphere is unfaillingly helpful. Of course the teachers' influence must not be forgotten; most of them join strong Christian character to a high grade of intellectual achievement, and they form a group of which any Friends' school might be proud. The majority are women, who hold before their girls a new ideal of Japanese womanhood that is of more value than all the book-learning they can win, for they must spur them on to create in themselves a generation of women free from the shackles of superstition and custom that have bound their mothers. In their appreciation of and respect for women, Friends in Japan are here proving their allegiance to the good tradition of Friends everywhere.

THE BURDEN OF THE WORLD.

Address of Rufus M. Jones at Meeting in Philadelphia, Tenth Month 13, 1921.

We have listened this evening to an appalling story of the tragedy that is moving across the world and is powerfully concentrated at certain places in the European countries. But no story that anybody brings to an American audience is at all adequate to make that audience realize what is actually being endured in those countries. If you ever tried to describe the Grand Cañon after you come back and to tell your friends about it, you know how hopeless you found the undertaking. Or, if you ever tried to tell a friend of yours about the wonderful traits of your first child, you know how completely you failed to make him or her realize what that child actually meant. We cannot do it. Nobody will quite see. And yet we have had enough this evening to make us know in some sense, I am sure, so that we never shall forget it again—what the aftermath and the by-products of a war really are; and never again shall we think of war in terms of flags and processions and medals and glory; we shall always think of war in terms of hunger, starvation, death, anguish, nakedness, cold—disintegration of family life—death and starvation of little children!

And it is not only in Austria that our great concern must focus. There will be between 40,000 and 50,000 children this winter between the ages of zero and four in Austria that must be fed. There are families that are stretching across the whole city who cannot clothe themselves this winter. While Wilbur Thomas and I were in Vienna the highest paid university professor of twenty years' standing received $27 a month. That was when the kronen was at the rate of 650 for a dollar; now the rate is between three and four thousand for a dollar, and the professor's salary goes right on the same, and he is better paid than almost anybody else that is receiving a salary. All that is on our hands this winter; and we cannot turn away from it. But we cannot forget Poland, either.

I wish I could make you see it—I wish I had the power to describe the experience of watching refugees come back from Central Russia to their homes in Eastern Poland. Six months those refugees have been walking since they started to return. They went out in 1916; they have lived all these years on charity, and on what they could gather with their hands in the lands of exile. They are now coming back, walking six months to get home—wet, cold, hungry, ragged, filthy, covered with vermin, carrying little children in their arms or leading them by the hand, and carrying on their backs all they have in the world.

With the same clothes on they have been wearing through these long, weary years. They have come back to find everything gone, gone! To find every cow, horse, sheep and goat gone! To find no land ploughed since 1916—grown up with weeds and to all sorts of jungles. And our boys and women met them when they come.

I wish you could see it. They are the Friends that plough their fields for them. They give them clothes; they start them living again; and this winter those boys are to get out the lumber to put back the houses in those ruined villages. It is impossible to let that work stop. And no power on earth can describe Russia! And the needs of the children there! We hoped we should be done making urgent appeals for large sums of money for relief in Europe. There was a long period when we did not make any at all; we just talked about things and wrote about things in a simple fashion and the money flowed in; because everybody was stirred and everybody was quickened and everybody was generous and everybody wanted the work to go on; but it drags along, month after month, and the burden has grown and the difficulties have enlarged and business is now hard and we know all about that. But we cannot let this work stop! We cannot even slow down. The necessity of the case compels that the work go on; and so we come more to lay upon the hearts of Friends for these coming months the burden of the world's suffering. In the greatest speech that a young Friend ever made, I think, John Wilhelm Rowntree closed with these words:

"O, Lord! lay upon us the burden of the world's suffering."

I wonder if, in his heavenly home, he realizes how God has laid upon our Society the burden of the world's suffering. Dear Friends, it is for us all to bear together—and this is one of the things that no single person can do; it is for us all to come under it and to do our part; and I can tell you out of a clear experience that nothing is quite so wonderful I have ever known in my life as the way in which this great service has touched the heart of the world in Europe. May God help us—these hard and difficult coming months—to do our full part.

RUSSIAN FEEDING STATIONS.

The American Relief Administration has established 22 warehouses and child-feeding centers in the Kazan, Simbirsk, Ufa, Orenburg, Saratof and Izasitzin districts, thus covering the heart of the famine area of Russia along the Volga River.

In the Tartar Republic of Kazan the American Relief Administration was on Tenth Month 15th feeding 114,000 children daily in 62 kitchens. In addition there are warehouses and feeding stations in Petrograd and Moscow.

The Friends are now maintaining stations at Moscow, Buzuluk and Samara.

DWELLERS IN DARKNESS.

I happened to be talking about after-war conditions to an official in Brest-Litovsk.

"Are they pretty bad in this town?" I asked.

He smiled at the question, as though it betrayed my hopeless ignorance, and said, "Come to the window."

I looked out. It was not an inviting view, certainly, but I saw nothing particularly striking, certainly nothing that indicated bad conditions. On the corner of the street, right opposite, was a vacant plot of land, strewn with bricks and rubbish; we have many similar plots, where houses have been pulled down, in any of our large cities. That was all, and that was not interesting; and I said so.

"Do you see those two holes?" Yes, I had noticed them, in the centre of the plot; two large holes of an oblong shape, and seemingly leading to the cellars of the old house. "They are the entrances to homes, where human beings, where little children live."

Dwellers in darkness! There were no windows, no ventilators; they were cellars that even the rats would shun. One wondered curiously what kind of life the inhabitants must live. The little children came up and played on the rubbish-strewn plot: played on the roofs of their homes! I wondered; did the fathers and mothers have the heart to play with the children sometimes?

And seventy-five per cent. of that town had been thus destroyed by the armies as they retreated. A large part of the town consisted of such rubbish and brick-strewn plots. How many dwellers in darkness were there altogether in that town, then?

"Dwellers in darkness, and in the shadow of death!"

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

This week a meeting of the Friends' Peace Council was held in Philadelphia with an attendance of about sixteen, including a few specially invited guests. Frederick Libbey spoke very earnestly of the responsibility of Friends for work towards disarmament. He does not think that such work will be over in a few short weeks, but rather that it will take a period of years. On our side, he said, will be other organizations in whose programs disarmament will be a side issue and who will stick by us as they can. The real burden of the movement, however, he thinks will have to be borne by Friends. Friends have a conscientious conviction and that is the only thing that will carry the thing through. He spoke of the need of arousing Friends to the situation. Disarmament is to our day, in his opinion, what the abolition of slavery was in the period between 1850 and 1860. His remarks stirred those present to a wider vision of what Friends might do if they were once really aroused to their power and their responsibility. Short accounts of what has already been done by the different groups were given by the disarmament secretaries. Dr. O. Edward Janney, speaking for the seven Yearly Meetings of Hicksite Friends, reported a list of speakers for meetings numbering about seventy. In Indiana, through the concern of one Friend, a campaign is going on in the high schools. A syllabus for speaking has been prepared and is offered for distribution where it may be used. Each monthly meeting has a key man who is responsible for organizing the members of that meeting, and a campaign for at least a dollar a head is being put through. The Five Years' Meeting, represented at the conference by Allan D. Hole, of Indiana, is at work on the large task of getting in touch with its widely scattered groups. William F. Wickersham gave a report of the activities of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Dr. William I. Hull, who was also present, has been appointed to be in Washington at the time of the Conference and will keep our various groups of Friends in touch with what is being done. He and the Friends who appointed him to this service, are deeply concerned that some effort should be made to meet the delegates and to present to them the point of view of our Society. Elbert Russell reminded us that it was a young Friend attached to the diplomatic service who suggested to the diplomats that the Canadian border should be left unguarded on both sides after the war of 1812.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

FRIENDS' EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION had its annual meeting at Westtown on the 29th. We are promised a report for our next number.

ANNA J. HAINES addressed a large audience at Twelfth Street on the evening of the 28th ult. In a masterful way she presented the tragedy of Russia and made it clear how we can all do something in the most painful emergency.

THE Monthly Meeting at Fourth and Arch Streets on the 27th ult. gave Joseph Thomasson a Minute for service in three small meetings in Ohio. It is hoped that some Elder in Ohio will accompany him. At the same Monthly Meeting a Minute of unity and sympathy was issued for Edith Stratton Platt. She and her husband are soon to go to Mukden, Manchuria. They expect to establish a Christian home there, and greatly desire the continued interest and sympathy of the home meeting in their faraway service.

WALTER G. HEACOCK with the account of Seeborn Rowntree's visit to Detroit, gave some information of the Friendly circle there during the past three months. Ray Wollam has gone to Arizona because of his wife's health. Anna M. Kelsey has taken up his work at the Centre, Second and Ledyard Avenue. She and her husband, W. Irving Kelsey, who has charge of the Y. M. C. A. work for the State of Michigan, reside there.

Meetings, our correspondent says, have been regularly held during the past summer with "a splendid attendance." The "youthful elements in the meeting are being organized into working units and hopes are high for a successful winter."

SEEBORN ROWNTREE was in Philadelphia on the 26th ult. It is understood that he spoke on Industrial Relations at the Bellevue-Stratford during the day and to a group of the Social Order Committee at the Adelphi Hotel in the evening.

THE death in Germantown of Lydia C. Wood in her seventy-seventh year removes one well known in a wide circle. Her two books, "The Haydock Testimony," and "For a Free Conscience," put Quaker (Christian) fundamentals in very appealing form. The latter volume is out of print, and there has been some recent demand for a new edition. She was a frequent correspondent of the editors of THE FRIEND, often submitted valuable articles in both prose and verse and lent her encouragement to the publication in other ways.

At a recent meeting of the Board of Managers of Haverford College, William Aldrich Battey was elected a member of the Board. He is a graduate of the Class of 1890, of Haverford; President of the Borton-Tierney Company, etc.

NOTICES.

MERCHANTVILLE MEETING will be held at three o'clock p. m., Eleventh Month 6th. Trolley cars leaving Market Street Ferry, Camden, stop at Maple Terrace, directly in front of Meeting-house.

A FRIEND who is a subscriber for The Friend (London), the Friends' Fellowship Papers, and the Friends' Quarterly Examiner would gladly share these periodicals with really interested readers, if they will make application to the Editors of this paper.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING.—By action taken in Fifth Month last the time of holding Eleventh Month Quarterly Meeting was fixed as the Seventh-day preceding the first Second-day of the Eleventh Month, at 1 P. M., the Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders to be the Sixth day preceding at 2.30 P. M.

Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting will occur this year on Eleventh Month 5th, at 1 o'clock. Lunch will be served at Arch Street Meeting-house at 12 o'clock, noon.

Please extend an invitation to be present to all interested Friends, whether members of our Quarterly Meeting or not.

A Philanthropy That Pays Dividends

The Whittier Center Housing Company offers an opportunity for the readers of "The Friend" to make an investment of their funds in a work that will bring health and happiness to others, and, at the same time, make a return in cash dividends to themselves.

Incorporated in 1916, The Whittier Center Housing Company has engaged in the building and leasing of houses to colored people. The need for such housing was very clearly shown in a survey of the conditions in the city a few years ago. Modern, airy, clean homes are the best means to promote a healthy environment, which makes its return in better citizens, in reduced crime and disease.

The real estate owned by the Company consists of six houses, erected by the Company in 1916, at Dickinson and Opal Streets, and thirty-two houses on Moss Street, in a colored section in West Philadelphia. The management of the houses is cared for by special arrangement with the Octavia Hill Association. This insures the best possible management of the houses, and keeps us in very close touch with our tenants.

The Whittier Center Housing Company now owns real estate to the value of $100,000. In order that improvements can go on and new projects may be started as soon as practical, it is necessary to sell more of the common stock, which has been made available by the increase of the capital stock from $25,000 to $200,000. The Company has paid a 5% dividend annually since its organization. For further information, address HORACE F. CASE, 613 Lombard Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE EDUCATIONAL PULSE.

We were happy to put in circulation last week the two illuminating papers under the caption, Education. As their readers observed they were written from the point of view of one of our well-organized Monthly Meeting Schools. It has a wealth of tradition behind it and years of progress along the most intelligent lines to its credit. This week we are fortunate in having a very good report of the Conference of elementary teachers, held on the morning of the 20th in Philadelphia, and of the annual meeting of Friends' Educational Association at Westtown that afternoon. Mary Lewis, who has made the Park School at Buffalo so famous, was the speaker at both of these occasions. Thus in a fortnight we are able to present two poles of educational interest. The one concentrates attention upon the growth of a well-developed educational organism; the other deals with the primal impulses of child life in their struggle for natural expression against formality and convention. Between the two points of view there is an opportunity to register the pulse of Friends on the whole subject of education, so generally conceded to be of paramount interest in human society.

There is apparently a good measure of educational interest amongst us, but the record of only 150 Friends at an annual educational meeting, with all the charm of the autumn environment of beautiful Westtown as a subsidiary attraction, is measurably disappointing. We can go back in memory to similar occasions when more than 300 assembled. With the sage look of a medical practitioner it may be said the educational pulse of our Friendly circle is regular, but not strong enough. We might also let the medical authority remind us that a very low pulse is often a seriously menacing condition. We begin to sympathize also with one of our most experienced Headmasters in his query, "Do Friends really believe in education?"

As to the Annual Meeting, there doubtless were those who made the mistake of thinking the program as announced was technical, with a special appeal to the class-room teacher, but of very limited interest in the general field. The reverse of this fact was true. Mary Lewis is a constructive iconoclast, if one can combine two words of such opposite meaning. She carries her hearers back to fundamentals, back to the great educational reformers. Now it is Froebel pleading through her that the natural joy of a child's play shall be transmuted into the joy of work (school work and life work). Again as she proceeds we are listening to Rousseau in his passionate pleas for freedom. Directly the best that Herbart did for interest in education is finding a modern expression in her fervent manner. Through all, the loving spirit of Pestalozzi reflects the consummate skill of the great Master who "set the child in the midst" for all time. One has the conviction that there are eternal principles of education; that education is actually a spiritual field; that each one of us can make a contribution, not by seeking the methods of another, but by letting these "eternal principles" break through us in constantly new and renewed forms of expression. Convention and formality melt away in a stream of renewed life. Not a little of this spirit is reflected in Olive R. Haviland's excellent report. We trust its reading will inspire us all to seek a new baptism for ourselves in the eternal principles without which home and school education easily becomes dry as dust formality.

"HE FAILETH NOT."

When burdened with the toilsome cares of life,
And weary of its pain and woe and strife—
As sun to drooping flow'r, as rain to parch'd spot,
Comes this—"He faileth not."

When griefs assail, and sorely press the soul,
And wave on wave of sorrows 'round us roll—
As oil on raging seas, a word (so oft forgot!)
Brings peace—"He faileth not."

When doubts arise, and Faith droops low her wings,
And Hope no longer lifts her voice and sings—
Like music to the soul, the Spirit, sweet and soft,
Breathes low—"He faileth not."

Hope lifts her head, and Faith begins to soar;
Our hand we place in His, and feel no more
The trial and the burden of our earthly lot;
We know—"He faileth not."

We need not bear alone our grief and woe;
We need not through the days so blindly go;
No word of God's shall pass, nor title, nor a jot—
'Tis true—"He faileth not."

—JENNIE WILSON-HOWELL, in The Transcript.

We can give worldliness a very pious appearance. We can throw a sort of priestly cloak about a deed which goes forth to devour a widow's house. We can be amazingly expert in diluting moral obligation and mixing wine with water. We can betray our Lord with a compromise. Aye, there is a way of selling an article which at the same time sells the Lord. When the moral light burns low vices begin to parade as virtues, and it may come to be that we are scarcely aware of the delusion.—JOHN HENRY JOWETT.

A WARLESS WORLD.

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

[Call the Conference in Washington what we will, Friends must rejoice that the very anticipation of it has made so general the reaction for a "warless world." We step aside for a moment from the field of Quakerism and present to our readers some material to show how wide-spread this reaction is. The first item is in the form of a prayer submitted to us by Henry H. Collins, Jr. The fact that this aspiration is in so many hearts, and that it will find expression in so many directions is full of encouragement even to us who do not use formal prayers.—EDS.]

PRAYER.

Almighty God, who hast made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on the face of the whole earth, and didst send thy blessed Son to preach peace to them that are far off and to them that are nigh; we pray Thee to give the spirit of wisdom and consecration to those who will soon meet together to consider the subject of a reduction in armaments.

In their deliberations may it become more and more clear to them that a nation's safety lies not in the number of its battleships or the size of its mighty guns,—but in justice, mercy and the fear and love of God. May selfish national interests recede into the background as there develops a spirit of brotherhood and good-will.

Grant that practical means may be found to accomplish the ends sought so that the sword of international warfare will soon be forever sheathed, and even in this generation a great step forward be taken in righteousness and in the establishment of Thy Kingdom upon earth.

All this we ask in the name of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE Federal Council of Churches has issued a "Creed for Believers in a Warless World," a study of four lessons which women's organizations are utilizing, and a handbook of information for ministers and speakers. The Creed is new and is as follows:—

A WARLESS WORLD.

A CREED PROPOSED TO THE CHURCHES OF AMERICA FOR ADOPTION.

We believe in a sweeping reduction of armaments.

We believe in international laws, Courts of Justice, and Boards of Arbitration.

We believe in a world-wide association of nations for world peace.

We believe in equality of race treatment.

We believe that Christian patriotism demands the practice of good-will between nations.

We believe that nations no less than individuals are subject to God's immutable moral laws.

We believe that peoples achieve true welfare, greatness and honor through just dealing and unselfish service.

We believe that nations that are Christian have special international obligations.

We believe that the spirit of Christian brotherhood can conquer every barrier of trade, color, creed and race.

We believe in a warless world and dedicate ourselves to its achievement.

A WORLD APPEAL TO ALL LOVERS OF PEACE.

An appeal to work for a warless world has gone out from this country to National Councils of a World Alliance in twenty-three nations. They are Great Britain, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Finland, Belgium, Esthonia, Greece, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Roumania, Jugoslavia, Bulgaria, Japan, Turkey, Spain and Portugal. A handbook of ammunition arguments is to be sent later to all of the one hundred and fifty thousand ministers in the United States and to all newspapers.

The final demand of the churches upon the Conference is as follows:—

Above all else this Conference calls for vision, for moral and spiritual idealism. It needs to be led by what Christians call the spirit of God, to have what the followers of Jesus call the mind of Christ. Whatever be the forms of faith of its members, it calls for spiritual devotion to those ideals of humanity which all nations at their best share with each other.

Finally, men and women of the churches are called upon to work as well as pray, and this call the preachers are asked to make in clarion tones. They are to remind their people that the only salvation of nations as of men that holds out is the salvation that is worked out. Further efforts on the part of united Christian and Jewish powers are promised up to the very end of the Conference, the sessions of which the churches expect will continue well into the winter months.

VISCOUNT BRYCE ON DEMOCRACY.

"The history of the republic [of the United States of America] furnishes an instructive example of the perpetual conflict between the forces of idealism and the forces of selfishness. The first generation set out with an idealistic faith in liberty, in equality, and in the wisdom of the people. The second and third generations, absorbed by the passion for the development of their country's resources and distracted by the struggle over Negro slavery, allowed abuses and corruptions to grow up, left practical politics to be dominated by a self-constituted oligarchy of professionals, and without losing their theoretical devotion to liberty forgot that monarchs are not its only enemies, and that it may be threatened by money as well as by arms. Then in the fourth and fifth generations there came an awakening. The recuperative forces in the nation reasserted themselves. Both the old parties (so far as their organization went) failed to give the guidance needed, and there was much groping and stumbling in the search for remedies to cure the evils which all had begun to perceive. But the forces that were making for good have continued to gain strength. The old ideals of a government which shall be pure as well as popular, and shall unite the whole people in a disinterested patriotism that values national righteousness as well as national greatness, have again become beacon lights of inspiration.

"No Englishman who remembers American politics as they were half a century ago, and who, having lived in the United States, has formed an affection as well as an admiration for its people,—what Englishman who lives there can do otherwise?—will fail to rejoice at the many signs that the sense of public duty has grown stronger, that the standards of public life are steadily rising, that democracy is more and more showing itself a force making for ordered progress, true to the principles of liberty and equality from which it sprang."

As for the future of democracy, Bryce qualifies it with this statement: "The question whether men will rise toward the higher standard which the prophets of democracy deemed possible has been exercising every thoughtful mind since August, 1914, and it will be answered less hopefully now than it would have been at any time in the 100 years preceding." But this is the substance of his final word: "No government demands so much from the citizen as democracy and none gives so much back. Any free people that has responded to the call of duty and come out of a terrible ordeal unshaken in courage, undimmed in vision, with its vital force still fresh and strong, need not fear to face the future." "The statesmen and philosophers of antiquity did not dream of a government in which all men of every grade should bear a part; democracy was for them a superstructure erected on a substructure of slavery. Modern reformers, bolder and more sanguine, called the multitude to power with the hope and in the faith that the gift of freedom and responsibility would kindle the spirit self-government requires. For them, as for Christian theologians, hope was one of the cardinal virtues. . . . So may it be said that democracy will never perish until after hope has expired."

EDUCATION.

SOME AIMS IN "PROGRESSIVE EDUCATION."

An eager body of teachers in the Yearly Meeting's Schools of both branches of Friends, together with representatives of local committees and others interested in education met at Friends' Select School on Seventh-day morning, the twenty-ninth of Tenth Month. The meeting was opened by Ida Stabler. After referring to our disappointment that Gertrude Roberts Sherer, whose thought and inspiration had arranged this meeting for the teachers under her care, could not be with us, she presented Mary H. Lewis of the Park School, Buffalo. For more than an hour we listened to the words of this great teacher. We were asked to watch the child as he prepares for his first day at school with his high hope, wonderful joy, marvelous faith in what is coming. Never again does this faith come in just the same way. Is there any possibility that we can keep in the child that attitude of mind towards work, play, people and living, that he has as he enters our school for the first time? We do not have to make the attitude, we have only to preserve it. School, as Mary Lewis sees it, is just the experience of learning to live. The aims of education are the same whether in kindergarten or college. We should aim to educate for better living. The ideals which are fundamental in the Park School are briefly stated: (1) Ability to think independently. (2) Courage to express ideas. (3) Letting the child assume responsibility. (4) Consideration and thoughtfulness of others' rights. (5) Ability to work with other people. (6) Ability to form his own standards in all his work. (7) Keeping the child's imagination; this becomes vision in older people. (8) Leading the child to cultivate and appreciate beauty, a love for color, sound and order in the world about him. (9) Giving him an attitude of joy in his creative work. (10) Teaching him the value of health. (11) Training him how to make use of his leisure time. With the cognizance that the child is a living, growing organism, these ideals are actually worked out in the Park School, which Mary Lewis founded, in a very remarkable way.

Our meeting in the morning with a comparatively small group, expanded into a meeting of the Friends' Educational Association, as with our inspiring teacher, Mary H. Lewis, we took the train for Westtown School, whose favored guests we were to be for the rest of the day. As we gathered about 150 strong in the library of the School, our spirits were quickened with a sense of our great responsibility and our obligation to the children not only in our schools and homes but in the world at large. Mary Lewis continued her talk of the morning, with an intimate story of her adventure in education in founding and developing Park School. She showed us how her experiment had grown out of her own experience of the need of the child for a free natural life, where he might have space and opportunity to create, to express himself; in other words, where he might have a chance. She believes that children cannot help growing any more than plants, under conditions suited to them. If our democracy expects citizens out of our schools it must not wait until children are of High School age to teach them Civics. There must be a natural growth from their early years up. The Park School has stood the test. As its boys go out to enter other and formal schools, they become leaders in scholarship and ability. Nor does this "progressive education" mean an easy or "soft" life for the children in their school work. Rather, the children work hard at achieving the thing they are doing, whether building a road or making a bread pudding, and their joy is in the achievement. Not alone mind and body, but spirit, too, are developed as they work for the common good. The spirit of service is a great aim in this modern school. "Whatever you are after in education, that you will surely get," is the belief of this teacher of vision. Ideals will not die. They will go on, enlarging. We were told of large plans now being worked out for this school; of the farm of sixty acres that has been purchased, in spite of opposition from hard-headed trustees, of the High School that is now at work with the same ideals of education that have been worked out in the elementary school, and of the real little New England village which is to be built for the Primary School, on the farm, where every child will have a real ownership in his house and will in home and shop repeat the story of the race.

At the close of the afternoon meeting, we were again reminded that we were guests of Westtown, and that it was our privilege to make such use of the beautiful resources of woods and field and lake as we had time for. We were later invited to the dining-room of the School for supper. After this happy social hour together, most of the company gladly welcomed the opportunity to listen to a fine lecture which Westtown offered to us as the final inspiration for the day. As we turned homeward came the insistent command to our spirits—"Be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving yourselves." Such ideals of highest development for the child as are being worked out in a few schools to-day should be as beacon lights to Friends.

LITERATURE COUNCIL MEETS.

The announcement of the formation of a joint literature council among American Friends was published in The American Friend of First Month 13, 1921.

This council held its third meeting on Tenth Month 27th, at Richmond. The work of the first year was reviewed and found to be perhaps all that could have been expected at the beginning. One pamphlet had been published and given wide circulation, even though publishing is not the distinct aim of the council. Definite progress had been made in the matter of enabling the various agencies better to co-operate. Information had been distributed concerning both English and American publications. English publishers had been assisted by being informed as to the number of books that could be used in America. The agencies had been given real help in distributing books and creating a demand for Friendly literature, especially by the interchange of ideas at the council meetings.

At this meeting the feeling prevailed that the main work of the council was to promote the use of the wealth of good literature which Friends already have. This is to be done by creating a demand for this kind of reading and by disseminating information about specific works so as to cultivate an interest and create an appetite for these.

However, it was found that by this co-operation certain good books could be made certain of publication, definite needs for certain works could be made known so that these would be produced. One instance of this came up and was referred to a committee at the council meeting.

One of the best concrete illustrations of the work of the council arose during the sessions of the meeting at Richmond. A very valuable collection of Friendly stories by Maude Robinson is ready for publication, but the publishers would not undertake this unless a certain number were guaranteed by American Friends. It was discovered that between the different agencies this number would easily be reached, so that word was sent to England and the book will probably be soon ready for the wide distribution such a work deserves among Friends.

The "Rise of the Quakers," by T. Edmund Harvey, has been out of print for some time, and notwithstanding the various orders repeatedly coming in from Friends' schools, study circles and individuals, no one agency had been prepared to promote a re-printing. But the many friends of this book will be glad to know that it was discovered that a sufficient number could be used by the American agencies which would probably induce the publishers to reprint this very useful book.

One illustration of a very real help rendered the book shops represented was the information concerning new books ready for distribution. Perhaps the two outstanding incidents in this meeting were "The Later Period of Quakerism," by Rufus M. Jones, which is now on the way to this country, and a review of the new book, by A. Neave Brayshaw, "The Quakers: Their Story and Message." This is a small book giving in brief compass the whole period of English Quakerism, from the time of their rise in the seventeenth century to the period of reconstruction up to 1921.

Such methods of co-operation have constituted the tangible work of the council during this brief time it has been organized. But this does not take account of the very real stimulus which comes from the mingling of the representatives of East and West. New ideas, better understanding, personal contact, make us better able to co-operate and further the work together. Perhaps the only discouraging feature has been the lack of funds to enable the council to render the many services to American Friends of which it saw the need and was desirous of rendering. Our work seems small compared to that of the English council, which has used a budget the past year equalling about $4,000. But this is only our beginning. Several definite undertakings were decided upon at this meeting and left with committees to promote.

Unquestionably one of the best contributions of this meeting of the council was the paper read by Alfred C. Garrett, "The Council as a Harmonizing Agency." Six of the American friends were represented at the sessions of the council meeting.

QUESTIONS CONCERNING OUR MEETINGS FOR WORSHIP.

If "the strength and the weakness of the Society of Friends lies in the Meeting for Worship," if "they are at once its inspiration, its pitfall, and its raison d'être," should they not be a matter of vital concern to each one of us?

If our First-day morning meeting seems sometimes like a lake that has grown stagnant, whose depths are unstirred by any stream of fresh, living water, should we not each seek earnestly for the cause? Is there some obstruction at the inlet? That is the natural supposition and we are apt to concentrate our attention largely upon that. May it not be that the trouble is at the outlet?

Compare some of the meetings held by that little group of workers in Berlin with some of our own meetings, where we busy, comfortable Friends gather with our families and try for an hour to concentrate our minds on spiritual things—to worship God. We strive to put aside our business and household cares, our many plans and interests. We are truly concerned that our meeting shall be a good one—that it shall minister to our spiritual needs and we wonder sometimes why it is not more alive. Meetings are held to consider what can be done to quicken its spiritual life. Our attention is focussed on the inlet.

But suppose for a moment that we were face to face, as those workers in Germany were, with the overwhelming need and suffering of the world to-day—and one does not have to go to Germany to find it—suppose we realized it vividly—felt it as though the sufferers were our own children, and then realized our powerlessness, our inadequacy in the face of it all, should we have to make an effort to seek God, to concentrate on spiritual things? Should we not rather cry with the Psalmist, "As the hart panteth after the waterbrook, so panteth my soul after thee, O God"—not for ourselves, not for our meeting, but for the sake of those others, Christ's little ones, whose need is so sore? Would not our meeting become one living, longing search for God, for His power and wisdom and love? Would it not lose its self-consciousness and grow strong and vital because it was needed—needed to help us to help others?

In a recent number of The Forum, the author, Maurice Hewlett, writes of Friends:—

"That Society has presented to the world for three hundred and more years the nearest approach to the Christ-like way of life which has ever been known. . . . It does not, however, observe the counsel of Poverty and is in no real sense communistic. In those two points, and in the fact that it has not been zealous to proselytize, it falls short of the teaching of Jesus Christ."

Perhaps we should come nearer both poverty and proselytizing, in the sense of sharing our spiritual and material possessions with those who need, if we could but see with our own eyes, that we might really see, and hear with our own ears, that we might really hear, and understand with our hearts that we might truly understand what it means for these others, our brothers and sisters, to go without those spiritual and material blessings which we feel are so necessary for ourselves. Is one of our troubles the fact that we so seldom come into close, personal contact with the grim realities of life and so, seeing, we see not, and hearing, we hear not, neither do we understand?

Crossing in the steerage in 1772, John Woolman wrote:—"I was now desirous to embrace every opportunity of being inwardly acquainted with the hardships and difficulties of my fellow-creatures." . . . "I have looked at the present dispensation as a kindness from the great Father of mankind, who, in this my floating pilgrimage, is in some degree bringing me to feel what many thousands of my fellow-creatures often suffer in a greater degree."

How much was his spiritual power due to his Christ-like understanding of and sympathy with the sufferings of the oppressed?

ANNA COPE EVANS.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

"NOT OVER SUNDAY" is the designation given to the date proposed for the delivery in as many churches as possible of sermons or addresses on the present status of Prohibition, for the purpose of awakening the public to the need of continuing the struggle for practical success. The following address was given before the Christian Forum, of Haverford, on Tenth Month 30th, the date fixed for this year.

PROHIBITION—CAN IT BE ENFORCED?

The message I bring to you this morning is one of encouragement and assurance fully justified by the facts in the case. It is true that the fight is "not over," but we are winning all along the line. However, as busy men and women with minds much pre-occupied with other things, I know you must be shocked and discouraged at times by reports you hear and read regarding infractions of the Volstead Act. To grasp the situation intelligently it is very desirable, indeed it seems to me absolutely necessary, that we get, first of all, a true perspective. If our background of facts is established clearly, the correct answer to most of the questions that perplex so many will suggest itself at once. At the risk, therefore, of repeating much that you know already, I desire to present some considerations for us to reflect upon before we open the discussion.

The question of the hour regarding the Prohibition Law of the United States is, Can it be enforced? Its enemies are asserting vociferously that it cannot be enforced. Moreover they are using every means in their power to increase the difficulties of enforcement. Its friends are confident that it can be enforced, but entertain some doubt as to whether it will be enforced with uniformity and persistency. The complacent public, fond of sitting in the grandstand and watching the game, or peering from the galleries to "take in" the "show," looks on with morbid interest and cheers the contestants with appalling indifference as to the importance of the issues involved.

"Show me results," says the hard-headed business man, and promptly the champions of each side come forward boldly with "evidence" to sustain their opposing claims. The great newspaper press, always displaying more interest in irate controversy and cruel conflict than in righteous achievement, displays in bold headlines the sensational features—infractions of law, police raids, court proceedings, fines, imprisonments, exonerations—with equal indifference to principles. The thoughtful citizen observes, reads and ponders in bewilderment.

Why this confusion in the minds of so many intelligent people? Is this Prohibition Law merely a trouble-maker? Were the people deceived by propaganda when state after state outlawed the liquor traffic until finally the machinery of the great Union began to turn and struck the hour of midnight—closing the day of the legalized liquor traffic and beginning the era of a new experience in popular government? Let us analyse the situation.

All parties will agree that our patient, if you please,—AMERICA—whether judged by the standards of the past or the prophecies for the future, is not normal. In attempting a diagnosis the first question in many cases is, What has the patient been eating or doing? Let us consider this point. For more than fifty years the agitation for national prohibition has been pronounced throughout the nation. It has been over sixty years since Maine began the experiment of constitutional prohibition; more than forty years since Kansas "got on the water-wagon." Several other states did likewise, but were soon numbered among the backsliders. Maine and Kansas, through much tribulation, held persistently to their good intentions to "sober up." Eighteen years ago only one other state, North Dakota, stood with these two pioneers irrevocably committed to prohibition; but about fifteen years ago the infection became general and state after state with increasing frequency aligned itself with the leaders, until in 1919, when the Constitutional Amendment was ratified, to become effective in 1920, thirty-two States were under prohibition, also Alaska, District of Columbia, Hawaii, Guam, Porto Rico and Virgin Islands. The culmination of the half century of educational and political strife was the stamped to ratify the Amendment submitted by Congress in 1917. Forty-five of the forty-eight states ratified by overwhelming majorities within nine months' time.

Gentlemen, this thing was "not done in a corner," it was transacted in the open market; it was "put across" in the view of everybody. It came about psychologically. It was not the work (shame the thought) of a "few long-haired men and women." The conditions affecting the patient may have been contracted from "wet feet," or a careless habit of being "wet," but it had been in the system a long time. However, the fever "broke" in 1919 and we are contending now with a sub-normal condition.

What happened in 1919 when the fever broke? The business of 236 distilleries, 1052 breweries and 130,954 saloons was to be suppressed, or in the expressive language of the street, was to be "smashed." One billion dollars invested in manufacturing liquors must be turned over to something else. Five hundred million dollars revenue to the Federal Government and as much more to states and cities, must be obtained from other sources. Incidentally, it may be well to remark that according to the estimate of the liquor men themselves, 188,000,000 bushels of grain, 20,000,000 tons of coal, 900,000 freight cars and 240,000 railroad men were released for useful service.

But what was left in the body to be absorbed? Something like 70,000,000 gallons of alcoholic drink remained in 300 government warehouses, not to speak of supplies elsewhere to tempt the mischievous and inflame the vicious among the many thousands whose palates burn with thirst for alcohol. These insatiate palates, many of them with unscrupulous hearts under them, constitute the real problem and threaten the very life of the patient unless they can be rendered innocuous or Nature mercifully exterminates them.

Now what symptoms should we expect to see following actions and exposure like this? Should we not look for exactly the same reactions as in the case of individual states under like circumstances, or of individual men for that matter? Take the case of Kansas. A citizen of that prosperous commonwealth told me that it took more than twenty years of dogged "hanging to it" to arrive at anything like satisfactory results. There was no Keely Cure, nor any trained nurse in attendance in those days. It is different now, for many sister states that have been through the experience are glad to give professional advice, or even to help some in emergencies. Formerly the sisters did nothing but apply leeches and give snake poison.

Any one who has studied carefully the history of inhibitive legislation (and practically all legislation is of this character) will be slow to question the ability of a government like ours to enforce it, if those in authority will to do so. The ability of the Federal authorities to suppress smuggling when a high tariff law made possible enormous profits from such lawlessness, the stamping out of the Louisiana Lottery, the enforcement of game laws in remote places, etc., leave in one's mind little doubt that prohibition might be enforced to a like extent. It is not expected by reasonable people that all violations of the law will be prevented. Many people seem to have crude ideas on this point. They seem to think that prohibition is a failure unless it succeeds to the extent of preventing at once all the evils forbidden. They forget that the Ten Commandments were given four thousand years ago, but are not yet fully enforced. Who would suggest repealing them on that account? We do not ask to have the law against stealing repealed because ten or more automobiles are stolen every night; neither do we say stupidly that the law "cannot be enforced."

Certain other facts also should be kept in mind if we would have a true perspective of the present situation as to the enforcement of the prohibition law,—the Volstead Act in particular.

1st.—Rigid enforcement would be salutary. The charges against the liquor business have not in any way been disapproved by the passage of the Eighteenth Amendment, whether it be enforced or not. The business was a parasite on the body politic, a foe to good government, a foe to religion, an economic waste, a social disgrace, a moral leper. And wherever prohibition has been enforced, even loosely, the evils have been abated.

2nd. A just judgment of any law can be had only where it is fairly well observed, never where it is flagrantly violated. To charge that a law is a cause of the crimes it is intended to suppress is puerile. It merely exposes to the apprehension of the public the enemies of society who previously had not been so classified.

3rd. The fight of the Liquor Interests has been a continuously losing fight for fifty years. Their so-called "victories" have been merely delays, mostly of short duration, in the onward course of the movement to relieve society of the burden and annoyance of this traffic.

4th. "Knocking" prohibition is a more or less popular form of jesting now-a-days. It should not be taken too seriously. It is due partly to the fact that the daily press is less inclined to publish information about prohibition that is encouraging than such as is discouraging and more sensational. A friend of mine at a business luncheon not long ago was rather surprised and a bit annoyed by the slurs of a group of his fellow-diners, so he decided to approach the subject adroitly with each man separately and alone. To his surprise and satisfaction every one of them expressed a very different view individually from that he had in the group.

5th. Philadelphia is in the zone of maximum disturbance in the matter of prohibition enforcement. So long ago as 1917, one-half of all the saloons in the United States were in four States—New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Illinois. New York City had as many saloons as the total number in thirty-six of our commonwealths. Due allowance should be made, therefore, on account of conditions peculiar to a "storm centre."

6th. The most reputable and law-abiding class of liquor dealers have gone out of the business. The desperadoes remain, tempted by the possibility of immense profits if they can escape apprehension.

Bearing in mind, then, these many factors affecting the views that people have of prohibition and its enforcement, can we not approach a judgment in the matter that is sure to be bigger and broader and truer than most of the "little talk" on the subject that is so common and so cheap these days. In the first place, we have thirty-four States under prohibition by virtue of their own laws. To every one of these the Federal law has been a great help, and in every one the law is respected and quite well enforced. Of the remaining fourteen States, ten have passed legislation in harmony with the Federal law with a view to co-operating with the Federal authorities in the work of enforcement. Really, it takes a good imagination or a lot of perversity to see any evidence that prohibition is a "passing craze."

For "THE FRIEND."

THE SECOND SOCIAL ORDER QUERY.

One of the Social Order Queries sent down to our Overseers by our last Yearly Meeting contains the following:—

"Are we, as employers and stockholders, mindful that (as the name of our Society suggests) we are called to be friends and brothers of all men, and are we vitally concerned that the conditions of work of those in our employ should be such as we would desire for our own brothers and sisters? Are we earnestly endeavoring to secure for our employees the wages and the leisure that will be sufficient for the comfort, education and full development of themselves and their families; to free them from the distresses of unemployment, and to give them opportunity for self-development in their work. In order to provide these advantages, are we willing, if necessary, to simplify our own lives, and accept smaller financial returns for ourselves?"

On first reading this seems to apply to one class only—the employers. To many the word "stockholder" will seem irrelevant. What have we as stockholders to do with wages, hours of work, and unemployment? We are not employers of labor. Wait a minute! Who are the employers of the millions of men who run our railroads, mine our coal, and make our steel? The presidents and officers of the companies? They are employees, paid by the directors to manage these vast concerns. The directors then? In what sense are they employers? Only as representatives of the owners or stockholders, elected by them to direct the affairs of the companies. With the stockholders themselves—you and I, and the other man—lie the ultimate power and responsibility of determining the policies of these great industries.

What happens under this system is well described by the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council of Churches:

"In the administration of a large industry, policies are frequently inaugurated which would not have been determined upon if their full human consequences could have been instantly visualized. The investors in an industry expect its managers, first and principally, to produce profits. The directors scrutinize the records, but rarely visit the workshops. In consequence, men and material are lumped together as commodities, labor is bought in the market like goods, and the personal equation is lost in a mechanical system."

The question is, "What can we stockholders do?" There are more than 3,000,000 of us scattered over the United States, most of us owning small amounts of stock. One thing at least we can do—acquaint ourselves with the facts. If it is true that, to secure some dividends, men work twelve hours a day and seven days a week; that the wages of large classes of workers are below the level which our Government surveys have shown to be necessary to maintain a healthy and decent standard of living—if, as is claimed on good authority, such facts as these are true, we can hardly pocket dividends bought at such a price and comfortably shelter ourselves behind the plea of impotence. If we are impotent, the men and women, and little children who suffer from these conditions are even more impotent, unless, indeed, they "strike" and refuse to work for us, and which of us would recommend this as the Christian solution of the problem. If we are, as our Query asks, "vitaly concerned that the conditions of work of those in our employ should be such as we would desire for our own brothers and sisters," we shall seek until we find the Christian way to better these conditions.

JAPANESE NOTES.

UNINVITED VISITORS.

Twenty-seven little boys of graded sizes wearing official-looking school uniform caps and big spotted black and white kimonos—twenty-seven sturdy voices shouting in joy or anger—made the First-day afternoon on the Friends' Compound in Tokio more a place of riot than one of peace.

The need of a baseball bat was easily supplied by breaking a piece of bamboo from the hedge fence; the game of tag was more interesting because holes could be made in the hedge to jump through when hotly pursued. The only blue grass their feet ever trod on is a delightful place to practise real professional wrestling such as they hear about in their homes and on the street. The sunny, grass-covered bank is just the place to sit and practice shooting toy pistols. Never mind if the brace to the famous old cherry tree is in the way; it is possible to tear it loose. And if those foreign teachers are only not looking a romp on the swinging log behind the school building is all the more thrilling because of the possibility of risk it holds.

The din increases as the mob gains in boldness. The grass, already bearing mute testimony to constant rough usage under the knife-like teeth of the wooden clogs is once more ruthlessly trodden upon in the game of prisoner, as the boy policeman lassoes the culprit in regular cowboy fashion,—a testimony to the said policeman's faithful attendance at the picture shows, where Americans are represented as wild men doing daring things.

At the other side of the playground three boys are testing their strength at one end of a rope, the other end of which is tied to an azalea bush on the bank. A look of disappointment shows on their faces when they finally have to give up without uprooting the shrub.

But there is an end to all fun, that is where it should not be; and soon the crowd huddles together in a little group, for the "foreign sensei" is coming. "Yes, she is coming right towards us." And before long the whole group is around her, curiosity getting the better of their fears, and all listen attentively.

"Boys, I'm sorry, but you are very mischievous and you will have to stop playing and go home."

A childish voice replies, "We did not do it. It was another fellow."

"No, you boys are the ones. I saw you from the window. One boy broke the fence," the teacher said.

"Which one?" asked one little fellow.

"This one here, didn't you?" And the guilty one admits he did by saying, "Please forgive me."

"How many of you boys come here to 'Sunday School'?"

One bold one replies, "I do."

"Any others?"

"No."

"What would your fathers do if you did the same in the garden at home that you are doing here?"

The "Sunday School" boy replied, "He would be very angry."

"I am not angry, and I am sorry you have no place to play, but when you destroy things we cannot let you stay."

"May we stay if we put the bad ones out who do the mischief?" asked the leader.

"No, you will all have to go. You all knew mischief was done. You all wanted the ball bat."

"If you stay here and watch us may we play?" again he persistently inquired.

"I'm sorry, but I cannot. I must go now. Good-bye."

"Good-bye," and bowing politely they reluctantly left, and the foreign teacher slowly walked up the hill to the house. Was it a prayer she breathed to the Father of these, His children that He would send more laborers into this harvest and make a way so that all these many little children who pass in and out at the compound gate each day may have real training and teaching as is their right?

WO—THE BOY WHO ASKED QUESTIONS.*—Why do I grow bigger and taller? Why do the flowers come again in spring? Where does the sun go at night? What do the wind and the birds say? What makes the stars shine? These were some of the questions the boy WO asked. And neither his mother nor his father could answer them. It was because they did not know where his spirit had come from that they had called him "Wo," meaning "Whence?"

As he grew older, more and harder questions filled his mind. "Where did I come from?" "Where am I going to?" "Why am I here?" He grew tall and strong and clever, and sat beside the old men at the Council of his tribe; but he sat silent. The old men wondered at his silence and questioned him.

"We have learned many things," he replied. "We can trail the beast of the forest to his lair. Though he is swift of foot, yet we are swifter. We have overcome the cold of winter by learning to make fire to warm us and cook our food. We can ride upon the great water. By our cunning and wisdom we can make all things our servants. Yet all our wisdom is weak and false. Our lives are short, and we do not know whence we come or whither we go. We cannot tell the meaning of light and darkness, the song of the birds and the wind in the trees. But this morning, as I pondered at the first streaks of dawn, methought I heard a voice which said, 'My child, arise, and follow me to the Mountain of the Sun: I will answer all your questions.' I go, and if I fall by the way others will take up the trail."

So, rising from the council fire, he set off on his journey to the Mountain of the Sun. Through dark forests, across streams, ever upwards, he went: alone, silent, yet light-hearted; for would he not that night rest upon the wonderful Mountain of the Sun, where, wise men said, the sun himself sank to rest?

On and on he journeyed, till, just as the sun sank in a great red ball of fire, he reached the mountain top. But what had happened? As he looked, lo! the great red sun sank to rest far away—below in the deeps of the great water. He watched in mingled awe and disappointment. His journey had been in vain! There was no answer to his questions! Even now darkness was falling—a grey mist settling all around him. He sank down in despair, tired and exhausted, with his back to the setting sun, and fell asleep.

As he slept he dreamed. He was alone, asleep—there in the mist on the mountain top. A strong wind arose, and drove the mist away, yet no comfort came to him. Then followed a violent storm: the thunder pealed, and the lightning flashed, yet they brought no answer to his questions. A still and peaceful silence followed, and a voice seemed to be calling to him and saying:

"Rise, My son. I am the Great Father, Whom thou seekest. I am here, in the earth and sky and sea. I speak to you in the whisper of the trees, the bubbling brook, the song of the bird, the fragrance of the flower. I look at you in the face of a friend; I am in mother-love and child-love, and love of man for man. To those who seek Me I am everywhere. Go back and tell your tribe; I will speak through you!"

Wo awoke. The rising sun shone full upon him. The birds sang their morning songs: the world was fresh and beautiful. "May I too reflect Thy beauty!" he prayed.

He turned his steps down the mountain-side to his tribe in the valley. As he came in sight of the camp fires the wise men came to meet him. They could see by his face that something wonderful had happened.

"I sought and I found the Great Father-Spirit," he said. "He is from Whom we come and to Whom we go. His love is greater than that of a mother for her child. He speaks to us through the sun and wind and all living things, and most of all through the love that is in men and women and children. It is His will that we dwell together in harmony and love, and bury for ever the hatchet of hate; the strong helping the weak, each sharing in common work and pleasure."

For a moment the old chiefs sat in silence; then, taking a hatchet, they rose, and, burying it deep in the ground, said, "Thus bury we the spirit of hatred between man and man." Then a younger member of the tribe brought forward an acorn, and, setting it in the ground, said, "So plant we the seeds of love of man for man."

Thus the boy WO found the clue to the answer of all his questions.—From Workers at Home and Abroad.

SOME FOREIGN EFFORTS ON BEHALF OF PEACE.*

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

It is peculiarly appropriate that the people of America be informed at the present time regarding the forces abroad operating on behalf of international peace. The call for disarmament is loud everywhere. Whilst the shock of human conflict has reduced hundreds of millions of people to starvation and suffering beyond the wildest imagination of the people of America, there is abroad a pitiful and insistent demand that immediate relief be obtained from the domination of war-lords, secret treaties, unprecedented armaments and oftentimes unjust international trade competition.

Our English-speaking peoples are the vanguard in this great movement—they represent the nations that to the largest degree have the ideals, the sympathies, the literature, the concept of religious duty that make such efforts tell. In England we find a vision of internationalism most in harmony with our own.

The British International Peace Council was established in 1905, and is composed of 180 delegates from interested bodies. Allied to this movement may be mentioned among others the Boys' Life Brigade, The Co-operative Union, The British Institute of National Affairs, Church of England Peace League, The Fellowship of Reconciliation, The Independent Methodist Peace Fellowship, The International Arbitration League, Jewish Peace Society, The League of Nations Union, The Peace Committee of the Society of Friends, The Union of Democratic Control. I could enumerate over sixty typical pacifist organizations functioning in Great Britain. Some of these are directed by men of world-wide reputation in connection with sane and efficient labors on behalf of world concord. Not a few well-known peers and politicians are included in the list.

There are numerous purely international bodies the members of which represent many different interests and languages seeking the betterment of racial and international relations. Thus we have the Pan-American Union, the Chairman of the Governing Board of which is the Secretary of State of the United States. This organization is maintained by twenty-one American republics for the development of good understanding, friendly intercourse, commerce, and peace among them. The Union of International Associations was formed at Brussels in 1910, and represented 132 organizations of different nationalities. One of its features is to create an International Centre to facilitate the administration of the great world interests. There are several international law societies. Among them may be mentioned the Institut de Droit International, which applies itself to the scientific study of international law. Again is the International Law Association, the President of which is the Earl of Reading, now Governor-General of India. The American Institute of International Law, Washington, D. C., founded in 1912, consists of five delegates from each of the twenty-one national societies for promoting international law in North and South America. Again, there is The Nobel Committee of the Norwegian Parliament, which yearly grants peace prizes. There is The Inter-Parliamentary Union which includes members of Parliaments of different countries who desire to see triumph

*Retold by A. L. White from "How Men Found the Great Spirit," in Around the Fire, by H. M. Burr.

*The writer is indebted to The Peace Year Book, 1921, London, for part of the information contained in the first half of this article.

ant the principles of arbitration or judicial settlement. A great number of legislative assemblies abroad have been moved to action through the initiative of the members of this Union. It meets in conference every year or two in the different capitals and Lord Weardale of England is the President. The Inter-Parliamentary Union of the North is a union of Scandinavian representatives of Denmark, Norway and Sweden to promote good feeling and common action among the peoples of the three countries. Nor do we forget the influence of women in some of these great organizations. Conspicuous among them is the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, formed at The Hague Congress of Women in 1915, to bind together women in every country who desire to promote the settlement of disputes by some other means than war. Jane Addams, U. S. A., is President, and the International headquarters are at the Rue du Vieux Collège 6, Geneva, Switzerland.

The above are only a few of the many foreign societies dedicated to this cause. There are forty-seven periodicals abroad devoted to peace.

The Rockefeller Foundation has been responsible for gifts in various directions which unquestionably have promoted international friendship. The relief work of Americans abroad has done more to reopen economic and spiritual relations among discordant peoples than could blockades or battleships. There are not a few international organizations based on the Christian religion. Noticeably among them is the International Christian Trade Union, made up of Christian trade unions which, in contra-distinction to Socialism, places itself positively on the basis of Christian principles. In 1920 it claimed a membership of 3,380,000 in Europe; having 1,250,000 in Germany; Italy, 1,250,000; France, 140,000 members, etc. Its annual report declares: "We miss America and England. In both countries trade unions have developed strongly. However, we find there are no Christian trade unions." This body rejects the principle of war and the war of classes. It denies that there is or must be an insurmountable difference between employers and workers. Its members have had to endure much scorn from certain directions. Sometimes Christian workmen have been driven from their work and their lives embittered in other ways. The Christian International, with branches in America, Denmark, France, Germany, Great Britain, Holland, Norway, Switzerland, was organized in 1919 in Holland to establish true peace "by the power of brotherhood in Christ." It sent forth the following message to the world:

"God is our Father, therefore we are all brothers. For us there is one kingdom on earth—the Kingdom of God, and its law is love. Within this kingdom every nation finds its highest glory in bringing of its choicest and best to the other nations in joyful service. Let us open our eyes so that we may see this truth. Let all of us who have seen it clasp hands in a solemn vow never more to take up arms against our brothers or to make preparation for war."

One of the great instrumentalities on behalf of international good-will and justice is discovered in the recent work of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, Robert E. Speer, President. It is closely allied with The World Alliance for International Friendship through the churches, which organization declares:

"We believe in the power of friendship to establish right relations between the nations and to secure universal peace; that friendship is based upon justice; that the Church of the Living God is an agency through which peoples and governments can come to know each other as brothers, with a common spiritual lineage and not as enemies with aims necessarily antagonistic; that the Golden Rule must be made to apply to all international relations."

Over one hundred delegates from twenty-three countries were at the conference of this Alliance in Switzerland last year. Its American office is 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

It would be impossible to tell of all the work of the peace people abroad. Some Japanese are very alive to these great questions, and the Japan Peace Society, with Count Okuma as President, has done much to assist in the maintenance of a friendly attitude toward other countries.

It is heartening to lovers of humanity to know that many men and women are working for the consummation of the better things all over the world. Acute and fully informed observers of events preceding 1914 knew that war was bound to come before long. It is the simple truth that misleading military and trade propaganda were then too strong for the forces of peace. The "common people" have had to pay the penalty. Whilst humanitarian efforts are valuable in the promotion of the higher ideals we must remember that no organization on behalf of international peace and disarmament can overcome failure on the part of the nations or their leaders to accept the obligations and teachings of the Gospel. Shall we serve Christ or Mars?

Our President needs Christian support at this momentous period of human history. Shall we not offer it by at least writing to him?

A RUSSIAN VILLAGE.

It was to be expected that the automobile would break down. It was a Russian automobile. All such machines are government property and have seen pre-war service. Most of them date from before 1914, and the rest have been captured from the counter-revolutionists by a strenuous process which has not improved their internal workings. To ride in a Russian automobile is like riding twenty years ago in the United States, when automobilism was a new and thrilling adventure.

As our automobile came to a halt on the sweeping, desolate plain, the sharp wind that had been blowing from our rear began to cut keenly into the open body of the automobile. The air grew damper and a few drops of rain from the clouds which had been pursuing us began at last to fall. Decidedly, we must find shelter somewhere.

Black against the grey sky, a windmill cut the horizon in front of us, a sign that some village was just over the brow of the hill. We left the automobile and stumbled along the road until a curve brought us to the lights of the cottages. It was just a village which we had run on by chance, in the heart of the famine.

We went to the first window and tapped on it. A large and bushy peasant head appeared. "Where is the Soviet?" my interpreter asked. We were directed to his house and we explained our situation to him. Could we have a night's lodging? Could we have a messenger to send back to Samara?

Then he turned to question us. Were we the Americans, they asked, who were to come with food? They had been told a month ago by an American correspondent as he passed through, that American food was coming to the hungry places and that the Americans required kitchens where many children could be fed at once. They had prepared five kitchens, and had waited day by day for the food while they ate grass. Were we the Americans who were to come?

In tones like those the faithful might have asked for the Messiah. Were we the miracle for which they had prepared and in which they had hardly dared believe?

Then they told us about their dead and their sick and of what they were eating. The chairman, a hardy-looking, bearded peasant, pulled from his pocket a piece of the stuff which he had been nibbling, a hard brown cake streaked with yellow, made from ground bark and straw. There may have been some nourishment in it, but those who ate it eventually got swollen stomachs, and a too-long-maintained diet of it unrelieved by other food meant death. "We had a piece of bread in our house four days ago," said the chairman of the committee quite calmly.

Then Sonia, the other woman in the party, and I consulted together. "We cannot accept the hospitality of a starving village," I said, "the labor of twenty men, the night's shelter, the boiling water, without making some return—why attempt to go farther. Both famine and nakedness are here. We will distribute the clothes we have with us to-morrow in this village, which has so well organized itself in the faith that we would come."

Outside of the garage the rain settled into a night's down-pour. Joy was on the face of every peasant as he heard it. It was golden rain. I understood the reason for that joy, for I had already seen along the road, breaking the desolate steppe, the ploughed strips of land seeded for next year's harvest. Every drop of rain now was a promise that next year there would be food.

"Has not the seed already come from Moscow?" the peasant asked. "Has it not been planted? It is already springing green shoots in the autumn rain. This gives us hope for the harvest."

At eleven o'clock we brought out our bread and asked the chairman and the two men who were with him to eat with us. They hesitated. We assured them, as one must assure Russians in these days when giving bread, that we had plenty for ourselves.

"We would prefer," said the chairman of relief, "to take it home."

I learned next day that he had divided the bread with his sister and her children. I was not much surprised. In his eyes had been the look of those who in all ages give their own lives for the lives of others. He was a tall young man with a fine-looking face lined even more with anxiety for his village than his own personal suffering. It was quite plain why the peasants had chosen him as chairman of relief. He was obviously honest, obviously faithful. His name was Puriaieff, not that that matters; he is but one with many, many others.

It was not an uncomfortable night which we passed in the peasant's cottage. The floor on which we lay in a row was hard but clean. The fear I had of lice and bugs and disease vanished on closer inspection. The cottage was plain and crowded, but clean, a cleanliness achieved without soap and with water from the distant village well.

The people of the village had gathered early in the morning around the chairman's house as the relief committee met to decide upon the distribution of the clothing. As they proceeded with the selection there was little discussion, but a universal agreement on each name. During the meeting of the committee many peasants wandered in. They would sit for a time listening to decisions and then go out, satisfied apparently that justice was being rendered. The meeting and decisions were quite open, anyone who cared being allowed to enter.

We brought the clothing out and laid it on the tables or chairs. Then Puriaieff drove back the crowd and formed an open space into which the children came as the secretary called their names.

Ten at a time they came and stood in a line. Surely they had been well chosen. Some were in rags through which their bodies were largely visible. Some had wrapped themselves in quilts, or in clothes borrowed from some older brother or sister for the occasion. We gave each child a garment, holding it up to his body to see if it would fit. Then the line of ten stepped to one side and another line was called.

But after all the garments were distributed a little complaint arose. "Is this all?" asked some of the peasants. "Yes," Puriaieff answered, "there is not enough for all. We give only to the poorest." There was no complaining after that.

Then it was over. Only one small flat riot came as we gave out pieces of chocolate, the only food we had with us in any quantity and the nature of which we explained to children who had never seen it before. How they pushed against the table with the greatest eagerness! But even then I saw no child attempting to get more than the share which was handed out. We left the remaining pieces with the village committee to distribute among the children who had remained at home, too ill or without sufficient clothing to come at all. We had acquired the village faith that it would manage fairly.

Well, food will come to these villages from Samara and Kazan and Saratov. There is food from the government at Moscow, and food from the American Relief, and food from the Friends. Altogether, there is food for perhaps a third of the children and nothing for the parents at all. Now that the wind is beginning to blow cold even through the double windows of the house where I lived in Samara, and the freezing of the Volga is about to begin, I try to imagine what the grown-up people will be eating when the golden leaves of the forest are gone.

LATE NEWS FROM SERBIA.

The Serbian Unit is "carrying on" in splendid fashion. The hospital is making a substantial place for itself in the midst of a population without other medical assistance. Two new clinics were started during the month, one at Dechani and one at Zlocutchni. On the first visit to Zlocutchni Dr. Outland treated over a hundred patients. This gives the Mission an outside clinic five days in the week. This is all the outside work that can be carried, as it leaves only one whole free day for the hospital.

The Unit is now quite a small family, but with everyone interested in his work everything is running smoothly and happily.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

LORD LEE, First Lord of the British Admiralty and one of the delegates to the approaching international conference at Washington, has recently landed in this country. He is quoted by the Philadelphia Ledger as saying in a prepared statement:—

"The world has learned a wider lesson still that militarism, wherever situated and however entrenched, is a menace to civilization and must be given notice to quit."

"AND so," said Ralph Waldo Emerson, in 1838, "it is not a great matter how long men refuse to believe the advent of peace: war is on its last legs, and a universal peace is as sure as the prevalence of civilization over barbarism, of liberal governments over feudal forms. The question for us is only, How soon?"

"THERE is a new, an untried way, the way of Christ for nations. And being Christians is always venturesome; faith means taking a risk for righteousness, taking a risk in the God of love. It was a venture when the first disciples threw down their nets and followed the Master, who called them to be fishers of men. It was a supreme venture when that Master went up to Jerusalem and staked everything on love faithful to death.

"It was a venture when a little company of pilgrims embarked with their wives and children and set their faces westward towards the bleak shores of New England to found a commonwealth on the will of God. It was a venture when their descendants set their faces in another protest for the will of God in their generation against human slavery. The wise and prudent of their day plead for courses less risky; but they believed in the God of brotherhood, and ventured as seeing Him who is invisible.

"The slavery of our age is war, not merely the bloody struggle itself, but the burdensome preparedness against war, taking millions of men from productive employments and subjecting them to the discipline that fits them to be slayers of their brethren, deflecting billions of money from the needed undertaking for human welfare to keep up these establishments for human slaughter, enslaving men's souls to faith in the false god of brute force. The will of God for our generation is the war upon war."

FELIX ADLER ON DISARMAMENT.

On First-day the twenty-third, Felix Adler, the head of the well-known Ethical Culture School in New York City, gave an address on Disarmament in the Academy of Music before the Ethical Society of Philadelphia. He said that he desired to speak as a practical man who saw both the encouraging and discouraging sides of the situation. The discouraging things are that it will be extremely difficult to get an honest statement in regard to the present armaments of the different nations, it will be correspondingly difficult to hit upon a fair pro rata reduction scheme and it will be difficult to deal with England's claim to the mastery of the seas. The encouraging things, in his opinion, are that the diplomats are being driven by absolute necessity to find some way out. If armaments are to be maintained and increased, taxes must be raised, if taxes are raised to the point of making the workers desperate, the social revolution, which prophets of evil fear, will be upon us. If armaments are to be increased, the war of East and West, of the white and black races, also threatens. Dr. Adler spoke of the war and peace movements as running parallel, until in 1914 the war movement cut across the peace movement. Now he hopes that the peace movement may cut across the war movement. In closing, he spoke of the only force that would put an end to war as "international love." When we come to live as nations on the plane which moral individuals live on today, then a new constructive social ethics will have been evolved and the path will be open for great advances toward a higher civilization.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

AFTER Phila. Quarterly Meeting William Littleboy remained in the city for First-day. He was very acceptably at Twelfth Street in the morning and in the evening spoke in Media to a group assembled by the Extension Committee of the Yearly Meeting. His subject was "Prayer," and he carried his hearers into the depths of this essential of the Christian life with great clearness and simplicity.

B. SEEBOHM ROWNTREE was in Philadelphia on the 5th. He spoke before a large audience of the Academy of Political and Social Science on Unemployment. He regards the difficulties of unemployment as solvable, but not by any panacea. He outlined several means of approach to the subject and especially advocated unemployment insurance.

The sessions of Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting were held on Sixth and Seventh-days, Eleventh Month 4th and 5th, instead of on the 7th and 8th, as has been usual for many years. The change was made so that election day and Quarterly Meeting need not conflict. Judged by the number in attendance and the apparent convenience of Friends, the change has been an advantageous one. The dinner preceding the session on Seventh-day was an appreciated feature.

At the session of Ministers and Elders on Sixth-day, in addition to routine business the action of Western District Monthly Meeting in recording Hanson Holdsworth as a minister was confirmed. William Littleboy was present at the session on Seventh-day and had valuable service. The minute of his Monthly Meeting (Warwickshire, North, England) was read and a warm welcome was extended to him and to his prospective service. One of the Monthly Meetings had forwarded reports and answers to the two new queries sent down by last Yearly Meeting. Several unanswered questions as to their intention seemed to indicate that further definition will be needed if they are to be of general service. It was finally concluded to transmit the material to the Yearly Meeting clerks in the expectation that they would put the burden of summarizing it or reporting upon it to the Yearly Meeting.

The opening period of worship before the Quarterly Meeting session was briefer than some times, but this seemed to have the effect of keeping the whole meeting on the plane of worship. The conclusion was particularly of this character and several brief messages had an excellent effect. J. Gurney Binford, on furlough from Japan, was one who was heard from then.

NORMAN PENNEY, Devonshire House, 136 Bishopsgate, London, E. C., would be greatly obliged if any one knowing the address of Walton or Anna Ricketson, authors of "Daniel Ricketson and His Friends," Houghton-Mifflin & Co., Boston, would put him in communication with them. His letter to the publishers has been returned.

AFTER a tea meeting at Twelfth Street on the evening of the 30th ult. Dr. William W. and Katharine Jones Cadbury interested Friends of that meeting and some visitors in their work and environment in China. Lantern slides added to the interest. A group of lepers who are receiving the modern treatment at Dr. Cadbury's hands very particularly arrested attention. It was comforting to hear that they show marked improvement.

THE following in regard to the Benezet House is intended for our readers:

"Instead of having a Rummage Sale at Benezet House this year it has been decided to sell rummage articles every Fifth-day afternoon. This will allow the mother to come for the article most needed at the time most convenient to her financially and otherwise. To make this a success, however, it will be necessary to have several donation days throughout the year to collect such articles, though articles will be gladly received any day from 9 A. M. to 5.30 P. M., at 918 Locust Street. The first donation days will be Eleventh Month 15th and 16th. Warm clothing for sale and children's toys for the nursery are especially desirable."

A. E. LIPPINCOTT.

WE are informed that Carl Patterson, of Chesterhill, Ohio, Clerk of Ohio Yearly Meeting, has been liberated by his Monthly and Quarterly Meetings to attend the approaching Yearly Meeting in North Carolina. He expects to stop over for a few days in the Philadelphia neighborhood on his way home. His wife, Edith Patterson, will probably accompany him.

NOTICES.

BENEZET HOUSE DONATION DAYS for Rummage articles, Eleventh Month 15th and 16th. Please bring or send things to Benezet House, 918 Locust Street.

CARE IN INSURANCE

The Provident was founded in 1865 by a group of Friends for the purpose of protecting the estates and insuring the lives of members of the Society of Friends.

Later the services of this Company were offered to other people who were known to be of careful habits. A careful company insures only those people who are good moral as well as health risks. This results in a low death-rate, which is one of the elements of low cost of insurance.

Care is important—in insurance as well as in other things

THE NEGRO AND TUBERCULOSIS

Because of the relation of tuberculosis to squalid, ill-ventilated houses and the peculiar susceptibility of the colored race to this disease, the Whittier Centre Housing Company has enlisted the able assistance of Dr. Charles J. Hatfield, and Dr. H. R. M. Landis of the Henry Phipps Institute. Dr. Landis, in an address in Washington, D. C., put the facts of the case squarely before the Convention on Tuberculosis when he said:—

"In dealing with the tuberculosis problem among the Negroes greater difficulties are encountered than among those of the white race. It matters not, however, whether we are actuated by sentiment to aid a race struggling under difficulties or whether we view the problem as a public health measure. The essential things to bear in mind are:—that in many of our Northern cities the colored population is large; that tuberculosis is wide-spread among this race and that the white population cannot ignore the menace this wide-spread infection carries."

You can help in this work by investing your money in the Common Stock of the Whittier Centre Housing Company which is established to alleviate this condition. This company offers 500 shares of its stock at $50 per share. The sale of 200 shares is imperative before cold weather, for the renovation of properties on Moss Street, north of Parrish Street. Checks may be sent to Mr. Samuel H. Carpenter, Treasurer, 517 Chestnut Street.

THANKSGIVING.

O God, it's just a humble prayer
Of thankfulness I send to Thee
For little things of every day
That mean so very much to me.

It may be just a kindly smile
When all at large seems cold;
It may be just a sunbeam's touch
That turns a building into gold.

Perhaps it's just a bit of woods,
Or sweep of river toward the sea;
Yet God, it's little things like these
That make a whole day glad for me.

And when, at dusk, beyond the lights
That flash on shops and sign-boards rude,
I see Thy glorious sunsets shine,
My heart is full of gratitude.

—MARTHA A. TIERNEY.

ON THANKSGIVING DAY.

The old Puritan Fathers are our favorite ancestors, and we like to think that we get our best traits of character from them. We may claim Irish parentage or French Huguenot blood with pride, but no American of any length of standing is willing to forgo that Mayflower ancestor; and we have tried to preserve their best traditions intact. Thanksgiving Day is one of those heritages which we hold most precious. We treasure it as school children because it brings a generous holiday; as grown-ups, for the opportunities of family reunion and good fellowship. But at all ages and above all we treasure it for its Dinner.

There is no other dinner of the whole year that can compare with Thanksgiving Dinner. Every turkey that struts in the barnyard and every pumpkin that lies golden among corn shocks is fore-ordained for Thanksgiving Dinner.

This is all sanctioned by the example of the revered Pilgrim Fathers. It is recorded historically that they partook of turkey, and doubtless pumpkin pies and cranberry sauce were not lacking from the groaning board. The good Fathers probably rose from table with much the same content and satisfaction which the father of a modern family feels at having done his bit in lightening the burdens of the board.

But the old Puritans must have had, besides, a peace of mind that it would be well if we moderns could experience. They must have felt that they deserved their dinner. They had suffered untold hardships in the past winter, and had kept their hope and faith in God. They had lived up to their high ideals of justice and purity. Their hearts were light for these reasons. But above all they knew that there was no one in their community who was going hungry while they had plenty. From the poorest to the richest, all had suffered and labored together, and now all could feast and rejoice together. They had the strongest sense of fellowship and brotherhood.

It should not be impossible for our modern communities to feel some of this spirit. Of course, we are not so closely bound by the same interests to our fellow-citizens as were the Plymouth settlers. But just now we have the great problem of unemployment to draw us together. There are so many who cannot have a Thanksgiving dinner. We shall not deserve ours unless we have contributed to someone else's.

It is so easy to lend a bit of time and thought toward giving someone else a reason for celebrating Thanksgiving Day, and something to celebrate with. It has been the custom in a city of New York State, for the school children to bring a few potatoes and apples, or a can of corn to their principal for distribution among the poor of the city at Thanksgiving time. The children's delight in giving part of their possessions to help another cannot allow any bitterness or pride in the heart of the one who receives. It is entirely a transaction of love and brotherhood. If we were to give our love with our help to someone who needed them, we might feel an uncommon happiness and peace of mind on this Thanksgiving Day.

FRANCES R. TATNALL.

WHAT OF THE CONFERENCE?

The conference at Washington is a delicate affair. The nations at this conference are committed to programs of armament. The prime objective of the conference is to limit and possibly reduce these programs. Such a move would be a concession, and only a concession, yet every concession helps.

Further, the Washington conference should be able to break up the vicious routine of defense programs; this would be a concrete accomplishment.

The conference should clear the diplomatic atmosphere of current foggy distrust and establish a genuine frank confidence in its place—such would be an excellent service.

The conference may go farther and inject a sense of confidence, a spiritual point of view into the minds of everyone—you and me—this would be the best contribution.

But expectations can run too high and disappointments can be too severe unless we make progress patiently from one substantial step to another. The conference should have everyone's prayers!

HOWARD W. ELKINTON.

A CALL TO PRAYER AND CONSECRATION.

TO ALL WHO LOVE OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST:—

The coming Conference on Limitation of Armaments brings to all Christian people a priceless opportunity. To all good citizens, indeed, and to all lovers of humanity, it is a time of challenge and of hope, but supremely so to those who have seen in Jesus Christ a revelation of love and brotherhood as the true way of life. To bear convincing witness everywhere to this faith is our privilege and our duty in the present crisis.

With harrowing memories of more than ten million men who laid down their lives in the awful holocaust from which we have just emerged, of the countless homes bearing burdens of anguish and suffering, of the desolation and pestilence that have sprung from the war and still ravage whole peoples, and, most of all, of the aftermath of bitterness, suspicion and hate which pervade all lands, let us insist far more vigorously than we have ever done before, that war is an unmitigated curse to humanity and a denial of the Christian Gospel. Let us declare plainly that in every war the Son of Man is put to shame anew and that every battlefield is a Calvary on which Christ is crucified afresh.

Let us not shrink from proclaiming unequivocally that war is not a necessity, that the pacific settlement of every international question is possible, that a warless world can really be achieved. Our witness must be unmistakable that force is not the final arbiter among the nations, but that justice, reason and good-will can control their life as well as the life of individual men. To continue to point to the mailed fist as our ultimate reliance and to carry on a program of mutual distrust and fear, is to undermine the very foundation of our Christian Faith.

Let there be throughout the Church a fire of holy indignation not only against war, but also against the mad competition in armaments which has nourished suspicion, ill-will and fear, and from which wars have always sprung and always will. Let us not allow the reduction of armaments to be regarded as an economic issue alone. The question is at heart a moral and religious one. Let us repeat from one end of the nation to the other the discerning words of our Government's official invitation to the Conference: "The rivalries of armaments are not only without economic justification, but are a constant menace to the peace of the world."

Let us pray unceasingly that the Spirit of God may guide our leaders assembled at the conference of the nations, that unselfish motives and wise counsels may prevail. Let us give ourselves unstintingly to cultivating a Christian public opinion so strong that it will make possible the richest results from their deliberations. We cannot be satisfied with a mild curtailment of our military expenditure. Nothing less than a far-reaching reduction in armaments on sea and land can suffice. It is not for us to dictate the specific plans by which the longed-for goal may be achieved, but insist we must, with all the passion of our souls, that rational and pacific methods must now be found for the settlement of international disputes.

With a more poignant realization than we have ever had before of the terrible consequences of national selfishness, let us humbly confess our own share of sin in participating in the race of armaments, in seeking our own advantage regardless of neighbors, in adding to the world's burden of suspicion and distrust. Let us, as a people, open wide our hearts to the Divine spirit of love and brotherhood revealed to us in its fullness by Jesus Christ. Let us dedicate ourselves anew to building in this war-ridden earth the city of God foretold by the mouth of prophets since the world began.

Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

WANTED, WORKERS THAT WILL STICK.

What the abolition of slavery was between say, 1850 and 1863, that the abolition of war bids fair to be between 1921 and 1930. Other issues will arise. Other reforms will, we hope, be wrought. But our time will be remembered, if I am any prophet, as the period of the world's history which put an end to war.

God has prepared the ground. The misery of the recent war and the burdens resulting from it, under which the world staggers almost to a fall, are lessons that cannot be evaded. The menace of the war that looms on the horizon is ten-fold more horrible. The ingenuity of man in inventing instruments of destruction has reached a point where human beings are "like vermin before a disinfectant." The thought of leaving such a war as Will Irwin pictures as our legacy to the children is too horrible to face.

So at last men's minds are open to the fact that war is not necessary, that it is the worst possible method of settling national disputes. They are ready to seek a better way.

Let no one suppose that the coming conference will in one step abolish war. We have before us a long task of education. Fear and suspicion are the enemies we have first to overcome,—fear and suspicion of other great nations, fear and suspicion between races. The newspapers now full of disarmament sentiment may soon be preaching that we should be on our guard against one neighbor or another. We shall need to be fortified in our own hearts by faith. We shall need to stand shoulder to shoulder or we shall be overcome.

The Young Friends, if they are worthy of their heritage, will be whole-heartedly in this great movement. They will see the issues. They will stick until the victory is won. Much hangs upon their fidelity.

Who would have held back his best if by his sacrifice he could have prevented the last war? Life, fortune,—all would have been offered eagerly if thereby one could have saved ten million lives.

It is too late. The red poppies are waving above their graves. But the next war can yet be averted. Will any hold back? Should not Young Friends as a body make the great cause their cause until we are assured that the next war will never come?

FREDERICK J. LIBBY.

DISARMAMENT—A CALL TO SERVICE.

Just three years ago the armistice was signed. The news flashed over the world as the first glimmer of dawn after a night of terror and despair. To the soldiers it meant the great release—the end of their battle. To us whose conception of Christianity has drawn us to tasks of reconstruction and relief it meant the beginning of a new campaign. Our international service had always been inextricably linked with our pacifism, and our very claims as conscientious objectors have enlisted us for life in the struggle for the abolition of war. That struggle was not won with the signing of the armistice.

We young Friends cannot be mere onlookers. We are in the very prime of life and must bear the brunt of the struggle. The opportunity many of us have had to serve abroad has but trained us for new fields of service—a service from which there is no discharge. Each of us must decide for himself where he can serve best, but we dare not desert.

For many of us the greatest immediate opportunity for constructive work seems to lie in the disarmament movement.

Not that disarmament will of itself insure peace, but it will at least remove one potent cause of war, and thus be a first step toward our goal. If the Washington Conference is to succeed in making substantial progress toward disarmament it must be backed by the insistent demand of an enlightened public opinion. The atmosphere must be cleared of all fear and suspicion. Disarmament must be urged not only because it pays, but because it is right. In all this Friends can play a great part. There is urgent need for all of us, for our money, our time, the very best that is in us. Have the fires of enthusiasm that burned in many of us as we served abroad died out, or will they kindle anew as we catch the broader vision of our international service and realize that the drive for disarmament is but the continuation of our relief work—another step toward the abolition of war?

HAROLD EVANS.

NOTE—All who are willing to help are urged to write to the Friends' Disarmament Committee, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

J. HENRY SCATTERGOOD has been looking for the man who really wants war. If you can secure such a person send him to J. H. S. The Peace Committee should offer a liberal reward.

THE Conference at Washington is the result of a great economic urge that is sweeping the nations. Any statesman may obstruct this movement, but no person can permanently halt it. Diplomats persistently interfering will be brushed aside.

REDUCED expenditure for national defense must take place or else civilization will be in immediate danger of disruption.

If we don't have less arms we shall have more arms with nothing remaining but to pull the trigger.

THE craze for defense is a gigantic illusion. We don't burn wishes to suppress witchcraft. We don't spread religious truths by the sword nor can genuine defense be secured by guns.

Everybody knows this, everybody reads this, everybody hears this and yet we arm. Surely there is a wonderful opportunity for a Washington Conference.

THERE is no wisdom in the practice of smashing plate glass windows to give glaziers work nor in building armaments to spend the income of a state treasury. There is always a constructive useful way to spend available national funds.

PERMANENT GAINS FOR WORLD PEACE.

The actual gains for world peace decided on in the Washington Conference may be accomplished by various methods. Whatever is determined upon should create an atmosphere of frank dealings between the governments taking part. Yet the results on the minds and souls of common men, we must count the greatest gain.

Whatever our doubts as to the personnel of the conference, as to its sincerity of purpose, and its publicity, we may be assured that the psychological effect on you and me and our neighbors will be a good one. However much the business man, the cynic, the military group and the every-day person may complain that wars must go on till Doomsday, they cannot escape the great fact that this conference is meeting to prevent wars of the future.

From now on, nations can never declare war without the outcries from millions whose national ideals have been fired with a higher ideal of international relations and world peace as a living fact. Friends and especially younger Friends must use this fact—the calling of the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments, and point to it in future, whatever the results of the conference, as a magnificent milestone, a Charing Cross, on the path that leads to the Kingdom of Heaven on earth.

MARY B. GOODHUE.

THE two articles below were sent us by one of our college friends. They appeared in the Vassar Miscellany.

VASSAR SENDS TO WASHINGTON RESOLUTIONS FOR DISARMAMENT.

"The twenty-two colleges represented at the Disarmament Conference held at Vassar October 22nd, drew up a set of resolutions for disarmament which was sent to the Washington Conference. There was evident dissatisfaction with the wording of these resolutions as shown by much discussion from the floor at the Conference. A committee was therefore appointed to reword the resolutions so that they might express the opinions of the Vassar Community on disarmament. The committee, composed of Miss Reed of the English Department, and Rachel Higgins and Margaret Ray of the senior class, worked up a much longer and more explicit set of resolutions which was presented to the college at a short meeting after chapel on Thursday night. The resolutions, read first singly and then as a whole, were accepted by a large majority of the college and were sent to Washington as indicative of Vassar's stand on the disarmament question. The revised resolutions follow:

Whereas, we, members of the community of Vassar College, firmly believe that the present size of armaments is a continual menace to the preservation of civilization, and

Whereas, we also realize that the maintenance of such armaments is an intolerable economic burden imposed upon peoples of the world; therefore be it

Resolved: (1) that we hereby urge upon the approaching Washington Conference that there be taken immediate steps for the reduction of existing armaments, and further steps as soon as possible, towards complete disarmament on the part of each nation, individually considered, except for such force as may be necessary to maintain domestic peace. Also be it

Resolved: (2) that we hereby declare to the Washington Conference our conviction that an association of nations is necessary to the enforcement of limitation of armaments and the attainment of ultimate disarmament on the part of separate nations. And finally be it

Resolved: (3) that we urge upon the Washington Conference that its meetings be open to representatives of the press, and its conclusions made public, point by point, as they are reached in the course of the discussion."

RESOLUTIONS PASSED AT PRINCETON CONFERENCE.

It may be interesting to compare the following, which are the resolutions drawn up by seventy representatives of forty colleges and universities who met at Princeton, with those drawn up at the Vassar Conference:

"Whereas, The recent World War has demonstrated that future war would be a calamity whose consequences are beyond all calculation, and,

"Whereas, The nations of the world already impoverished by past wars and confronted by the urgent social and economic problems bred by war have entered on an unprecedented scale into the race for military and naval supremacy, which makes for mutual distrust and war rather than for mutual understanding and peace, and,

"Whereas, The costs of vast armaments prevent the converting into constructive channels of money and energy sorely needed for the solution of the problems of peace, and, whereas, the government of the United States, appreciating these facts, has invited the powers to meet in conference in Washington to discover means through which the reduction and limitation of armaments by international agreements may be realized and to promote through amicable discussions universal goodwill, and,

"Whereas, The college men for whom we speak have proven their devotion and loyalty in the past war and the generation which we represent would in all probability bear the brunt of a future war.

"Therefore, Be it resolved, that we, the representatives of forty colleges and universities in conference assembled do hereby express to the government of the United States our unqualified approval of the course it has taken in summoning the Washington conference and our entire sympathy with the purposes of the conference, pledging our faithful support to the United States delegates in their efforts to alleviate the burdens of war and preparations for war through mutual understanding and through world reduction and limitation of armament and.

"That we do hereby urge upon all delegates that their efforts shall not cease until some solution be found whereby the possibility of war may be minimized and whereby at least a considerable portion of the vast amount of energy and money expended by the nations for armament may be released; the intercollegiate conference believes the Washington conference will not have attained its objectives without:

"1. A settlement of the Far Eastern question based upon principles which will make practicable the reduction of naval armaments.

"2. An agreement to suspend all present programs for naval construction and to undertake no further expansion.

"3. An agreement to reduce substantially the present naval strength of the nations concerned.

"4. That a copy of the above resolution be signed by each delegate here assembled and dispatched forthwith to the President of the United States of America, and to representatives of the press for publication."

A MESSAGE FROM AUSTRIA.

To the Disarmament Conference a member of this international unit sends a message of the urgency of amicable, just, deliberate, civil procedure; of work, of food, of clothing, of medical prophylaxis and education in the world.

Relief workers, we know—from Austria, France, Belgium, Italy, Serbia, Germany, Hungary, Poland, Russia and Ireland—what the settlement by arms of injury, disagreement and friction entails in life—in flesh and blood, cold and hunger, babies and old folk; in ethical and material havoc, and what, to-day, the levy for preparation means in terms of human welfare.

We have worked together, persons of different nationalities and creeds, high and lowly, since 1914, and we see our way to be good.

Throughout Europe people tell us they do not want war, but that this enemy or that will have to be thwarted.

At another striking hour it lies with the powers assembled to write force, coercion and the dregs of disillusionment into the next years, or, Orient, Old and New World to translate the gesture of idealism and common sense that gripped the peoples in 1918 into deed and fact.

It is the governments who must lead their masses with the broader, farther-sighted states-craft based upon international co-operation and construction.

From Bertha von Suttner's city we echo, "Ground Arms!"
MARIAN PRICE.

THE third anniversary of the signing of the Armistice is the time set for the beginning of a series of conferences, the present one to be held in Washington. As citizens of the nation which has called for the latter, it is our place to point out the essential objects which those present should undertake. Before a small group of citizens of Media and the neighborhood Dr. Paul M. Pearson called attention to a few facts which one finds in Will Irwin's book, "The Next War." With England mortgaged 20 cents on every $1.00 of her property; France, 42 cents; Italy, 40 cents; Germany, $3.12; and Austria, $27.00, the United States commands a position at the coming conferences which cannot be minimized.

In considering the whole question of disarmament we as a nation "must have the will to disarm" which we must indicate to our representatives in a very positive manner. The representatives of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan have already learned the wishes of their citizens but they look to us to take the initiative. To this end it is essential that we study the problems of each nation before arriving at any real decision. For "disarmament depends upon the mutual understanding and good-will of the nations," which in turn are dependent upon our spiritual insight. It is this spirit which we should strive to arouse by every means in our power.

Through communications to our Congressmen, by personal letter or through the press we should back up any movement which has for one of its aims some form of "stop-building" program. This is the most logical first step toward an army and navy for police purposes only. But above all things it is necessary to combat the feeling of indifference which still seems to exist.

JESSE G. FORSYTHE.

THE SPIRIT'S QUEST.

The round, red sun is sinking, sinking low
Into the bosom of the deep blue sea;
And I, a spirit moving, moving slow,
Sail on, and on, into Eternity.

The sunset clouds are fading, growing dim;
The cloud banks change into a veil of mist;
The world is ling'ring, ling'ring on the rim
Of starlit night, and shadowed amethyst.

But in the distance gleaming, gleaming, rise
The gates of gold, that shine across the sea;
And haunted Dreamland, purple, silver, lies Within those gates which bound Eternity.

—MARY H. JONES, in The American Friend.

HAVERFORD, Pa.

THE SOLID HOPE FOR LASTING PEACE.

Something deep and fundamental will be necessary to prevent such a calamity as the late war—namely, a fuller realization of our truer relationship to God and our fellow-men. As it looks to me, the one sure, solid hope for a lasting peace on earth can only come about as individuals, beginning with themselves, sincerely desire and purpose to follow the spirit of Jesus Christ, who so perfectly revealed and is still revealing God to men.

ROBERT H. MARIS.

ELEVENTH MONTH 6, 1921.

"PEACE."

Eight months' residence in a small village lying not far behind the Verdun front, had led me to believe that I was more or less (privately, I would have said, more) familiar with the workings of a French mind. But alas! the events of the ninth month of my stay turned our little world so topsy-turvy, and blew my pet conceits to such far reaches of the firmament that I am forced to admit that as far as I am concerned the mind of the French peasant is as an unexplored region—a thing fearfully and wonderfully made.

The morning before peace was actually declared, and when even the most skeptical could see that the war was over, I happened to remark on the good news to an old neighbor. Much to my surprise she answered with a shrug of her bew-shawled shoulders:—

"If it's over, tant mieux—but do you really think it is over?"

I could have shaken the old lady—but after repeating the performance with various members of the community and hearing always the "Pensez vous, tant mieux!" I came to the conclusion that Madam Ogier was only one among a whole village, probably a whole country, suffering from the disease of unbelief. Of all the people I met and challenged that morning with my: "Have you heard the wonderful news?" only one, Monsieur Berthelemy, gave evidence of the stirrings of belief, and even his "Tant mieux, it's none too soon"—held the shadow of incredulity.

How I longed for a taste of the celebration that I knew was going on at home. The rivalry of the church bells, the shrieking sirens from the mills, the fire-crackers and rockets, and further off the uncanny wails of the horns on the boats at anchor in the Delaware. Surely Americans knew how to celebrate as befitted such things—but the French—bah!

Why was it that these people who had won for themselves such praise as gallant soldiers, such a reputation for pluck and patience—why was it that when all was over and their goal had been reached—they should accept the outcome with such apparent disinterest, and their everlasting "Tant mieux."

And so, I asked Madam Ogier about it one day shortly after my experience, and this is what she told me.

We were sitting in her brick-floored kitchen at the time, the fire on the huge hearth throwing searching lights into the farthest corners, the grandfather's clock (whose chime reminded one so much of the one at home) ticking on the wall. It was the day after peace had been declared. Having suddenly awakened to the fact, the village had quite gone mad. Flags were hung out, school was closed, and the boys who would soon have been called in class 21—had raided the church and were pulling away on the bell ropes as if peace itself depended upon their efforts. This was more to the point, but why had they been so doubtful the day before! Here Madam Ogier divining my thoughts or else thinking I had been quiet too long interrupted my meditations with:—

"Hearken to the bells, how they ring! And the peace has come at last after four long years—tant mieux, tant mieux!" Hoping to have my question answered without further effort on my part, I merely chimed in with a:

"Vraiment, tant mieux!" and presently the old lady went on half to herself and half to me:

"Dites donc, peace has come, you say, but what is peace to me! Perhaps if I were the age of those gamins who ring the bells and wave the flags, I would be happy—but my house has been burned, my son has been killed, and I am old, old! Say then—what is peace to me?"

I was glad she did not seem to expect an answer for suddenly the solving of my problem had come to me, and I knew without asking why I had received such non-committal answers, and why "tant mieux" had been the extent of their enthusiasm.

A night or two afterwards I had another glimpse into that mystery, the French mind. We had dropped in at Monsieur Druet for a friendly gossip around a roaring fire—one of the recompenses for the hard life on the land. The talk as such things will, ran hither and thither, touching now on the high price of sabots, now on the plans for the coming "Co-operative" until in response to a question from one of us, the Mayor swung the talk deftly towards that topic of all consuming interest—la guerre! This time the particular phase stressed was the loss of man-power to the village of Evres itself—and as M. Druet talked I watched his wife, whose only son had been killed, and his daughter, whose husband was a prisoner in Germany—and again the answer to my questionings came to me.

The rest of the room slowly grew darker and darker hiding everything, but within the circle of those dancing flames the faces of Madam Druet and her daughter stood out distinct and on them one could read the secrets that they thought so safely hidden from the world.

Young Felix Druet, the only son of the house, had been one of the quota of twenty-two men drawn from the village—and after one year's war he had fallen fighting in the Argonne—that cemetery of so many young Frenchmen.

His father told us how they had heard rumors of a fierce attack made by the company in which they knew their son to be, how they had written several times to his officers, and heard nothing, how they were growing desperate when an official report, a month late, brought word of his death, "on the field of honor." A simple story, simply told, but looking into those faces round the fire one could see that its very simplicity had been the terrible part for those who loved him most.

Monsieur Berthelmy, aged forty-six, had left his wife, three sons and a fine farm to do work behind the lines. Spring of 1916 found him in one of the forts around Verdun in charge of a huge munition dump. One evening the underground burrow where he and fourteen others were at work, was nosed out by a long range gun. A direct hit, a terrific explosion; here the Mayor bent forward to poke the fire—since that spring one rarely sees Madame Berthelmy outside her home.

Pierre Jenquin, Gaston Henri, Louis Savin, like the inexorable voice of Fate the Mayor droned on—George Colson, Maurice Deneville, eleven in all who will never come back to Evres—to them peace means nothing.

The voice stopped and we were quiet for a moment or two until a shower of sparks broke the spell and we rose to say good-night.

Outside the door, in the cold moonlight, a group of young Frenchmen were laughing and shouting. As we shook hands with Madam Druet, I saw her glance at them and heard her say half unconsciously:—

"For them it is finished—tant mieux."

A QUAKER OUTPOST.

It was dark and raining hard when my companion and I set out for Nippori evening meeting. We took our muddiness to the elevated railroad, rode to a junction, and transferred by tram-car to another railroad. The travelers resembled those in an early evening car at home—late home-going laborers, stolidly gazing at the floor, a few pleasure-seekers, children asleep, and here and there a grown-up dozing with head dropped forward. At Nippori we alighted, and wondered which way to go. The guard suggested crossing the bridge, so we chose that way and approached the nearest shop-keeper. Keeping our muddy feet in the street, we addressed him as he sat comfortably on the raised floor among his wares, and asked where the Christian meeting might be.

Up the street and round the corners we found a small crowd gathered at an open door, and we heard the strains of a hymn. Disposing of wet wraps, we entered, and took our places with a handful of others on the narrow benches in the vestibule. Only a high step in the floor separated us from the inner room where a dozen little children squatted and sang the words of a hymn written large on a poster before them. After a while there was a story by the kindly man who had led them, then more hymns, then a motherly little talk by his wife, and then all the little folks bowed their heads and repeated, word by word, after their teacher, a simple prayer. Now it was time for the grown-up meeting, and one by one the children dropped down to the outer room, where they climbed over benches, or jogged the babies on their backs, while their elders listened quietly to the teaching. There were several short talks, those by the two foreign teachers being interpreted with a fervent dignity by the faithful old Japanese evangelist. His own words must have made their appeal even more strongly, to the changing group at the door. Men and boys, young girls, mothers with babies on their backs, one after another they paused, stood in the mud under their dripping umbrellas to listen, and then passed on. A few accepted the invitation to come in and sit down. There was a heart-felt prayer by the Sabbath-school teacher, and then we said good-bye and went home through the night rain.

An obscure outpost, say you? Energy wasted on the few and lowly? Only the future can tell. A woman who helps may tell some little girl's mother of the Christian school where she herself was educated; a Christian student may talk with a boy at the door, and give him the hope of the English instruction that is the ambition of every Japanese youth; some may heed the invitation to attend the morning Bible class in the same house next week. Social betterment is needed, nowhere more; but the new house cannot stand if it be built upon the sand of non-Christian morality. The re-creation of social life in Japan rests with her young Christians, and their growing structure still rocks to many a wind of doctrine and rattles in many a storm of gossip. St. Paul's warnings to his young churches about "strife and contention," no less than his encouragements to the faint-hearted, come to one's mind as one sees the struggles of these young men and women to lift up their ideals of equality, conditions of work, or peace on earth. They cannot have too strong a foundation on which to build their new society, and every heart that knows something of Jesus Christ is another stone.

TOKIO, Tenth Month 10, 1921.

A "FELLOWSHIP" REUNION AT WESTTOWN.

On Seventh-day, Tenth Month 22nd, seventeen young Friends of Fallsington and Trenton Meetings, who are not students at Westtown, journeyed thither to meet our eleven fellow members at the School in a reunion at the Lake House. Seventh-day evening all the privileges of the Lake House—the kitchen, dining-room, fire-place and canoes, contributed to the perfect enjoyment of our social intercourse. After the students had returned to the School for the night, the rest of us converted the Lake House and "Shack" into women's and men's dormitories, respectively, and experienced all the joys of campers in late autumn.

After breakfast on First-day morning we held a regular "Fellowship" meeting. This Master George Jones made possible by permitting our student members to join us at the Lake House in lieu of attending Scripture Class,—a privilege for which we all feel very grateful. The subject for discussion was: "The Application of the Principles of Quakerism to Our Every Day Lives." Our lives are so complex, at present, due to the great number of problems that confront us, that we felt that the goal to keep ever in mind is this: that we should act in such a way that others may observe that we are Quakers, not because we adhere to certain forms and regulations, but because we live consistent Christian lives. "Actions speak louder than words" may seem rather trite, but the world to-day is looking for actions, not profession.

At the conclusion of our discussion we attended Meeting at the School, where we also had dinner before returning home.

RUTH KIRKBRIDE.

PRAYER.

"Prayer is, to-day, almost a lost art," William Littleboy said at a First-day evening meeting at Media on Eleventh Month 5th. "The reason that the testimony of the witness of the Church of Christ to-day is so weak and unconvincing is that we, who make up its membership, fail in the matter of prayer," he went on.

Some men wish to excuse themselves from prayer on the ground that they are men of action and they will leave prayer to others. Sometimes they say, "To labor is to pray." This is a vicious and devastating half truth. To labor is not to pray unless it is done in a spirit of prayer. Both are necessary to the Christian's spiritual life, just as both fresh air and exercise on the one hand and food on the other are necessary for the natural life.

The difficulties of prayer, both intellectual and practical, are very real problems, but too much emphasis has been placed on them in the past. The best advice to give anyone confronted by a difficulty in prayer is: pray and keep on praying. The very common difficulty of having frivolous and distracting thoughts break in when you attempt to pray, has bothered all people who try to pray and is the result of inexperience, and not the outcome of sin in one's life.

He suggested as a method of approach that we use the God-given faculty of imagination to picture, for ourselves, God in all the splendor that Christ attributes to Him. Then we should imagine ourselves entering the inner chamber and coming to Him alone. Then we should tell all that is on our hearts to Him who knows us so intimately that He has even counted the hairs of our heads. Instead of considering God reluctant towards us we should remember how the father in the parable of the prodigal son, ran to meet the son. The speaker said he believed that such an experience would not be without profit for us.

But even if there were never any answer to prayer it would be profitable for us because it is the cultivation of our friendship with God. We do not get acquainted with our human friends by simply a nod or a "Good morning" in passing.

Why then should we be content to remain on a nodding acquaintance with God? Whom would we rather have, or who is better fitted to be our intimate friend than God, the loving Father?

HOWARD E. YARNALL, JR.

[THE following has been distributed to those who are technically called Young Friends. We reprint it feeling that it belongs just as fully to those who are Young Friends in sympathy and interest, but who have automatically passed from our mailing list.—Eds.]

DEAR FRIEND:—

All of us who are fortunate enough to be of Quaker ancestry are Young Friends. Whether we are Friends in name depends largely on our birth; whether we fulfil our obligations to work and live as Quakers depends not on our birth, but on ourselves.

The purpose of this letter is not to appeal for funds, but to ask for your suggestions. The Executive Committee has already outlined plans for the winter which will help us to become more forceful men and women, and will enable us to give practical assistance to those who need our help. In order to fulfil these purposes the Executive Committee has set up the following standing committees:—

1. Study Group Committee, which plans meetings on live subjects to be addressed by able speakers.
2. Social Committee which will have charge of our tea-meetings and social gatherings.
3. Editorial Board has charge of our number of THE FRIEND.
4. Finance Committee.
5. Mission Committee is responsible for aiding other races than our own.

The Executive Committee itself is interested in the many other opportunities which arise. These committees are all "manned" by energetic, practical people and the year ahead looks very bright.

Nevertheless, we realize that no activity, no matter how good, will make the Young Friends' Movement what it can be unless back of that there is interest and co-operation of all Young Friends anxious to serve a world in need of those who see in Christ's life not only an example, but a power to lead us out of chaos. In order that Quakers may be the quiet but effective force which it is in their power to be, we are asking not only for your suggestions but for your active interest.

Cordially,

C. C. BALDERSTON, 2ND, Chairman.

MARY J. MOON, Executive Secretary.

"I ATTENDED the Meeting at Leeds—which was large, and consists for the most part of young people; sober, but few of them yet baptized of the Lord by His sanctifying baptism, which is much the state of our young people at this day throughout the world; being in danger, as others have done, of sitting down under the profession of Truth, in a traditional way, as to the doctrine and form of the discipline of it, and yet short and ignorant of the life, light, virtue and power of Truth essentially in themselves; by which an apostasy from the very form may enter and proceed gradually till the whole be lost, as to them, and some other thing take place under the same name, which the Lord prevent, by His kind and merciful visitation, in His own time and way, for nothing else can do it, or carry on that great and glorious work, which His own arm has begun in the earth in and by His people."—Thomas Story's Journal, Sixth Month, 1736. Selected by M. C. Foster.

THE KEY TO STABILITY AND PROGRESS.

The call of the times is for more and better service. The shirkers are in the saddle, and they are riding to destruction, dragging many others along with them. Only when they are unhorsed and the real workers, those who truly serve and kind, take their places, is there any hope for industrial stability or social progress.

The toiling age
Will forget its rage
When the Prince of Peace draws near.

The "Labor Problem" will be solved satisfactorily and permanently only when it is solved by the method of the Carpenter of Nazareth—that is, when it is solved by the coronation of service and sacrifice.

"Glory of sceptre and thrones, glory of sword and of song;
Glory of gold that beguiles the heart of the heedless throng;
Oh, what are these glories beside the glory of one lone Man,
Who dreamed not of glory but wrought out in trial and sorrow his plan
For helping the needs of the world, for healing the wounds that smart,
For lifting the vision of God to the burdened and breaking heart!
Whose glory it was to serve, no matter what men might say—
The glory that grows with the years and never can pass away!"

GEORGE HENRY HUBBARD, in Churchman Afraid.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL NOTES.

Two weeks ago the Young Friends' group of the Fallsington Meeting held a week-end Conference at the Lake House, to which the pupils of the School coming from that neighborhood were invited. A pleasant social time was had on Seventh-day evening, including some canoeing, and on First-day morning there was an earnest and helpful discussion, led by Ruth Kirkbride, on the application of Quakerism to the daily life. Including the pupils at the School, about twenty-five were in attendance.

Considerable work has been done this fall by the Botany class, under Albert L. Baily, in identifying the trees on the Campus and in the arboretum east of the soccer field. Charts of past planting have been consulted, to check up location and names. Through the generosity of an interested friend, many of the trees on the Campus are to be given permanent labels; in the necessary work of the accurate identification of these trees, Francis W. Pennell, '03, Associate Curator of the New York Botanical Garden, has been very helpful.

Four of the older boys recently made a trip to the Kent School in Connecticut with D. Robert Yarnall, Chairman of the Executive Committee. Henry W. Leeds had kindly placed his automobile and chauffeur at their service. They spent a night and a day at the School, every opportunity being given them of observing the system of student government and self-help which is so fully carried out there. In the afternoon they enjoyed watching a football game between Kent and Hotchkiss. The boys feel that they learned much of benefit to themselves in developing at Westtown a system somewhat similar to that at Kent.

A recently formed but very active organization is the Westtown Community Club. Membership is open to all who are connected with the School in any capacity, whether as employee or teacher, as well as to any neighbors who are interested. Meetings are held monthly, with a varied social and literary program. A camp-supper, followed by a social time, was held last month at the home of Clifford Cheyney at Thornorton. Recently, under the auspices of the Club, a Disarmament meeting was held in the School gymnasium, with addresses by Lloyd Balderston of Wilmington, and William I. Hull of Swarthmore. More than a hundred were in attendance, including many from outside the School.

On the afternoon and evening of the 29th, a Conference of the Friends' Educational Association was held at the School. About a hundred and fifty Friends came in from outside. In the afternoon the meeting was addressed by Mary H. Lewis, Principal of the Park School at Buffalo, who gave a most interesting account of the founding of her school and of its ideals and purposes. In the evening Raymond Robins of Chicago gave a forcible address, choosing for his subject, "A Democratic Solution of the Industrial Problem." The evening address was a part of the regular lecture course of the School. Other speakers who are scheduled to come to Westtown include Mary Antin, Dallas Lore Sharp, Margaret Slattery, Edward A. Steiner, and Frank D. Slutz.

In recent class elections, the following officers have been chosen:—Seniors: President, Charles E. Rhoads, of Moorestown; Secretary, Winifred M. Edgerton, of Langhorne; Vice-President, Vernon Lee Brown, of Washington, D. C.; Treasurer, Ruth M. Miller of Bethlehem. First Class: President, Edward L. Carslake, of Columbus, N. J.; Secretary, Sarah C. Carslake, of Columbus, N. J.; Vice-President, Randolph Winslow, of Bryn Mawr; Treasurer, Dorothy M. Hunt, of Moorestown.

JAPANESE NOTES.

JAPANESE GIRLS IN BUSINESS.

An increasingly important service for missionaries in Japan to render is to prepare young girls to enter active life in business or in society. Social conditions are changing, and women are coming more and more to have a place in society. And since the second year of the war, there has been such a demand for women in business, and they have been paid so much more as typists, etc., that many girls have gone into offices to help on the family expenses or at least to earn enough money for a marriage trousseau. In these days of the high cost of living the parents have had to let go their close hold of the girls, and girls have entered business life unwarned and unprepared to solve the problems they will meet. In many cases they have met shipwreck morally.

One problem of our business girls is to find time for the higher, better things of life. When they work in an office six days in the week, the one day at home becomes a day for washing and other necessary tasks, instead of a day of real rest and uplift and inspiration. The nobler influences of their school days are easily forgotten in the daily round of cares and anxieties. Unless they keep close touch with some of the teachers or the school, they are apt to fail at this point.

Without some such contact it is especially hard for girls to meet the temptations which often come to them in business. I know four girls who came to me last year to talk to me about office work. Two of them were only friends of our girls. In all of these cases the men in their offices, married men, were not satisfied by their home life, and these girls were more attractive to them; and the social fabric of Japan, the attitude of man toward woman, makes it almost necessary for a woman to do as a man says, so the girls must have more than ordinary strength of character to resist. Men used to leave their wives at home and go off on a holiday with a geisha. Now the educated girls in their offices who know English and can meet men and converse with them are more attractive. The man next to the head in the office of a great ship company said to one of these four girls that his wife did not mean anything to him, while this girl could talk to him. She was almost forced to go off with him on his holidays. It is nearly always older, married men, who abuse their freedom. But some girls are steady and firm in their principles in spite of it all. Two of our graduates this very year left positions because of so many insistent approaches and improper attitudes of the men toward them.

If girls are expected to go into business, we ought to help them to anticipate the situations, ask them beforehand what they would do, and so help them from being wrecked on the rocks when the danger comes. I think we make a mistake in waiting till the girls make a mistake. The school work seems too crowded to anticipate, but it would be very helpful to have a line of talks, club talks or parlor talks, taking up the difficulties not only of girls in offices, but of girls approaching maturity and about to go into active life. If the girls who have had the experience could form a club for other girls expecting it, it might be the thing that would save some girl, because she would have that memory and that backing to save her from making the mistakes that are too common.

THE NEED OF MORE HOUSES.

A CONGESTED NEGRO QUARTER!

The old "St. Mary Street Library" near Seventh and Lombard Streets was founded in 1884 in the heart of a Negro population. Those who had a hand in running the Library are not likely to forget the throng of children disporting themselves like little wild animals; fighting, standing on their heads, making wheels across the floor and indulging in other gymnastics. The neighborhood was notorious with Mom Hewitt and her counter of assorted cold victuals and her old women sent out with bandaged feet to collect them; with shouting Susan and her noisy following, so unruly in their excitement as to be "carried off on Sundays in the Black Maria," which came without being sent for; with the woman who swallowed the policy tickets when tracked to her haunts by the police; these and many other dramatic characters made the street a den of misrule. The situation was stimulating, but those at work were too inexperienced to read far into the lives of the sad array of men, women and children with whom they came in contact.

In 1893, Thrift Clubs were started—first a Coal Club with about a dozen members, then a Rainy Day Society or Sick Benefit and then one for general use, a large number of families gradually taking advantage of the opportunities offered. During the coal strike of 1903, coal was sold by the bucket and the people all around Seventh and Lombard Streets swarmed out of their poor little homes, compelled by stern necessity. The sadness of the spectacle can never be forgotten. From every nook and corner in the side alleys came the aged, the infirm, the sick and suffering with every kind of receptacle, to drag home the coal.

Years passed and Jews and Italians crowded into the little street named (who knows why?) Saint Mary Street.

Though for years familiar with the neighborhood, there were many strange faces. As time flowed on the Negroes grew less and less able to cope with the strong current of immigrants which set in and so many moved to the western part of the city, that an office of the Whittier Centre was established in 1912, at No. 712 S. Eighteenth Street. In the statement of the Annual Report for 1920, 24,123 calls had been made by the Whittier Centre visitors and the money collected reached the amazing figure of $34,503.88.

As a result of this large number of calls, many nuisances were reported and abolished, such as overcrowding, six families living in a six-roomed house; unhealthy cellars owing to defective drainage; inadequate water supply, in some places one hydrant being used by many families. These and other conditions menaced the health and morals of the Negroes. Finding no survey had been made, as to defective housing conditions regarding this race, either at the City Hall or elsewhere, it was decided to ask the co-operation of the Philadelphia Housing Association, and a plan was drawn up by the Philadelphia Housing Association to be filled out by the Whittier Centre visitors and tabulated as a basis for future activity.

The result proved the Negro race to be in crying need of decent homes. In order to begin to face the situation, the Whittier Centre Housing Company was formed, Dr. Chas. J. Hatfield and William Burnham giving their business experience to start the enterprise. Seven two-family houses were built at Opal and Dickinson Streets in 1916 with the best results, and somewhat more than a year ago thirty-two houses were bought in Moss Street, West Philadelphia. About one-half of these have now been put in good shape. Will you not give us a helping hand with the other half? Good homes are the basis of good living. The Housing Company must face the crisis and where else can we turn but to our friends?

ANNA HAINES' STORY OF THE RUSSIAN FAMINE.

When one has seen garbage-carts full of dead babies' bodies, and grown-up people and younger children falling dead on the streets from hunger, and the farm machinery, which is more precious in Russia than human life at the present time, scrapped and rusting along the wayside, one loses all possibility of putting the story into words which will adequately describe it.

Most of you, I think, are familiar with the larger outlines of the Russian famine story. You know that the great Volga Valley, which has always been the granary of Russia, and which has supported not only its own people, but most of the rest of European Russia with wheat and rye, is now practically bare of any of those foods. There has fallen only two-and-one-half inches of rain over an area eight hundred miles long by five hundred miles wide in the last ten months. Acres which have in the past produced on the average over a thousand pounds of wheat, have this year produced only fourteen pounds, and in many places much less than that. Many of the peasants with whom I talked, said that all of the grain which their land had produced could have been held in their doubled hands. That meant a family's food for a whole year.

The number of people who are affected in this way has been variously stated. Some have put it as high as 50,000,000 and others as low as 10,000,000. The official figures given to us by the Soviet Government are 20,000,000. Advisers say that probably 10,000,000 will actually die from starvation unless foreign help is brought in.

In institutions for children under three years of age there is already a death-rate of 90 per cent., and the only reason that there were any children left in these institutions is that new ones were brought in day by day by the police, being found either deserted on the streets or taken from parents who had died from cholera or the famine. The older children from three to fifteen in the institutions have a death-rate of about 80 per cent.

The plains in Russia ordinarily have no trees. It is just a level, slightly rolling plain covered with village after village scattered upon it. This year it looked as though a forest fire had swept over it. Farms and areas which are usually green and fresh with harvest were burned almost black. There was no evidence that there would be any grain at all. Every few rods as one would journey along one would see carrion-birds flying away from the carcasses of horses or dogs that had died along the way. We met a continuous stream of refugees, some going one way, and we passed others going in the opposite direction. They were just searching for some place where there might be food. One family had passed across the country with two horses, a baby and such utensils as they could take. They had been traveling to a place which they had heard contained food. But when they reached there they found there was less there than in their own home and now they were wandering back, saying that they preferred to die at home rather than in a foreign land. One horse had died and the other was nothing but a bag of bones. The two older children were living from the rinds of watermelons, their heads were covered with sores and with flies, and their parents were too listless and tired to pay any attention to them. They said they thought they would die before they got home, but it was better to keep moving than to die by the wayside.

We stopped one night at the home of what had been one of the richest peasants in the village. He had a large wooden house with three rooms, which is very large for that neighborhood. It was surrounded with barnyards and sheds for stock, all of them now empty. One of the daughters-in-law said that last year they had twelve horses and six cows. The cows had now all been sold or killed and all the horses had gone but one, which they still kept. They showed us the kind of bread the ordinary Russian family is using and has been using for several months. Every day they went out several miles into the fields to collect the grass and weeds and little leaves from bushes, and roots, and the hoofs of horses which they mixed up together into a powder to make bread. There is no cereal constituent in the bread at all, and therefore they have to put the horses' hoofs into it to make it stick together. Doctors in Samara told us that these pancakes would keep a person alive for about two months, but that if you had nothing else to eat except that kind of food you could not live for more than two months on it.

We went up one morning to see one of the institutions, where the abandoned and orphan children were kept. It had been planned to house 60 children, but when we were there it had 400 within its walls. There were 31 cups and bowls for these 400 children to eat with. There was no ordinary plumbing equipment, and they tried to bathe them and get as many lice off them as possible, but they had to go back into the same clothes which they had taken off, because there were no others. There was no attempt to have any amusement for them or any teachers. The teachers and caretakers were ill themselves. Malaria was very prevalent, and every child was ill with either malaria or dysentery. The children were perfectly motionless, with lifeless eyes. Once in a while they would look up if a teacher came in, but there was no interest in anything else. The children lived on grass bread and a little bit of meat-soup, but the babies could not digest that and for them there was no hope. The death-rate was higher than ninety per cent. in this house when I was there. You could hear them for at least two blocks away, from the steady wail they kept up, a loud moan getting louder and louder as one approached the house. Every morning the nurses would go around and separate the ones that were going to die that day, then at different times during the day they would go around to feel if the bodies had become cold. Every day a big garbage-cart came and the dead bodies were taken out and thrown into a small trench.

Scenes like this occurred over and over again in an area just as large in square miles as all of our Atlantic seaboard, including Pennsylvania.

Feeding children in such a situation is not enough. It is quite different from the feeding in Germany and Austria. In those countries a goodly portion of the population had money and had food and it was natural to take care only of the children. But in the Volga Valley there is no food and there is no money. And if the older people die and the farm machinery has to be deserted, and the rest have to leave their homes there will be no grain raised for next year to support the Russia of the future and the nation will die.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

THE WAY TO DISARM.

The way to disarm is to disarm. This is our reply to those of our readers who have asked us for a program and a platform for the coming Conference. It is, moreover, absolutely practical and, since the last war, no longer open to the charge of visionary sentimentality. The Nation long ago declared that the world must get rid of war or war will get rid of the world. A true description of this Conference would be that it meets not for the limitation of armament, but in its essence to prevent the human race from committing suicide. For to this pass have we now come; the world is in ruins as a result of this last struggle; it is economically wrecked. In Central Europe it is by no means certain that civilization will survive; that five to six millions of human beings may yet die from starvation in Europe is the belief of hard-headed men who have lately surveyed the situation. Yet all of this was the result of a struggle which only began to draw in whole populations, had only begun to use the discoveries in the field of poison gas, chemical and aerial warfare which in the next struggle will blot out whole armies and cities. To commit suicide or not to commit suicide, that is the question before the Conference.

What is needed is a complete moral revulsion against the whole miserable policy of dominating others by force and particularly a moral revulsion against the new prostitution of science to the business of murder by wholesale. The science that should be the very means to a better and richer life, a safer and happier one for the multitudes that toil—this is now to be the handmaid of war, capable of tearing down in a month the labor of centuries, for, we repeat, the will to war to-day is the will to suicide. For this we ask no one to take our word; let the curious study the speeches of General Fries, head of our Chemical Warfare Service, or the facts in Will Irwin's "The Next War;" let them recall the poignant regret of our poison gas officers that the unexpected ending of the war prevented them from trying out their new gas which would, they said, if released near a great city, kill some two or three hundred thousand persons. Was it not General Mitchell, assistant chief of our flying corps, who begged a month ago to be allowed to try a little poison gas and some aerial bombs on his striking fellow-Americans in West Virginia? Every practical test bears out the assertions of all the progressive officers of the army and navy that the day of the great battleship is over. That mankind will turn from now on to these new chemical means of destruction, the power and range of which may be measured by the recent explosion in Oppau is the burden of every militarist's song—without regard to the fact that these terrible forces may some day master humanity and beyond question place power in the hands of a few miscreants to perpetrate indescribable horrors upon their inoffensive fellow-men.

No, for once the ideal and the practical are the same. There is no road to the reduction of taxation and the restoration of business surer than that which leads through disarmament. Men will prate, of course, that war must ever be, that the passions of men can never be changed. So some doubtless spoke when the race began to eschew cannibalism and so we know they spoke when the duel was placed without the pale of law. Nor is it the passions of men that are to be feared to-day as much as the greed and cupidity, the blindness and cruelty and folly of diplomats and rulers. No people unwhipped by its imperialists hates another and no people but is capable of being moved by a new passion of fraternity, of brotherhood, of goodwill, such as was preached in Galilee.—From The Nation of Eleventh Month 9th.

CONCRETE SUGGESTIONS.

What can individual citizens do to help in the reduction of armaments?

1. Accept your personal responsibility in helping your church and your community to believe in the practicability of a warless world.
2. Help circulate the booklet, "A Creed for Believers in a Warless World," and other relevant literature.
3. Master and remember the facts, figures and policies given in the booklet under "Startling Statistics," "Problems before the Conference" and "Important Principles."
4. Write individual letters to your two Senators, to your Representatives in the House and to the four American members in the Conference. Remember that resolutions passed in mass meetings or signed by hundreds or even thousands of names, though valuable, do not begin to have the influence with legislators that individual letters have which show intelligent knowledge, deep interest and personal conviction.
5. Unite with others in getting the Mayor to ask all citizens to pause for two minutes at noon on Eleventh Month

11th, for silent prayer for God's blessing not only on our beloved country, but also on the International Conference.

6. Talk in your home and with friends about the Conference, being equipped for such conversation by the information given in pamphlets dealing with the necessity for an immediate reduction of armaments.

7. Write short letters of not more than 300-400 words to your local newspapers. Editors, as a rule, are glad to know what their readers are interested in.

8. Let Church groups, women's clubs, or other organizations ask the managers of local motion picture houses to prepare and use each afternoon and evening, five or six slides presenting statistics and brief quotations on the question of the reduction of armaments.

9. Throughout the period of the Conference maintain continued attention to its proceedings and continued study of international problems and policies.—From The Federal Council of Churches in their four-page sheet entitled "The Church and a Warless World."

RE-ARMAMENT.

Not all the armor forged by man, not all the weapons he has made for his defence, have saved him.

Ships and guns, poisonous fumes, deadly engines of the skies and the waters, have availed, for the moment, not to make the old world better, but to make the new world worse.

The incense of valor and sacrifice and death—all honor and reverence to the noble spirits who made these immortal offerings!—has risen from the altars, and not yet is the world re-born.

Therefore, it is that man, wounded, bleeding, burdened, staggering, fumbles at the buckles that bind the weight of his armor on his back, longing to cast it off, and wondering if they that take the sword must after all perish by the sword.

Shall he then throw away all his weapons of conquest and defence?

There is one armor that the world of men and women, as a world, has never put on. The churches have long bungled with its fastenings, but the world has gone unfenced, and few have been those in whose hands the mystical sword of the spirit has shone with daily use.

This armor, waiting to be worn, is the armor of brotherhood and sacrifice, the sword of unselfishness, a conquering sword, with the power, when used, to unite the world in love. And there are none who may not put it on.

A dream of the poets? Yes. But there are dreams that come true. Even now the poet's voice is merged and drowned in the universal cry, Disarm. The prudent and fearful hold back, and ask, "Disarm and stand defenceless?" The answer comes, to all a single answer, "Disarm and arm again, with a new armor, not yet tried."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

THE Miami Central News, Miami, Florida, comes to the office of THE FRIEND with some regularity. We take it this is through the courtesy of Stephen C. Singleton, one of our subscribers. Much in the paper is in the direction of the highest Christian ideals. We respond especially to its well-tempered advocacy of disarmament.

WOOLMAN SCHOOL.—The Board of Managers of Woolman School met on Tenth Month 21st with an unusually large attendance. Every one felt that the Directors' report, given by Elbert Russell, was full of interest and might be passed on to friends of the School through the Friends' papers.

The special week-end course has met with an enthusiastic response and an enrollment of twenty pupils. Several Extension Courses are being given this fall, and others being planned to begin later in the winter. Elbert Russell is giving a considerable amount of his time to addresses on Disarmament.

The Board felt very much gratified at the splendid work the School is accomplishing, and the helpful part its former students are taking in their meetings. It only wishes that more resident pupils might be present to share in the opportunities offered.

ABINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING was held in regular course on the 10th. At the Meeting of Ministers and Elders the previous day, Hannah P. Morris told of her prospect of attending North Carolina Yearly Meeting. This had not matured in time to go to the Monthly Meeting, but she was encouraged to proceed and the Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders gave her a minute. William Littleboy, E. Maria Bishop, Gurney and Elizabeth Binford and E. Max Reich were at the session on the 10th. Except Elizabeth Binford these all had acceptable vocal service.

In addition to routine business and the reading of William Littleboy's minute, three subjects from the Yearly Meeting were under consideration. As a result a committee was appointed to consider, in a conference or otherwise, "the basis of membership;" the subordinate meetings were instructed to make replies to the new social order queries, and a member of the Yearly Meeting's Committee on "Organic Unity" made a plea for individual consideration of this important subject.

In the evening a sympathetic audience listened to Dr. Hilda Clark and Edith Pye in their presentation of Austria's extremity.

THE NEGRO AND TUBERCULOSIS

Because of the relation of tuberculosis to squalid, ill-ventilated houses and the peculiar susceptibility of the colored race to this disease, the Whittier Centre Housing Company has enlisted the able assistance of Dr. Charles J. Hatfield, and Dr. H. R. M. Landis of the Henry Phipps Institute. Dr. Landis, in an address in Washington, D. C., put the facts of the case squarely before the Convention on Tuberculosis when he said:—

"In dealing with the tuberculosis problem among the Negroes greater difficulties are encountered than among those of the white race. It matters not, however, whether we are actuated by sentiment to aid a race struggling under difficulties or whether we view the problem as a public health measure. The essential things to bear in mind are:—that in many of our Northern cities the colored population is large; that tuberculosis is wide-spread among this race and that the white population cannot ignore the menace this wide-spread infection carries."

You can help in this work by investing your money in the Common Stock of the Whittier Centre Housing Company which is established to alleviate this condition. This company offers 500 shares of its stock at $50 per share. The sale of 200 shares is imperative before cold weather, for the renovation of properties on Moss Street, north of Parrish Street. Checks may be sent to Mr. Samuel H. Carpenter, Treasurer, 517 Chestnut Street.

THE COMMON PEOPLE.

Abraham Lincoln is credited with many things which he probably never said, this partly because they seem to fit the man, but more probably because with such authorship established they will be pondered the more carefully.

It is claimed to have been a favorite remark of his that God must have had a special regard for the common people or He would not have made so many of them.

Just who common people are is difficult to define; there are times when all of us would be willing to claim a place in the group, and again there are circumstances when there are only a very few who would not fight shy of the classification.

The suggested contrast between the group of listeners gathered in the street about the earnest speaker some First-day morning, and the select company within the shelter of the great church edifice across the way compels reflection.

The speaker in the one case does not appeal to us, he soon reveals as he proceeds in his discourse how great are his limitations and how very narrow and circumscribed is his knowledge; the crowd about him is, to our notion, even less appealing than the preacher, and as our eyes roam over the motley gathering of men and women we are conscious of a little pang of thankfulness that we are not of them.

Within the great building across the street, the scene could not, if arranged with that end in view, be greater in contrast. The preaching is by a man trained to the profession; years devoted to study and backed in many cases by generations of scholarship are his natural inheritance, all of the outward trappings of the place bespeak good taste, wealth and refinement, and many of those who occupy the cushioned benches seem to reflect the same standards; there is nothing to be called common in the whole vast building.

It is recorded by Mark the Evangelist, that Jesus after having answered the scribe's query, "What commandment is the first of all?" and having received his "discreet" reply, said to the scribe, "Thou art not far from the Kingdom of God," and then after a few words had been uttered Mark adds, "And the common people heard Him gladly." We draw a mental comparison, based more on imagination than on anything that has come down to us of record, between the hillside meetings in Judea and Galilee where great multitudes thronged Him, and those other meetings when, in the accustomed places of worship, He spoke the message; but wherever the lesson was given, out-of-doors in the sunshine or within the synagogue, it was the common people who most willingly received it and who were the slowest to cavil at the new teachings it contained.

Our Lord never erred in His actions. He summoned His chief messengers from among those who in that day were called simple-minded, common people. He has very often since called them from the same class and He will doubtless so continue till His great task has been completed. The lessons He had for them were not beyond their comprehension, though often, then as now, they stumbled at what He said, because "He taught as never man taught."

There is a feeling current in church circles and our own Society reflects it in a more pronounced manner than most, best illustrated by the expression—"those less favored than ourselves." It must have been in spirit much the same as that used by the Pharisee of long ago, who, in all honesty to himself, felt his aloofness to the Johns and the Peters of his time.

The common people heard the message of their Lord with attentive ears and heeded His commands, while others gave their strength in trying to unravel His meaning and fitting it in with their own preconceived philosophy.

It was a modest man, drawn from the ranks of the common people, the same who had been with Paul on his first missionary journey and with Peter in later years, John Mark, the son of Mary of Jerusalem, who wrote down the story of the life of Jesus as he heard it from Peter and others like him. Thus we have the Gospel of Mark, the first record in point of time of the greatest life ever lived, and that at the hands of one of the common people.

It was humble fisher-folk at the baptism at the Jordan, who with the multitude heard the words of John the Baptist, but who, comparatively alone, heeded them.

It was common men who in those early days stood steadfast to the surrender of the faith they had declared and who became martyrs therefore, and it has been men and women from the same class who since that day have oftenest made a like sacrifice.

Paul was a promising pupil in the school of Gamaliel, and could have retained that which his natural talents had secured him, but it was as a man of the people, a tent-maker, satisfying his outward needs by his own toil that he saw his way to best serve his Master and his fellows.

It is true that not a few of our Lord's most profound teachings came to us through interviews he held with those who would not class with common people. It was a ruler of the Jews who came to Him in the secrecy of the night, to whom was given the great lesson on the new birth or spiritual regeneration, and they were Pharisees of no uncertain type on whom he pronounced those scathing denunciations, which should yield to the humble, honest searcher a rich reward as he contrasts them with the fruits of the Spirit.

But there came a day in the early history of the Church when the spirit of organization and hence, leadership, took the place of that evangelizing spirit which, it would seem, characterizes every fresh outbreak of Christian zeal. Then the common people lost ground. The Church became a highly organized institution, for in the nature of things it had to be so. The simplicity of Christian fellowship, nowhere better shown than in Paul's Epistle, written to that little group of Christians in a hill town of Macedonia, was gone, and in its stead came the stately magnificence of a highly organized church. The common people were still a part of it, but they soon came to be followers, and in place of that sweet fellowship that must have prevailed in Philippi to call forth Paul's letter to the little band there, there were the leaders and the followers, which all too soon merged into other titles, the clergy and the laity of to-day.

There is nothing in our Lord's Gospel too intricate for the common man to comprehend. There was nothing when He lived and spoke it centuries ago and it is the same to-day. The picture of the throngs who gathered about Him has a counterpart in the great crowds who listened to George Fox and John Wesley and the host of Christian evangelists drawn from the common people who have labored as they did.

The Church owes to the common people a tremendous debt. If there are common people among us to-day as there were in those times when Mark tells us they heard the Master gladly, it is a sad picture if they are becoming more and more unchurched.

Does it ever come home to us as a Religious Society, the one most democratic of all the churches, as it is also the smallest and therefore should be the best able to guard against the insidious distinctions of classes—Does it ever come home to us that the common people are out of place and can hardly share full fellowship among us?

In face of the enormous debt the modern Christian Church owes to the common people of the first century, no effort can atone for a lack of this spirit of generous fellowship. In a church where women have for eight generations shared with their brothers equal privileges and responsibilities in things spiritual, it behooves us to guard well our heritage. In a republic where class distinction is theoretically ruled out, it becomes us still more to set that same example of equality in fellowship, which will hold the common people to us, that the youthful Marks and Johns among us may find an abundant field for service in the church which developed under the preaching of George Fox.

We know that there was a distinctly religious vein in the character of Abraham Lincoln, that he was reverent toward things spiritual and that he trod with bared head where many another was flippant and careless; we also know that he never formally united himself with an organized church. His biographers have in large measure failed to make clear why one who felt his responsibility towards God as he did, kept aloof from church membership. To some, possibly to not a few, a partial answer to the query will be suggested by the spirit of what we have written.

A NEW MILESTONE.

Whatever may be the immediate outcome of the deliberations of the international conference now about to begin its sessions in Washington, the "accomplished fact" of such a conference cannot be insignificant. Prediction as to the near future is unsafe,—it cannot yet be stated how far we have traveled; but one may at least venture the thought that a current has set in, which, notwithstanding discouragements and possible disappointments, will not pass underground so as to be totally lost, and that the children of to-day may live to see a nearer approach to that happy condition in which "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." These, looking back, perhaps from "the meridian of life," can hardly fail to remember something of the enthusiasm and the glow of hope,—the solemnity also—of this time, even though they should recall with greater vividness the signs of the intensity of feeling with which the news of the Armistice was greeted three years ago. If they cannot now exactly feel all that some of their elders feel in what is welcomed as the coming of the dawn, they may yet live to rejoice in the light of the advancing day.

Some of the boys and girls in particular who are now at Westtown, will probably long remember certain events that have figured large in the experiences of this week:—the meeting on Fifth-day, when fervent pleas were made on behalf of Christ's kingdom of love, and we were feelingly encouraged to believe that now, as it was in a seemingly chaotic period of the Creation, the Spirit of God is moving "upon the face of the waters,"—"upon the face of the deep;" the morning reading next day of two appropriate stanzas from Whittier's poem, "The Crisis;" the stirring and illuminating addresses later in the day by Albert Linton and Elbert Russell, and finally the exercises in the literary societies, in which it was intended to make the meaning and the character of the Washington Conference somewhat more clear and real. Altogether, the stimulating as well as tendering influences that have gathered about us in this historic time are of value in themselves, and may eventually contribute to the bringing in of that better day "so long foretold" and now so earnestly hoped for.

WESTTOWN, Eleventh Month 11, 1921.

STILL, still with thee, when purple morning breaketh,
When the bird waketh and the shadows flee;
Fairer than morning, lovelier than the daylight,
Dawns the sweet consciousness, I am with thee.

So shall it be at last, in that bright morning,
When the soul waketh, and life's shadows flee:
O in that hour, fairer than daylight dawning,
Shall rise the glorious thought, I am with thee.

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

I.

Eleventh Month 11th, eleven o'clock in the morning! The Armistice is proclaimed! What a thrill of gratitude in humanity's heart greeted this hour and event three years ago today. And now to Arlington Heights are thronging hundreds of thousands of America's citizens to participate in the ceremonies celebrating Armistice Day. One of the most significant parades that Washington has ever seen has moved down Pennsylvania Avenue from the Capitol, to the White House, across the Potomac, and on to the Amphitheatre on these historic heights. The President of the Republic, its two ex-presidents, and many of the notables in the land have taken part in the procession. The body of an Unknown Soldier, a victim of the World War of 1914-1918, has been escorted in solemn splendor to be buried here with nearly two score thousand victims of the Civil War of 1861-1865. The old colonial mansion of Robert E. Lee, the leader of the South's lost cause, looks serenely down through its frame of autumn trees upon the throngs of living and the silent houses of the dead.

The President stands in the wonderfully beautiful amphitheatre, its white marble walls and columns decorated with festoons and wreaths of brilliant autumn flowers, and its chief portal, beneath which he stands and beneath which the body of the Unknown Soldier is being buried, bears the familiar words: "We here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain."

And now President Harding begins to speak. As his words roll solemnly forth, we recall that other memorial speech, President Lincoln's immortal eulogy spoken in Gettysburg Cemetery nearly two generations ago. Will this speech, too, ring down the centuries? Are these fateful words we hear? "This Unknown Soldier's sacrifice," he says, "and that of the millions dead, shall not be in vain. There must be, there shall be, the commanding voice of a conscious civilization armed against warfare. As we return this poor clay to its mother soil, garlanded by love and covered with the decorations that only nations can bestow, I can sense the prayers of our people, of all peoples, that this Armistice Day shall mark the beginning of a new and lasting era of peace on earth, good-will among men." May these words indeed be fateful ones; may God grant that President Harding may become the leader, not of an ever losing cause, but of a gloriously triumphant one; and may the eyes of our generation see once more the glory of the coming of the Lord and the disappearance of grim-visaged war forever from our earth.

The delegates from nine nations, assembled in Washington for the Armaments Conference, face President Harding as he voices humanity's hope for the cessation of war. They, and indeed all the vast throng who hear him, have their minds turned apparently toward the future, rather than the past, toward the task of to-morrow, rather than the failures of yesterday and the day before. The two Hague Conferences, the "War to end War," the Conference of Paris, the League of Nations, have all failed one after the other to solve the burning problem of our time, the Problem of Armaments. Now, once more, in God's providence has come another opportunity. The greatness of this opportunity has been recently expressed in striking phrase. The Quaker Governor of our Quaker Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in his proclamation calling for the observance of Armistice Day, said of the Conference that it would be "perhaps more fateful in its effects upon the destinies of mankind and civilization than any other assemblage ever planned by man." Premier Lloyd George, of Great Britain, declared in his recent Guild Hall speech that the Conference "can be the biggest event in nineteen hundred years." Premier Hara, of Japan, just before his assassination, expressed his belief that "President Harding has been inspired by God to call this Conference, and it behooves mankind, which is represented at this Conference, to accomplish things for the high and lasting benefit of humanity."

Thus, from all around the world are coming voices, from the seats of the mighty as well as from the lowly, which declare that the nations are on the tip-toe of expectation, straining toward the goal of permanent peace.

Like every great opportunity, this one, too, has its great difficulties. Already in Conference circles these difficulties are being stressed. Voices, strong with conviction, but of conflicting tenor, are declaring first this and then that to be the paramount problem which the Conference must face. The protection of France against Germany; the protection of Australia and New Zealand against Japan; the protection of China against Japan and the predatory powers of Europe; the protection of the British rule in India; Asia for the Asiatics, or the Japanese Monroe Doctrine; Alliances: Anglo-Japanese, Anglo-American, Anglo-American-Japanese, Franco-American; the maintenance of British Sea Power; the Freedom of the Seas; the method of reducing and restricting Armaments; the enforcement of Agreements. Such are some of the many problems which are declared to be "paramount and insoluble," and which are certainly bristling with difficulties. Most fortunately, it is not the Conference alone which will travail with these problems. A great cloud of invisible witnesses will labor with it in spirit. The young men and women, upon whose shoulders will lie the burden of to-morrow; the mothers of the race; forward-looking men and women of all ages and of every nation; the spirit of the Prince of Peace and of our Heavenly Father, will all brood over this Conference, we devoutly hope and pray, and under such influences it must succeed.

As we write these words, sitting on Arlington Heights, overlooking the City of the Dead and the beautiful City of the Living, the warm afternoon sun of a glorious autumn day is lighting up the Potomac, the Capitol, the Monument, the Lincoln Memorial, and the roofs of Washington's myriad homes. The Pan-American Building, in which the Conference will do its work, is overshadowed by its loftier neighbors and by the slowly-forming mists. As our eye lingers anxiously above it, we pray that God will send forth once more His Divine fiat: Let there be Light. May that Light illumine the dark and devious ways of diplomacy, the lurking shadows of international fears and suspicion; may it soften the hearts, enlighten the minds, and strengthen the consciences of statesmen and peoples; and may our God of Light and Love enable all His children to mind the Light which He sheds upon and within them.

Eleventh Month 12th, twelve o'clock noon. After a very unusual illumination of the city and its outstanding landmarks, yesterday evening, the Conference awoke to a crisp, sunshiny day, and assembled amidst nature's good omens. Its first session, an open one, is being held in Continental Memorial Hall, the Pan-American Building being too small for the delegates and guests. President Harding opened the session with an address briefly outlining the position of this country which, he said, "frankly wants less of armament and none of war." He thus made open diplomacy and the reduction of armaments the keynote of the Conference. Secretary Hughes then stated America's specific proposition for the abandonment of all capital ship-building programmes, both actual and projected, this abandonment to last for a minimum period of ten years, and thereafter no ship of more than 35,000 tons' displacement.

If this proposition is accepted, America's saving alone would amount to many millions of dollars and the "scrapping" of sixty-six ships of 2,000,000 tons by the three powers, and the ratio of the capital ships of the United States, Great Britain and Japan would be left as 5: 6: 3. The further significance of America's concrete proposition, and the reaction of the Conference to it must be left to later consideration. It constitutes at least a definite step towards the reduction and limitation of naval armaments; and its promptitude, precision and frankness caused a profound sensation. The British proposal at the first Hague Conference in 1899 for the establishment of an International Court of Arbitration was charged with a similar thrill of world-motion. May the two sister nations push on together their twin-plan of Disarmament and Peaceful Settlement.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING.

Iowa Yearly Meeting was held at Whittier, Linn County, this year, the meeting for Ministers and Elders being held at eight o'clock on the morning of Tenth Month 17th; followed two hours later by a public meeting for worship and in the afternoon by a meeting of the Representative body. The attendance was fully up to or in excess of the usual number. Those present familiar with Ohio Yearly Meeting thought the attendance nearly equal to Ohio.

Whittier is in the midst of the most densely settled Friends' community in the State, and in many respects is an ideal Quaker village, "far from the maddening crowd's ignoble strife;" though the long line of automobiles parked beside the meeting-house lawn gave it quite a touch of modernity. Back of the meeting-house are long rows of empty horse-sheds; horse-drawn vehicles seem to be almost obsolete. The writer recollects seeing but a solitary horse and spring wagon used during the time of Yearly Meeting.

The country surrounding Whittier is typical of Iowa farm land, a little more sandy than most, perhaps, though rich and productive, as the well-equipped and comfortable farmsteads testify. Another thing the passer-by cannot fail to notice is, that here and there may be seen huge boulders of granite or quartz bearing eloquent testimony to the tremendous forces of nature in the great ice-age when they were torn from their northern home, and deported to Iowa and elsewhere, to the sorrow of the farmer of to-day, whose land they jointly occupy with himself. But they have a wonderful tale to tell of fiery younger days and their equally wonderful journey when captured by the ice monster and carried to where we see them to-day. Surely the stones can teach many things to those who heed.

The membership in Iowa is quite widely scattered, and many Friends even from the most remote meetings came in their cars. This does not apply to Pasadena, Cal. Samuel Thomas was perhaps the only Friend in attendance from that meeting. Others from outside the State were Rachel Cope, a Minister from New Garden, Ohio, with her companions, Joshua and Mary Brantingham; and from Fairhope, Ala., Mary Smith, a Minister, with her companion, Elma Smith. Friends without minutes were Lindley Steer and wife, William and Rachel Bradway, Edmund and Eliza Smith of Ohio, and David and Margaret Henderson from Minnesota. Abner and Ella Newlin were in attendance on their way home from their European journey. It was a satisfaction and cause for thankfulness to see them again in our midst.

One feature in connection with Iowa Yearly Meeting is the arrangement conducted by the Committee on Entertainment, cooks being hired for the occasion and ample preparations made for boarding the entire attendance, thus relieving the women Friends in the neighborhood of care, and leaving them free to devote their time to meeting duties. Friends from a distance were lodged in Friends' homes near at hand. Many whole families were in attendance, consequently during the hours between meetings there were lively groups of children, and the adjacent ball-ground was patronized by the young men and women, of whom there was a goodly number. Their interest was by no means confined to the ball-grounds, and it was encouraging to see so many of the younger members take an interest in meeting affairs.

On Fifth-day morning the regular meeting for business opened and the reports from the Quarterly Meetings were read and the epistles from other Yearly Meetings. Committees were appointed to draft replies as way opened therefor. The epistles received were felt to carry more than usual weight. No doubt the distress and social unrest in the world, the aftermath of the war, had had the effect of deepening the concern in the minds of Friends generally for the world's welfare and that Truth might prevail, which concern was reflected in the epistles. The Dublin and London epistles bore evidence of this as well as the others. These two and one from Germany were read and directed to be acknowledged by the Clerk. Replies to all the others, including one from Fritchley, were produced at a future session and adopted by the meeting.

The afternoon of Fifth-day was largely devoted to the educational interests throughout the Yearly Meeting. The prevailing financial stringency has been felt, which, together with the increased efficiency of the public school system since consolidation has come into vogue, has added to the difficulty of keeping up our schools.

Next day, soon after the meeting assembled, the Representatives offered the names of William P. Young and Lewis L. Rockwell for men's Clerks and Alaz Binns and Ida McGrew for women's Clerks, who being united with, they were accordingly appointed for the ensuing year. The meeting then entered upon the consideration of the state of Society as portrayed in the answers to the Queries. These revealed many deficiencies which was cause for humiliation. But for all our deficiencies a good degree of love prevailed, which was manifested throughout the meeting.

The Representative Meeting met from time to time, and our concern for the spread of the peaceable nature of Christianity and the uplift of humanity took definite shape in an address to the Washington Disarmament Conference prepared by a Friend and adopted by the meeting; also one to the American delegates.

HENRY STANDING.

IF WAY OPENS.

"If way opens" is a phrase long familiar to Friendly ears and minds and hearts. The expression suggests one of the fundamental practices of Friends in the conduct of life. It indicates the practical application, in daily life, of our belief in an Inward Light. It involves more than following one's own best judgment—it goes deeper than that. It is based on a conviction that the Father is both interested in and concerned about our life as individuals. It implies Divine direction. We know that, "There is a guidance for each of us and by lowly listening we shall hear the right word."

Suppose two courses of action are present in consciousness. Thoughtful consideration takes place. Pros and cons are weighed. A sincere, earnest desire to do the right thing is uppermost in mind and heart. A little later on, the mind assumes a waiting attitude. Presently, clear and unmistakable, the still, quiet Voice is heard—the way opens.

The decision reached, a sense of peace follows; an ease of mind and a lightness of heart ensues. The upshot of the matter and the issues thereof are left, in complete confidence, to the Higher Power.

While arriving at decisions in a Friends' Business Meeting, the same clarifying influence is perceived. The "sense of the Meeting" is felt, not only by the Clerk, but by Friends generally. The Meeting is conscious, as a body, that way has opened for a certain course of action. The individual puts himself in an attitude of reception, knowing full well that

Light is sown for the righteous

And gladness for the upright in heart.

CHARLES B. HESTON, JR.

"THERE is no doubt that at the back of all our minds, vague, fugitive, hard to express, is the feeling that if it is God's world, if He has called us to be doctors and engineers and farmers, and chemists and schoolmasters and business men (for these are the sort of jobs to which He has called us), then being Christians must help us to do these jobs, not only to be better men but to be better business men, better farmers, better shop managers."—The Student Christian Movement.

EDUCATION.

ADDRESS OF MARY H. LEWIS, OF THE PARK SCHOOL, BUFFALO, N. Y.

GIVEN AT WESTTOWN SCHOOL, TENTH MONTH 29, 1921.

Mary H. Lewis said in substance:—

I was for ten years a teacher of little children in New York City—an artificial city. The children in the Horace Mann School were crowded in rows after rows, rooms upon rooms, in a building four stories high. They were brought to the school in luxurious style and after school hours were hustled by trim nursery maids into grand limousines in which they rode out on Riverside Drive. These children knew nothing of the simple play which all children enjoy. In an effort to find out their living conditions at home, I became convinced that such highly artificial conditions were crushing out the very spontaneity and virility which was the natural inheritance of children. I envied the life of the East Side child for the children in my own room. There, even in the dirt and filth of the street, they could work out their own natural play games, unhampered by the artificiality of the richer life.

Finally, I asked if I could not move my children to the roof of an adjoining building and teach them in the way which seemed to me proper. The scheme was presented (as the most foolish ever heard of) to the Faculty of "Horace Mann." But since the Horace Mann School was existing for experimentation in education, any scheme should have one trial at least. So the request was granted and I took my children to the roof of an adjoining building. There I was left completely by myself. The gymnasium teacher, the music teacher, the art teacher—all found it inconvenient to continue teaching my children. But then, I had plenty of space; the children had a chance to spread out, which was the only natural thing for them to do.

These children had not learned how to play together. When left to themselves they did not know what to do. Soon, however, although they knew nothing of organized play—I dislike organized play,—they formed a group with a leader and devised a game which was as beneficial in the development of their education as any text book could be. That first game was spontaneous. It was a New York fire staged on the roof. The whole play was planned and executed without help; great prancing horses—it was before the present fire engines—thrilling rescues and all.

The fact is that children do not want to be amused as so many think, but they want to act on their own initiative. I found out that only by living with children can one learn to know children. One rainy afternoon a little boy in the third grade asked if he could not stay at school and mend the roof of his rabbits' house even though it were wet. That boy preferred to work all the afternoon in the rain on the box house for a few rabbits than attend the moving pictures! Is it any wonder that the lives of these little children were considered artificial!

Of course my school was being closely watched to see if the students would be as well prepared for the upper grades as those who were in the class-rooms downstairs. I had made the statement that I was giving one-third the time to formal work which had been considered the minimum essential. At the end of the first year the children were tested out thoroughly and they ranked as high as the other grades, if not a little higher. And such a change had come over these pupils. A visitor suggested that one would not recognize them as the same children as those who were in the room downstairs the year before. They had become bright, active, vigorous, full of health, and possessed an initiative. That was far more apparent than in the children of the usual school routine.

All this suggested the idea of starting a school of my own. So when an offer came to me to begin a school in Buffalo, I was only too eager to grasp the opportunity. The Park School of Buffalo began with about twenty-seven children, from kindergarten babies to about the fourth grade. The school grew gradually and the curriculum adapted itself to needs. Children want simple things, and simplicity was the key-note here. If children have the right environment they grow and can be helped toward the right goal, as flowers thrive on the rain and sunshine. They are naturally happy, simple in their tastes, and as a rule healthy unless interfered with by parents and others.

The essentials in teaching children,—next after teachers, who are really the first essential—are: first, the environment, which must be cut free of any artificial surroundings. Secondly, there must be sufficient opportunity for development. Thirdly, there must be the possibility of service. Our school is different from other progressive schools only in being older. We have children now ready for high school who have never been out of this kind of training. To educate children for future citizenship it is necessary for them to be able to think independently and be tolerant. Being good citizens involves the development of qualities that begin when they are small children. The child is living with his mates, even if he progresses in his education only according to his ability. What is the aim of this school? It is not to make children happy, or healthy, or simple. They are that. It is to bring up a group who think for themselves, co-operate with their neighbors, have courage of their convictions, and tact in human relationships. It is possible to do this, and yet when they enter the formal schools they are not behind in scholarship. They work hard on account of the sense of achievement.

In practical, commonplace, hard work there is mental as well as physical effort. In the group they know their leader and can organize themselves. One day the children came in with muddy feet. Investigation proved that the road leading to the school building was in poor condition. So it was suggested that they get their wheelbarrows and their shovels and spread a pile of crushed rock—previously ordered for such an emergency—over the road. In forty-five minutes the job was completed and the children returned to school radiating the glow which results from hard, happy effort. I should rather see that youthful satisfaction in the successful accomplishment of a man's job than anything else in the world. That is education, and all there is in education is individual and co-operative service.

The question might as well be asked, does all this work in the high school and does it prepare for college examinations? The answer rests in the affirmative.

Also, if children are to go on to college under the new vocational plan of teaching, the time is coming when the college entrance requirements will be altered. The introduction of intelligence tests and so on of the last ten years represents such a change. I am sure that when the time comes for some of the students to enter college their record will hold up to the average, and most likely will be better than the average. The elementary schools would link up with the colleges better if the college professors would visit these schools and see what is being done by their instructors. This should be just as sensible as for the lower schools to be patterning after the colleges, for after all, the habit-forming age is when the boys and girls are in the lower grades.

The Park School is situated on a sixty-acre farm where the cottages are like homes from which the children come. Here there is opportunity for freedom of action, opportunity to make broader ideals. In our program for each day, there is one hour, or a period of forty-five minutes, which comes right after lunch, when the children may do anything they wish provided it does not interfere with anyone else. Preferably they are to be by themselves. It is this hour which the parents call "the play hour," the teachers call it "the free hour," but the children call it "the work hour." In the introduction of this free hour I feel that I may claim the title of being the originator. The time has proved of great value to the child when spent in this way. In the busy rush of modern life the child rarely finds time to occupy himself with the particular task which he really desires to carry out, be it reading or work of some kind. Here he finds opportunity to develop personal initiative. The free hour is now provided for in all the city schools of Buffalo.

Private schools have no right to exist unless they are research laboratories in education, and all this experimental work in education must produce results, for experimental work is useless unless it gets somewhere. We have observed carefully our children who have gone from us to formal schools. We find that in every case they are doing better than the average, with the exception of one. Hence, along with the special advantages of this newer kind of training has come the ability to eat up the work of the formal school. The possibilities in this new education are limitless and most fascinating.

SPIRITUAL VALUES IN INDUSTRY.

[We are indebted to our friend John Way for the following. It is the Babson Report of Tenth Month 25th.—Eds.]

The old method of teaching economics was that everything comes from "land and labor." Many courses are now being taught in our colleges to-day along those lines. Statistics, however, clearly show that this is a fallacy. For instance, China has greater natural resources and more available labor than this country and yet it is away behind this country. Natural resources, available labor, and capital are important, but those things are of little value until they are released by people filled with the spirit of God. That is what the study of economic history clearly teaches.

It is very important for clients to see that their sons and daughters realize that the old system of economics is false because it omits the most important factor of all—namely, the spiritual values. As Towson says, "Materials, labor, plants, markets, all these things can be adjusted, but the soul of man, which determines his purposes and his motives, can only be converted through religion."

Printing was discovered in China several thousand years ago, but it began to be developed only three or four centuries ago in Europe for the spreading of the teachings of the Bible. It was the desire to propagate the teachings of Jesus which developed printing. Religion has been the spiritual force which has developed not only our nation politically, but commercially and industrially as well. Economic history teaches one thing very plainly: the industrial problem will never be solved by employers' associations, or labor associations, or consumers' associations, but only as all get together as brothers filled with the spirit of God. If I learned one thing during the two years when serving Secretary of Labor Wilson, in Washington, it was that these problems can never be settled by force or by legislation.

Our troubles to-day are very largely due to the fact that we have been trying to run industry by the will of Congress instead of the will of God. The trouble with bankers to-day is that they are looking too much to Dun's ratings and Bradstreet's ratings and too little to God's ratings of men. Some one asked me recently the difference between ethics and religion. I replied, "Ethics is the track of the railroad system; religion is the motive power. Ethics is the wheels of the watch; religion is the spring of the watch."

When industry started in this country we built a foundation for a two-story building. We have been adding additional stories to this building until we have an eight or ten-story building with the same spiritual foundation. The great task before industry to-day is to quit adding more stories to the structure and to strengthen the spiritual foundation underlying that structure, without which there can be no structure at all. This is not mere theory; it is very evident in all lines of work. Take any industry, for instance. What is the most important asset—the physical property or the management? Any banker will tell you that it is the management. What is the most important asset to a corporation from a business point of view—a great mass of buildings, or a God-fearing board of directors? The answer is obvious.

I am speaking as a statistician, not as a preacher. Our political freedom, our personal safety, our educational system, our work to relieve suffering, our industry and commerce—everything that is worth while to civilization—we owe to those spiritual qualities which teach man to serve.

The Indian did not care to construct a log canoe because he knew it would be stolen from him. He did not catch more game than he and his family could consume in a day because it would be carried away by others. But as soon as integrity was taught by the missionaries, the Indians began to construct their canoes which might perhaps be suggested as the beginning of our merchant marine. The Indians then began to preserve their game and that was the forerunner of the packing-house industry. Business enterprise is possible only when moral integrity obtains. Business enterprise and civilization itself are the products of spiritual teachings.

The difference between barbarism and civilization is a difference in the spiritual element. Even when civilization gets to a certain point, as we have it now, it can remain steadfast only as we pour religion into it. Civilization makes no progress until spirituality makes a jump and then civilization moves to catch up. That is what the labor situation is waiting to do. When there is an increase of spirituality among all groups, then there will be another great development in the labor movement, but not until then. No reforms can be forced through and be permanent. We can develop only as we co-operate with the spirit of God. Oh, if men would think more of religion and less of commodities, bank clearings, foreign trade and immigration! When they do we shall again have prosperity. Moreover, the present depression must last until this change comes about!

ROGER W. BABSON.

THE NEEDED SAVIOUR.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

Some of us know very little about theology or creeds. The larger mysteries of the creation are too deep for us. We but dimly understand the beauty of the winning story of the Bible. Of one simple fact we are assured—we need a Saviour. In the last analysis how little we have to depend upon within ourselves or in the world. We cast aside pride in our works, we acknowledge our sins, we bow at the foot of the cross and upon the humiliating tree find an invincible Deliverer. Antecedent to the pangs of Calvary were the pangs of the Nativity. It was of transcendent importance that the one should precede the other. It was desirable that He who was to be the Great Rescuer of all who would accept Him should take upon Himself the form of a man. So it came about that the Saviour appeared, not with a mighty host, not with fanfare and palms of victory, but in swaddling clothes in a manger. O the graciousness of God, in sending His Son as of the poorest of mankind, seeing that it was the poorest of mankind He was sent to help! Could a better plan have been devised? Can we measure the boundlessness of the Eternal Love that has provided such a simple method for our redemption? Shall we listen to the cry of the Child of Bethlehem as He calls to repentance and the offices of love? Does not a suffering world need to rediscover Him to-day? Should not the radiancy shed nineteen hundred years ago upon the dark Judean hills become the glorious light of the present era? Then shall the sweet strain of the angels become our triumphant song: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will toward men!"

SAN JOSÉ, California.

For them (modern reformers), as for Christian theologians, Hope was one of the Cardinal Virtues. Less has been achieved than they expected, but nothing has happened to destroy the belief that among the citizens of free countries the sense of duty and the love of peace will grow steadily stronger. The experiment has not failed, for the world is after all a better place than it was under other kinds of government, and the faith that it may be made better still survives. Without Faith nothing is accomplished, and Hope is the mainspring of Faith.—LORD BRYCE.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE STORY OF BARRY.—The following story of Barry is taken in part from "Dogs of All Nations," by Conrad J. Miller, who says nothing, however, about the way Barry finally lost his life, and makes no mention of the monument in his memory set up in the Dog Cemetery in Paris:

C. J. Miller says:—"On the highest point of the Mountain Pass that leaves Martigny in the Valley of the Rhone across the Great Bernard into Italy, there stands in a dreary solitude, shut in by wild rugged mountains covered with eternal snow, the most elevated dwelling-place in the Old World—the Hospice of St. Bernard. Ten or twelve monks reside here in the midst of the most complete wilderness, where winter reigns eight or nine months. . . . The Hospice offers to everyone a refuge, with kindly help and care. The monks are especially busy in winter time, when they go forth to seek and rescue the lost wanderer. Every year many lives are saved through their endeavors. Specially trained dogs accompany the monks, or are sent out alone to search for those in danger."

The rest of the story of the brave dog is substantially this: It seems that two travelers were lost in the Alps in a blinding snow-storm. One of them in his extremity insisted that, as a last resort, he should have recourse to the brandy flask. His comrade urged upon him the folly of this, inasmuch as after a brief period of exhilaration, the reaction would leave him in a worse condition than before. Refusing the advice of his friend, he drank heavily, and after forging ahead for a short distance, became utterly exhausted and sank in the snow. His companion struggled on and at last was able to reach the friendly shelter of the Hospice. Here he told the story of his lost fellow-traveler.

Barry was called by the monks and told to take the traveler's trail, which he did, finding at length the man who had been left behind, unconscious in the snow. Barry finally, by various methods, roused him from his stupor only to be mistaken by the more or less dazed man for a wild beast. With what remaining strength he had, the traveler managed to get his knife out of his pocket and plunge it into Barry's neck. In spite of this, the faithful dog kept at his task until the traveler realized that he had evidently been found by one of the dogs of the Hospice. He struggled to his feet, and half leaning on the dog, whose strength was rapidly failing from loss of blood, finally reached the Hospice. On its threshold this noble creature, who had stained every step of the way back with his own life-blood, fell exhausted, having given to all humanity a lesson in fidelity to a trust as great as could well be taught.

On the monument in the cemetery in Paris, is the following inscription: "He saved the lives of forty persons, and was killed by the forty-first."

BETTER THAN SIR WALTER RALEIGH.—He was only a little lad, born in a slum, barefooted, his clothes dirty and ragged. In the poorest quarter of the port of Liverpool there is a society which attends to the slum kiddies. Little ones without boots, with clothes past repair and oft-times verminous, come here for help. They are given a meal, a hot bath, their old, dilapidated garments destroyed and a new set of warm, clean clothes provided.

One winter evening a number of children were in the corridor, waiting their turn for the bath. As one entered the bath-room, the others would move forward toward the door. One little girl hesitated to move forward; and the ragged boy soon discovered the reason. The unheated corridor has a cold cement floor and the kiddies were mostly barefooted. When they had stood for a little while on one spot the place became warm. So the girl hesitated to move from her own warmed spot and thus risk losing her place in the line.

The boy threw his little ragged cap on the floor and turning to the girl said: "There, stand on that, you'll find it warmer."

He was finer than Sir Walter Raleigh—for Raleigh could buy another coat.—Presbyterian Advance.

BOOK REVIEWS.

A GERMAN QUAKER'S BOOK.

An interesting outcome of the work of the Society of Friends in Germany since the war is the publication of a little book "Die Stellung Des Quakertums Zur Sozialen Frage" (The Attitude of Quakerism to the Social Problem), just issued by Christopher Kaiser, Munich (Friends' Bookshop, London). The author, Dr. Walter Koch, has joined the Society of Friends and was one of the small party of Germans permitted by the Government to be present at the Young Friends' Conference at Jordans in Eighth Month, 1920.

In the book he says:—

"The doctrine of the Inner Light led Quakers from the first to conceive of life as a whole and gave them a sense of world responsibility. . . . Fox's first awakening was not over his own sins but over the moral condition of the world around him. Mysticism has often led to individual isolation, but in the Society of Friends the meeting for worship created an intense community consciousness which showed itself in practical work. In this combination of freedom and fellowship, of individualism and social responsibility is to be found one of the deepest roots of the movement which makes it so valuable to-day.

"It was of first importance that Quakerism not only formed a link in the age-long chain of mystical movement, but, as R. M. Jones shows, was connected by an underground channel with the Anabaptists, the forerunners of modern socialism. At its inception it was closely related to the various people's movements of the time. "Levellers" and "Diggers," disappointed with the failures to set up the Kingdom of God by violence, were attracted by the Quaker doctrine of the Inner Light, and sought to revolutionize the world from within. In those early days the Society was in more living touch with the masses than ever since. Braitwaite shows that in 1680 sixty per cent. of the members were manual workers, whereas a century later they formed only twenty per cent."

Koch discusses the various causes which led to the raising of the social status of Friends and their becoming alienated from the proletariat, and he quotes Augusta Jorns,* who says: "While the economic level of the Society rose, its inner life suffered loss." Attempts were made to improve matters by a rigid discipline which was quite un-Quakerly in spirit. Friends of this time were quite unable to appreciate the revolutionary outlook of the early Quakers. But we, living in the swift changes of modern life, are better able to understand the meaning of primitive Quakerism.

Many individual practices of early Friends show communistic tendencies. The refusal to remove the hat and the use of "Thou" in speech (for which many suffered imprisonment) with their implied protest against class distinctions, only take on a revolutionary character when it is borne in mind that the individuals belonged to the lower classes. Thus they approached the social question from beneath as a people's movement. Their insight enabled them to realize much which democracy is only now beginning to recognize, such as the equality of women.

Passing on to modern times, Dr. Koch asks:—

"What is the attitude of Friends in the great modern conflicts between capitalism and socialism? Everywhere there is a great desire to face up to this problem and be worthy of the great past. Friends take active part in all efforts to remove the evils of capitalism. In literature, at conferences, in committees, the question is discussed. The relief work of Friends rests to a large extent upon the philanthropic tradition, but the more thoroughly it is taken up the clearer becomes the duty to get to the root of the evil. This was felt in the past by John Bellers, who besides anticipating many modern socialistic ideas, formed a link between the prophets of the first generation of Quakers and the philanthropists of the eighteenth-nineteenth centuries, and he was very much concerned with land colonization, prison reform and the anti-slavery movement. But all such plans must work with the materials of capitalism and depend upon capitalist philanthropy. "New Town," the scheme for a modern garden city which is being taken up eagerly by many Quakers, is a development of the old Utopian socialism of Bellers and Allen. Knowing the harmful results of exclusiveness, Friends are active in all kinds of social and spiritual efforts outside the Society, such as co-operative movements, temperance, workers' education, and particularly Adult Schools. But as the social question is not merely a question of education, many Friends are active in various political bodies—radical, Liberal and I. L. P.

"For some time past there has been a growing interest in social questions in the Society. A valuable document in this connection is L. F. Morland's 'The New Social Outlook.' In 1916 the War and Social Order Committee was established. The Society could no longer remain satisfied with a bourgeois pacifist position, but sought for the human and economic causes of war."

FOUR-SCORE AND TWO.

[One of our octogenarian subscribers, very active and useful in public work, recently had her milestone made golden by the united acknowledgment of several hundred of her fellow townsmen. The following poem was contributed by one who is a minister amongst the Methodists. In re-printing the poem we are happy to recognize, as our readers will, that the sentiment is applicable to not a few octogenarians in Friendly circles.—Eds.]

Four-score and two! Thy years are great,

For thou hast lived as in thy Master's sight,

And now, enriched in soul, He says to thee:

"Trust on—at eventime it shall be light."

Four-score and two! And work not done,

For thou art still a helper of the right.

And as the day so shall He strengthen thee.

Work on—at eventime it shall be light.

Four-score and two! With joyous living still,

For love abounds to thee both day and night.

And when the Master calls thee He will say:

"Fear not—at eventime it shall be light."

HAPPINESS INSTEAD OF DESPAIR.

On a glorious autumn day of sun and wind my impudent little motor side-car whirled me up the slope of the Kahlenberg just outside Vienna, through the park into the gate of the Schloss Bellevue. This two-century-old mansion shone in the sun. Stately trees threw their shade over a broad terrace from which one had a wide view of hillside fields and faraway Vienna shining in the sun.

From under the trees scattered over the lawn there came a hum of life. Peering through the little gate I came upon a Peter Pan scene. Little buccaners and buccaneers from three to twelve years old with bare chests and legs and strange, nondescript trousers were trotting about in shade and sunshine, or lying stretched out on long-backed chairs.

There was a rush, a pattering of little feet and shrill cries of joy, and in a moment I was surrounded by children. They crowded up to display their wounds and scars. They would hobble or crawl and some would come faster than the others because they could use crutches. And over on the chairs there were those who could not move. One bold pirate had two legs in a cast. A little girl slips head downward over a plaster-of-Paris cradle, a sort of inverted Brunhilda on her rock. This fourteen-year-old girl has walked on crutches for several years because of a bad hip. That imp frolicking in the sun has a wound in his chest.

The Sister who was in charge, once a war nurse and an aristocrat, now turned to be a ten-hour-a-day worker, speaks with a glow of her warriors. All are victims of bone tuberculosis. They have been at the Schloss three weeks or less and the fresh air has whetted their appetites. They are eating and sleeping like savages and have put on an average of two pounds apiece.

Five-year-old Marie, who could not stand when she came, because her legs were so swollen with rickets, now walks slowly and carefully across the terrace to us. We induce Mizzi to take a few steps without her crutches, an impossible thing to do three weeks ago when she arrived. On firm, brown chests and backs we touch scars, the last remains of open tubercular sores of long standing. We stop to talk to little Rosa sitting bravely in her deck-chair, playing with a tired-looking woolly dog. She was wasted with fever when she arrived, too tired to do more than lie inert under the trees. Last week her father stood by her chair with tears in his eyes, for he had lost hope of ever again seeing his little daughter free from fever. Now she was looking strong and had begun to play.

The visiting-days are happy occasions for parents and children, for this convalescent home is making wonderful cures of the pitiful mites who had no chance of recovery in their sunless, overcrowded homes, where milk and meat and butter are unknown and cabbage or flour soup, black bread and noodles are the staple diet. But because the Quakers have brought rice and milk and cocoa and beans and flour and clothes, they will have new life and will be happy, glad children.

But what is this procession of tin bath-tubs and wash-tubs coming down the steps of the Schloss? What are they doing sitting impudently in the middle of the dignified court, the water flashing in the sun? "What a pity Fraulein must go so soon! In half an hour this hot sun will have warmed the water and the children will all have a splash before their afternoon naps. They are so amusing, shouting and paddling and laughing, like so many little brown eels."

"Come again next month and see how many pounds they have put on—see the contrast with the new children who will come out from the city. We are so grateful for the blankets and sheets and food and dishes that you good Quakers sent to us. We could not have opened the home without them. Good-bye!"

And the jolly chorus of children's voices rose again from the terrace, while unblinking eyes watched the machine whirl off around the bend of the road.

DOROTHY NORTH.

VIENNA IS DESPERATE IN THE WAKE OF THE NEW FINANCIAL CRASH.

This is a frank appeal for funds. Asking for money is always a disagreeable task, but this is not the time for easy feelings. It would be easier to write an account of the details of human misery in the hope that a reader would be sufficiently stirred to have no peace of mind until a subscription was sent.

Unfortunately, the story of Austria's misery contains nothing that is very new, and its constant repetition has taken away the sense of the dramatic. It fails to stimulate instinctive, generous impulses, for the stimulus has been so often applied, and continually applying has hardened our spiritual skins.

The overwhelming tragedy of Russia is staggering the mind of the world, and with that, and the uncertainty of the economic conditions at home, a demand for help to the five-year-old misery of Vienna seems almost unreasonable.

It is with a full consciousness of all these difficulties that this appeal is made, and we feel it is justified because even in the full light of the claim of all the other misery in the world, the claim of Austria's situation still stands out vividly as too great to be ignored. The Quaker Mission has been at work for two years in Austria and has had the joy of seeing conditions improve greatly in the life of the people. Most of the relief has been given to very young children, and though some of the children crippled by the war famine will never be cured, all have received care, and the younger children have been given some chance to withstand rickets and tuberculosis and to grow into healthy, normal men and women.

During the early summer a new atmosphere of hope began to grow in Vienna and men began to believe that the endurance of the last years would prove to have been of such strength that happier and better days were near. Then within a space of time measured by hours there came the sudden crash of the crown, a sudden leap in prices, panic and desperation. These are strong words, but they represent hard, actual facts. To-day the crown has dropped in value until a dollar will buy 2,600—so putting the financial situation of Austria almost on a par with that of Poland and Russia. Unless something immediate is done to deal with this crisis, Austria will be in a worse plight than she was on that day the armistice was signed. If help is not brought it would seem almost better not to have helped them at all than to have brought them through such misery to such an end.

It is strange what little incidents bring the situation home. The gratitude of a professor's wife for the present of a toothbrush seems tragic. She had been unable to afford one for a long time, and had used chalk rubbed on paper. Everyone in a civilized country has a right to be able to buy a toothbrush. But still more has every mother the right to be able to buy sufficient food for her baby. It is terrible to see the immediate effect of the scarcity of food upon the mothers. They are always the first to go short, and the babies of the future are sacrificed to the babies of the present.

Is there a crisis in Vienna to-day? Flour is $60 a pound, sugar $65 a pound, lard $230 a pound, beef $79 a pound. It is either help or ruin.

The Friends' Relief Mission has carried on for two years in the face of a child population starved and dwarfed and stunted, and in the face of homes where fathers and mothers were unable to supply warmth or food. We have faith that you will respond to this appeal and give aid in carrying a helpless and broken nation through to life. And somehow it is not possible to believe that those whose lives and whole future have been saved, will ever be able to forget those who saved them.

PRACTICAL DISARMAMENT SUGGESTIONS.

Time is passing quickly.

Here are a few suggestions as to what Friends can do locally:

1. Help organize a representative local disarmament committee in conjunction with the other branch of Friends and interested citizens.
2. Mass Meeting; arrange for a local mass meeting where a pageant may add to the interest.
3. Public and private schools—Put a set of disarmament posters in the schools. Arrange for disarmament essay prizes. Have a good speaker lecture to the children. An excellent set of lantern slides is available.
4. Libraries—Have a set of posters put up in the library. Put a copy of Will Irwin's "The Next War" in the library.
5. Churches—Get the ministers to agree to read disarmament bulletins which are to be issued every two weeks, if possible, through Dr. Wm. I. Hull, an expert on this subject, who is expecting to be in Washington during the conference.

6. Stores—Get one of the local stores to put up a set of posters in the window.

7. Distribute literature on disarmament, and send the disarmament bulletins to educators, editors, clubs and societies.

8. Send either a letter or telegram to Secretary Hughes expressing your convictions as to the work of the conference.

Assistance in the way of posters, lantern slides, literature, speakers and bulletins may be obtained from Room 24, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

DR. BOARDMAN'S PREDICTION.

Many Friends gratefully remember Dr. George Dana Boardman. He was for many years one of the best beloved clergymen in the city. He was often seen and heard in Friendly circles. In 1890 he delivered an address in Washington from which the following is an extract:—

Solemnly believing that the policy of my Divine Master is a policy of peace, I as solemnly believe that my Divine Master is summoning earth's nations to a policy of disarmament. How they shall effect this disarmament, whether suddenly or gradually, whether separately or simultaneously, I do not presume to assert. But I do presume to assert unhesitatingly and unqualifiedly that the time has come when the nations should commit themselves openly to the policy of disarmament.

Meanwhile, if I had the ear of my beloved country, I would venture to offer so much as this: Let our American Nation propose to our brother nations to disarm, substituting arbitration or some other pacific policy for armament. All of us, whether Republicans or Democrats, whether natives or immigrants, will agree that if there is on earth a nation that can afford to disarm and be known as the great peace people it is the American Nation; for our fortunes do not vibrate in the oscillating balance of European Powers. We are strong enough and ought to be brave enough to say to our brother nations of mankind:

"We believe that war is foolish, antiquated, wicked policy. Let us disarm, referring our disputes not to the bloody decisions of capricious war, but to the peaceful arbitration of common sense. Let us enter into a covenant of everlasting amity, organizing a peace league that shall not only be Pan-American, but also Pan-Human. We Americans take the initiative in inviting all the nations of the earth to meet with us in the greatest of Congresses—the Parliament of Man, the Federation of the world."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING was held on the 14th and 15th. The Meeting of Ministers and Elders on the afternoon of the 14th was one of special favor. The business to come before it could not all be transacted in the three hours it held, and some was deferred to the session three months hence. Westtown Monthly Meeting had forwarded a minute of recognition of Carroll T. Brown as a Minister of the Gospel, which was endorsed by the superior meeting. Mary Anna Wood, of Ithaca, N. Y., on her way to North Carolina Yearly Meeting, was present.

At the general Meeting on Third-day, which was well attended, the following from other Yearly Meetings were acceptably present:—William Littleboy and Emma Maria Bishop, from London Yearly Meeting, Ellwood Conrad, from Salem, Ohio, Gurney Binford and wife with credentials from the Meeting of Friends in Japan, Mary Anna Wood as previously noted, as well as several from other meetings within our own Yearly Meeting.

The Meeting for Worship held about one-and-a-half hours, the strangers in attendance had helpful service which was gratefully acknowledged.

The practice now holds of adjourning after the first session for lunch and then resuming for the business session at 1.30.

Alfred C. Garrett on behalf of the Yearly Meeting's interest in Organic Church Union, made an earnest appeal for a closer and more Christ-like attitude of mind toward the essentials of Christianity and pointed out how the Church of Christ under various names had an expectant outlook toward the Society of Friends in other particulars besides that of peace.

The two queries on the Social Order had received the care of subordinate meetings and the answers in some cases were so full and comprehensive as to make this feature of the Meeting one of especial interest. The summaries of the Clerks were well drawn up and will give to our Yearly Meeting a fair picture of our standing, but will of course lack the individuality that appeared when presented by the subordinate meetings. Various items of important business claimed the Meeting's attention, one of the last being the issuance of the following message of appreciation to Secretary Hughes:

COPY OF NIGHT LETTER.

TO CHARLES E. HUGHES,

Secretary of State,

Washington, D. C.:—

Concord Quarterly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, in session at Media, Pa., has heard with satisfaction and encouragement of thy courageous, constructive plan for a drastic reduction in naval armaments.

We would urge that no arguments from opposing interests be allowed to swerve our American delegates from their high duty.

Please be assured of our prayers, warm sympathy and earnest support in the great work to which your hands have been set. We trust that this step marks the dawn of a new era of peace and world brotherhood.

(Signed) JOHN D. CARTER, Clerk.

No message was sent to President Harding.

The Meeting throughout had been characterized by a deeply religious feeling and appropriately closed with supplication offered by the oldest Friend who had been in attendance.

This item is from The Friend (London):—

Carlotta H. Browne has been studying the work of the great American botanist John Bartram in the British Museum. Bartram sent some 10,000 species of American flora to England, where they are most carefully preserved. His fine old homestead and twenty-seven acres on the banks of the Schuylkill, comprising "Bartram's Garden," is now one of Philadelphia's public parks. Of friendly interest also beside William Penn's squares, and belonging to the city are: Wister's Wood in southeastern Germantown, Awbury Arboretum, given by the Cope family, and Fisher Park, the gift of the heirs of Joseph Wharton, which includes the home of Fanny Kemble and was one of the points from which it is said that Franklin flew his kite.

The following paragraph is from a report of London and Middlesex Quarterly Meeting:—

The Extension Committee reported that Cornelius Barritt has resigned the position of Secretary to take up service elsewhere. A discussion ensued, in the course of which some Friends urged that "we should do our own work and not push it on to someone else." One Friend even suggested that the more capable the Secretary was, the more parasitic the Committee became. The great importance of extension work in the London area was emphasized, and it was pointed out that unless someone can give plenty of time to it the work would not get done. In the end the Quarterly Meeting took no steps towards appointing a successor to Cornelius Barritt, leaving the Committee to carry on as best they can without such help.

"SCHWEIGENDER DIENST," under which title Violet Hodgkin's Swarthmore Lecture, "Silent Worship," has been published in German with a preface by Dr. Otto, has been reviewed in the Frankfurter Zeitung by M. Deutschbein, Professor of English at Marburg University.

He says: "In view of the keen interest in Quakerism in Germany at the present time, this little pamphlet by Violet Hodgkin deserves our attention. It treats of a peculiarity of the Divine worship of the Quakers, viz.: the so-called silent worship, the only sacrament of the Quakers, if one can use such an expression. Silent Worship, Silent Service, or Spiritual devotion in the silence, or through silence, has for the Quakers the significance of an immediate realization of the Divine. The 'Silent Service,' which, however, implies the highest activity, has, according to Dr. Otto, a three-fold aim: the inner union of the many in the oneness and fellowship of the Spirit which arises out of the depth, the waiting for the breaking forth of the Spirit in free discussion or prayer, and finally the quiet resting in the presence of the Highest and its strengthening and illuminating fellowship even without words.

"Violet Hodgkin refers to a number of parallels and prototypes of this kind of worship. They are to be found in not only non-Christian religions, but also in early Christian times, and in the Middle Ages. The small sects and communities of early modern times have particularly close points of contact. Among the Quakers themselves, the history of 'Silent Service' is of course very thoroughly treated. An interesting book from the psychological and historical-religious point of view, very tastefully got up (with a picture of the listening Angel in the Cathedral of Southwell); and in its excellent German translation, should edify and elevate many readers in the quiet hour." (The German translation is obtainable through the Friends' Bookshop, 140 Bishopsgate, London, E. C. 2.)

H. W. PEET.

[JUST as we are going to press (a day early because of the holiday on the 24th), we have the following from our friend Charles J. Rhoads. We trust Friends will respond to it.—Eds.]

Prior to the Washington Conference we were all urged to write to the President, Secretary Hughes and members of Congress, and many Friends did write.

Now that Secretary Hughes has submitted his proposals, I am told that he and the President would appreciate letters approving of their action. Usually public officials receive letters of advice or criticism, too rarely letters of approval, and it encourages them to go on if we can approve their actions. If thee thinks well of this suggestion I hope thee will put a paragraph in THE FRIEND asking Friends generally to write to the President and Secretary Hughes.

Very sincerely,

CHARLES J. RHOADS.

CARE IN INSURANCE

The Provident was founded in 1865 by a group of Friends for the purpose of protecting the estates and insuring the lives of members of the Society of Friends.

Later the services of this Company were offered to other people who were known to be of careful habits. A careful company insures only those people who are good moral as well as health risks. This results in a low death-rate, which is one of the elements of low cost of insurance.

Care is important—in insurance as well as in other things

THE NEGRO AND TUBERCULOSIS

Because of the relation of tuberculosis to squalid, ill-ventilated houses and the peculiar susceptibility of the colored race to this disease, the Whittier Centre Housing Company has enlisted the able assistance of Dr. Charles J. Hatfield, and Dr. H. R. M. Landis of the Henry Phipps Institute. Dr. Landis, in an address in Washington, D. C., put the facts of the case squarely before the Convention on Tuberculosis when he said:—

"In dealing with the tuberculosis problem among the Negroes greater difficulties are encountered than among those of the white race. It matters not, however, whether we are actuated by sentiment to aid a race struggling under difficulties or whether we view the problem as a public health measure. The essential things to bear in mind are:—that in many of our Northern cities the colored population is large; that tuberculosis is wide-spread among this race and that the white population cannot ignore the menace this wide-spread infection carries."

You can help in this work by investing your money in the Common Stock of the Whittier Centre Housing Company which is established to alleviate this condition. This company offers 500 shares of its stock at $50 per share. The sale of 200 shares is imperative before cold weather, for the renovation of properties on Moss Street, north of Parrish Street. Checks may be sent to Mr. Samuel H. Carpenter, Treasurer, 517 Chestnut Street.

LIGHT.

The lighted dome of the Capitol is one of the most beautiful sights in Washington at present.

Above the city's homes; the crowded street,
Rising, in silent majesty and might,
We see the dome our Capitol complete,
All bathed in dazzling light.

And far above that great dome's upper rim
The myriad stars shine on in splendor bright,
All earthly lamps before their gleam are dim,
For theirs is heavenly light.

"Light of the World!" to Thee we lift our eyes!
As that great dome above the city stands
So may Thy will, Thy purpose, ever rise
Above the work of our poor, faltering hands.

And as earth's rulers, in their council grave,
Strive for the plans which make for peace and right,
So may that Light which came the world to save
Shine for them,—clear and bright.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

A HEART OF MERCY.

An esteemed correspondent sends us a letter of interrogation from a somewhat frontier environment of a western State. He wonders whether we appreciate the effect upon those who cannot possibly respond, of the seemingly unending appeals of the Service Committee. Evidently he has in mind the fact that we are sure to become callous, if we allow our feelings to be stirred without finding some definite response in "motor activity." We hear and fail to give, and finally we hear and fail to feel. Professor Wm. James returns to this subject again and again in presenting a practical working psychology for parents and teachers.

Our sympathies certainly go out to our correspondent. We can assure him that those in his dilemma are by no means confined to the west. The wide-spread collapse of business has left many bank accounts depleted and brought much suffering to our very doors. We are appalled at the picture of "dying Russia;" it actually paralyzes us just because we are so abjectly helpless. Shall we therefore draw the curtain—refuse to hear further details, exert ourselves to the utmost to forget what we have been told?

Perhaps we need to remind ourselves how little "motor discharge," to use the scientific term, is involved in drawing a check. If the act has motor value, it is in proportion as some self-denial or extra labor has been put into the bank account. In this view the five-dollar check may possibly have a value in excess of one for five thousand. The whole question, as so aptly put in Lowell's "Sir Launfal," is involved in whether we actually give "ourselves."

In this analysis no appeal, no cry of suffering need be void in our lives. "The heart of mercy" never has to seek far for an object of mercy. Those who know the extremes of poverty are often amazed at how much of themselves the "abjectly poor" can give to their companions and neighbors. We may greatly rejoice that we live in a time when twelve thousand miles do not separate us wholly from our brothers' needs. There is hope for universal brotherhood in that fact. There is also a service for us in transmitting that fact wherever we go. Our own "heart of mercy" if it is made to dominate our every word and deed, will continue to grow, however empty our purse may be.

"THE GOSPEL OF UNDERSTANDING."

One of the numerous correspondents who are keeping the expectant public informed of the progress of the Conference in Washington reports that the President has nothing so much at heart as the desire to proclaim "the gospel of understanding." The President regards the Conference as an instrument to this end. Another correspondent emphasizes the fact that ignorance is the great cause of misunderstanding between nations. If we could know enough of distant people, if we could have an "understanding sympathy" of their problems and their aims it is not probable that we should wish to resist them. Very likely indeed we should see how we ourselves could be strengthened and advanced by co-operation with them. Even self-interest would then induce us to take the peaceful course, and the circle of active allies would expand to include all nations and all climes.

"The gospel of understanding" is then, very plainly, something more substantial than mere sentiment. Founded upon knowledge, it leads the nations forward to higher attainment and to fuller life. It promises success because it is the actual method of success.

J. H. B.

The fact remains that war is an ultimate and illimitable thing; a war that can be controlled is a war that could have been stopped or prevented. If our race can really bar the use of poison gas it can bar the use of any kind of weapon. It is indeed easier to enforce peace altogether than any lesser limitation of war.—H. G. WELLS.

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

II.

The first week of the Conference was made memorable by the speech of Secretary Hughes in the first open session. All the world has acclaimed it as an exceptionally noteworthy one. It was noteworthy for a number of reasons. Firmly and clearly it struck the note of open diplomacy and this has become, thus far, the key-note of the Conference. The British, Japanese and American delegations are according the representatives of the press daily interviews, in the intervals between the open sessions, and are talking to them with remarkable frankness. In the half-dozen of these interviews which I have attended, an echo of our Secretary's frankness has been noted again and again.

The Secretary's speech was noteworthy, and reassuring as well, because it did not side-track or subordinate the question of armaments, as was done at the two Hague Conferences and at Paris in 1919, but brought it out as the frontpiece of the American programme and projected it into the forefront of popular thought and interest, not only because of the economic importance of armaments, but because of their incitement to war.

Again, it contained a definite, concrete proposal, and did not deal in glittering generalities or advocate reduction and limitation of armaments merely "in principle." It struck especially at "capital" ships, the dreadnoughts and super-dreadnoughts of our time, which have filled our world with suspicion and terror, and which are still the chief reliance in naval warfare, despite the development of aeroplanes and submarines. The "capital" ships, too, as emblems of national sovereignty, have come to be regarded as almost sacrosanct, and have sailed around the world like huge leviathans, breathing national pride and defiance and breeding fear and suspicion in their wake.

The Secretary's proposal of a "naval holiday" of ten years is also noteworthy, for it is greatly to be hoped that during that period the nations may divest themselves of much of their post-war militarism, sober up or cool off, and get down to the development and habitual use of pacific means of settling disputes. His proposal, also, of a drastic reduction, as well as limitation of naval armaments has been most gratifying, and has found a characteristic response from the largest American manufacturer of automobiles in an offer to buy the sixty-six discarded warships and their guns and beat them literally into plowshares or farm-tractors. His proposal, too, that future warships shall have no more than 35,000 tons displacement is another feature of reduction as well as limitation, and may aid at least to scotch, if not to kill, that particular form of naval competition.

During the days that have elapsed since the Secretary's memorable proposal at the first open session, the world seems to be learning rapidly and surely its fundamental lesson that armaments are not an "insurance against war," as the preparers so vociferously declared in the years before the World War, but that, on the contrary, they are an irresistible incitement to war. During these days, in Washington, the delegations have accepted the American proposition "in principle," and at the second open session of the Conference, Arthur J. Balfour, speaking for the British Empire, definitely accepted Great Britain's naval equality in capital ships with the United States. His statement was an impressive one: "With the broad spirit in which the American scheme deals with the three great fleets of the world, with the proportion of disarmament which it lays down for those fleets, and with the policy which the United States has brought before us for consideration, the Government of the country which I represent is in the fullest and heartiest sympathy."

The naval experts have always hitherto insisted that no ratio of naval strength among the leading nations could possibly be agreed upon. This has proved to be a mistake, as far as Great Britain and the United States are concerned, and the former government has thus publicly renounced in most dramatic fashion the long-cherished ambition that Britannia's warships should rule the seas. The British Government has taken one step beyond the American proposal in advocating the reduction of the tonnage of submarines considerably below 90,000, and also the reduction of the maximum displacement of submarines from 1,000 tons, as at present, to 200 tons, so that these "demons of the seas" may not be used for offensive naval war. The first lord of the British admiralty, Lord Lee of Fareham, made an earnest argument for this reduction, in a private interview we had with him; and Senator Borah has made a public appeal for the same reduction. Secretary Hughes, speaking to a group of correspondents this week, went over much of the ground he covered at the first open session, and made a stirring appeal that the main object of the Conference—namely, the abolition of the means of making offensive naval war, should be kept steadily in mind, and not be obscured by details concerning tonnage, submarines, ship-yards, etc. "Now is the time," he said, "to achieve that object; we must stop competitive increase of armaments some time, otherwise we will stop no time."

Admiral Kato of Japan, in the second open session, also accepted the American proposition "in principle," thus setting a bar to the vaulting ambitions of the naval jingoes of Japan; but in a private interview he advanced the argument that, because of Japan's geographical position, she should maintain a slightly larger proportion of capital ship tonnage than the 60 per cent. suggested by Secretary Hughes, and that for strictly defensive types of ships she should approximate the tonnage of the greater navies. In the same interview he said that Japan willingly accepted China's claims "as a basis of discussion." Lord Riddell, of the British delegation, went still further and expressed Great Britain's strong desire for the rehabilitation of China, the maintenance of "the open door," and the renunciation of extra territorial rights, "as soon as possible," and he pointed out that in 1902 the British Government promised in a treaty to recognize China's full judicial independence as soon as China's government gave assurance of adequate protection to British traders and their property.

The claims of China have been set forth in a series of Ten Points which constitute a demand that all foreign sovereignty shall be withdrawn from China, leaving her territorial integrity and political independence intact. The "Open Door" in all parts of China; abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, under whose shadow Chinese territory and sovereignty have been seriously impaired; the publication and revision of all special privileges claimed by foreign powers in China; the respect of China's neutrality in any future war; pacific settlement of Far Eastern questions; and the regular meeting of the Washington Conference as a guarantee of the future fulfillment of the agreements in regard to China: these are the claims made by the great ancient people and new republic of the Orient upon the sense of justice of the Occident. Acknowledgment of and compliance with them would cause a revolution in the status of the Far East and would, it is believed, make for the peace of the world as well as for the stability and prosperity of China.

The psychological study of the personalities of the Conference is an exceedingly interesting one. At times, a feeling of discouragement is uppermost when the shadow of the old-time diplomacy moves athwart the spirits of the all-too-frail human beings in whose hands lie the fate of the Conference and of the immediate future of humanity; but at other times a joyous note of encouragement and hope is struck by some forward looking statesman, like Secretary Hughes or Sir Robert Borden, of Canada. The latter, for example, discoursed eloquently and convincingly to a group of correspondents on the beneficial results of disarmament on the Great Lakes, agreed upon by Great Britain and the United States in 1818 and maintained ever since; and he expressed most earnestly the desire that this example might be taken to heart and even followed by the Conference of 1921. President Harding, too, in an interview which just preceded that with the Canadian representative, declined to give the story of how the idea of the Conference originated, but expressed the fervent hope that it would succeed and remarked that if it did, "there would be glory enough for every one connected with it, including every man or woman everywhere who helped in any way to make it a success."

PROBLEMS OF THE ORIENT FROM THE MISSIONARY POINT OF VIEW.

LLOYD BALDERSTON.

When my wife and I went to Japan in 1917, on the steamship China, more than half of the cabin passengers were either missionaries or missionary children. There were perhaps thirteen newly married couples going out to various mission fields, Japan, China, India and the Philippines. At a meeting of the missionary group one of the older men gave some advice to the younger ones. One piece of advice was somewhat to this effect: "Do not yield to a feeling that you are superior to the people among whom you work."

That is very good advice. Missionary effort is likely to be successful very much in proportion to the degree of brotherly spirit in which it is put forth. No one who goes to Japan and studies the Japanese people seriously is likely to rate them as in any sense an inferior race. When Alfred the Great was king of England, the Japanese capital was at Nara. In 749 was cast in bronze the great sitting figure of Buddha, 58 feet high, which remains, along with many other pieces of even higher artistic merit, to attest the skill of Japanese metal workers at a time when Englishmen were little more than barbarians.

Japanese pictorial and literary art reached a high level in the tenth century, and in the eleventh, when William the Norman came to England, Japanese printers were making beautiful books from engraved wood blocks. In the geography books of fifty years ago, Japan was marked as a "half-civilized" country. Such an epithet only revealed the ignorance of the map-makers.

Japan's civilization was different from ours, but her ability, on her own initiative, to take a place among progressive nations, as judged by our standard, in fifty years from the start, was due to the soundness and catholicity of her own indigenous civilization. Barbarous or half-civilized peoples may be capable of receiving an alien civilization which is forced upon them from the outside, but hardly in one or two generations. What happened to France in the three centuries after Julius Caesar is a good illustration. Japan, entirely on her own motion, recognizing the advantages which she would reap from learning what the West could teach, set resolutely about adopting and adapting Western methods in science, education, administration, manufactures, transportation and the rest.

Japan has, too, a philosophy of life. In "The Faith of Japan," by a prominent Japanese Christian, is given a clear and, I think, just statement of this philosophy. It seems to us rather harsh and gloomy, but it has sufficed to give the Japanese people a code of standards of human intercourse under which a settled and measurably happy and well-ordered society developed, and to weld together a heterogeneous group into a wonderfully coherent and homogeneous nation. This homogeneous character has, of course, been promoted by her insular position and by the two centuries and more of exclusion of aliens. If, however, we compare the vitality of the Japanese national idea and the vigor of her group spirit with those of any other Oriental people, even the equally exclusive Chinese, it becomes quite clear that it is by no accident that she has taken the leadership of the East and functions as a highly self-conscious nation thoroughly organized and very efficient. In comparison with Japan, China is not a nation at all, but merely a politically non-coherent mass of humanity.

I have, as you observe, made no effort to expound the philosophy of Japan, but have only referred to what may fairly be called its effect on national character and achievement. In very many individuals, too, this philosophy has developed a very fine type, quite equal in moral force, I should say, to the ancient Greek type, to which it shows many striking resemblances.

We live in an age which is rather pragmatic in its point of view, and so we hear much of a sentiment which runs somewhat as follows: Japan is doing well enough under her own philosophic system. Why try to induce her to adopt another? Before trying to give an answer to this perfectly legitimate question, permit me to narrate briefly Japan's first chapter of experience with Christianity.

In 1542 a vessel blown out of its course landed three Portuguese sailors on the southern island. This was the beginning of a series of voyages for trade, and led to the entrance of the first missionaries in 1549. The leader of this band was the marvelous Francis Xavier, who spent somewhat more than two years in the country. Without inquiring too closely into the methods used by the Jesuits or the motives which led the Japanese to adopt the new faith, we may at least believe that the 700 converts whom Xavier left behind him represented some degree of appreciation of Christianity. By 1581, the number had grown to 150,000, including many nobles.

Some of the missionaries were insolent to the rulers, and openly boasted that by means of their hold on the Japanese Christians they would bring Japan under the suzerainty of the King of Spain. This was at a time when Spain was the most powerful nation in the world, and the Jesuits simply proposed to do to Japan what Spain had already done to the countries of Central and South America. When representatives of other orders than the Jesuits came there were violent quarrels. When Dutch and English ships arrived, the Romanists united in demanding of the authorities that these heretics be forbidden to land and otherwise punished for being enemies of the Church. All these and many other circumstances combined to make the rulers doubtful of the expediency of permitting Christianity to be disseminated, and on several occasions repressive measures were attempted. By various means, including connivance of local dignitaries, these measures were largely rendered abortive. Meanwhile, an emissary had been sent to Europe to learn at first hand what effect Christianity had on the people in lands where it held full sway. This man came back after some years with tales of tortures and burnings which must have filled the soul of the Japanese shogun with horror. Yet he hesitated to forbid entrance to foreigners, since the trade which these people brought was very important. Finally the insolence of the priests in refusing obedience to any decrees of the Government became unendurable, and it was resolved not only to exclude the dangerous religion, but all citizens of the countries professing it, and to permit no Europeans of any nation to travel anywhere in the country.

At the same time all churches were ordered to be destroyed, all foreigners to be deported and all Japanese Christians to abjure their faith. A considerable number of the missionaries refusing to obey were put to death, and the number of Japanese who refused to apostatize and were executed is variously stated to have been from one to two hundred thousand.

THE way to world peace lies not in fighting and destroying the armament interests, but in turning them to world service.—H. G. WELLS.

SCHOLARS who pride themselves on their learning, as something of which the mass of men are incapable, are traitors to scholarship, and prove that they are ignorant of its very subject matter. To be proud of scholarship is to think that you have made the eternal your own private possession, which means that you have never experienced it.—A. CLUTTON BROC.

CHRISTIAN FUNDAMENTALS.

To give adequate expression to what are the Christian Fundamentals, one naturally turns to the Scriptures. For it is here that we find the life-giving terms, the truth and reality of which have met the needs of past generations, and are meeting the needs of true seekers to-day. And they will never fail to satisfy all succeeding generations: "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day and forever."

We hear much to-day about twentieth century problems and methods. I like to realize that our God is indeed omniscient and omnipotent, and that there is nothing within our life to-day for which He has not made ample provision. I feel sure that the needs of my ancestors, and of my parents, and of myself, have been alike in the sight of Him whom we have all called "Our Father." Alike, in that His provision has been perfect. And I thank Him that He has been able through the Word "made flesh," and through His written Word, to give each one of us "eternal life." "For God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

Can we not vividly picture our grandparents pouring over the Bible to learn the "Way of life," so that they might become channels for the Lord to use in great or small measure? Among the many verses which illuminate the truths of Christian fundamentals, would they not have turned to the following ones to discover God's plan of salvation?

"No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him."

"I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is and which was and which is to come, the Almighty."

"Herein is love, not that we loved God but that He loved us and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins."

"Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world."

"... who being the effulgence of His glory and the very image of His substance, and upholding all things by the word of His power, when He had himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high."

"Wherefore also God highly exalted Him and gave unto Him the name which is above every name; that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow."

"If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

"If any man thirst let him come unto Me and drink."

"And ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free."

"I am the resurrection and the life, he that believeth on Me though he die yet shall he live."

"We were buried therefore with Him through baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised from the dead, through the glory of the Father, so we also might walk in Newness of Life."

"Even so reckon ye yourselves to be dead unto sin but alive unto God in Christ Jesus."

"As thou hast sent me into the world even so I have sent them into the world. I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one; that the world may know that thou hast sent me and hast loved them as thou hast loved me."

"I am persuaded that neither death nor life, nor any other creature can separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

This chain of fundamental truths forms an outline of the "Good News" which it is our privilege and obligation to live victoriously before men, and to preach powerfully to "every creature." Do we not rejoice that the Holy Spirit reveals these same unchangeable truths to-day to those who "hunger and thirst after righteousness?"

Therefore, whether our life is cast in the foreign field, in the business world, or in the home, He makes it possible for all of His disciples to say, "Now thanks be unto God who always leadeth us in triumph, in Christ, and maketh manifest through us the savor (fragrance) of His knowledge in every place."

"APOLOGY FOR THE TRUE CHRISTIAN DIVINITY," by Robert Barclay. The Quaker Classic on Doctrine.

It has been said that the Society of Friends has made just one great contribution to Christian thought in the field of theology or doctrine, and that is Robert Barclay's "Apology for the True Christian Divinity." We are convinced that this classic from the inspired age of our people ought to be more widely and far more thoroughly known, especially by our leaders. Evidence is not lacking to-day of its continued vitality for serious thinkers in religious things—a vitality due to a real inspiration on the part of its able and learned author, which is not always found in theological works. It has this advantage over later Quaker works—that it furnishes the original platform on which all Friends once stood together in the matter of doctrine; it gives the carefully considered body of thought from which all our later, unfortunately often divergent, doctrines have sprung; it stands before all separations. If our people are to become a united body—and what is more imperative if we are ever to be a real power in the Church and Kingdom of our Master?—we need to trace back the lines of our thinking till they converge; and so become grounded in a substantial and sympathetic understanding of the things we stand for, in the variety in unity which time has developed. It is with great satisfaction that we learn that certain of our leaders have been considering the possibility of producing a new and attractive modern edition of this classic. May they find encouragement and means to do this, and the result prove a unifying force among us.

"THE QUAKERS—THEIR STORY AND MESSAGE," by A. Neave Brayshaw. The Yorkshire Committee (1921). Quakerism from Beginning to End, 1647 to 1921.

The tasteful little book by Neave Brayshaw of Scarborough, England, fills a real need of to-day and proves of more importance than its simple title might imply. It treats of the whole development of the "Mother Church" of the Friends in England from a time before its actual organization down through its varying changes, even to the Great War and to the present period since the war. There is first a chapter on the preceding mystical sects and the religious and civil turmoil in which the incubation of Quakerism occurred; then an extended and absorbing section on the prophetism of the seventeenth century; one on the quietism of the eighteenth century; another on the evangelicalism, etc., of the nineteenth century; and finally a section on the War and Reconstruction periods, with the great service and changes they have brought. For the early period, when those brave young souls, the "First Publishers of Truth," were sweeping England with their prophetic message, this book has unique advantages in that it uses the new material presented in the recent large and epoch-making volumes on Quaker history by William Charles Braithwaite and others. This gives a freshness and frankness,—glancing at some of the foibles as well as the finer traits of the early Friends, which seem rare in a brief handbook,—a little elaborate, some may think, but invaluable to any who cannot read the larger work. We wish a wide circulation to this little volume, which may help all of us of the name of Friend to understand ourselves and each other, and lead to harmonious service, as we learn to "think the same things." CHILDREN'S CORNER.

"DOTH SHE NOT LIGHT A CANDLE?"

I've read that He worked with hammer and nails
Once down there in Nazareth town.
Maybe He hewed for the posts and rails
And counted the rings in the cedar's brown
The way we did when we built our own,
This little house where I'm living alone;

And that He walked in a garden too.
Maybe the roses were sweet like mine;
It's mighty still in the dust and dew
When birds fly back to the ivy vine.
I hope there were hundred-leaved roses in flower
When they left Him alone for that night hour.

I climb to the pasture at sunset where
Three trees stand out on the yellow sky,
And I mind how He carried more than his share
Up a hill so thorny and high;
And the briars that catch at my skirt and shoe
Seem saying, "They know not what they do!"

Down by the spring I remember when
He sat by a well and the words He said,
And days that I bake it comes back again
How He knew that the multitude needed bread;
Out in the field when I cut the corn
I think how He walked through the meadows at morn.

He even knew of my candlelight,
And I like to think when the short days come
And it grows so chill with the early night
That He met with them in a little room;
When I close the door it is good to know
He did the same things long ago.

PEARLS AND SMILES.—There was a scowl on May's face, a scowl so deep you had to look twice to see that her eyes were blue and her face really pretty. "I don't want to wear this woolen dress," she complained: "it's too scratchy. And these old heavy stockings, they scratch, too."

Aunt Lila looked up from her sewing and smiled.

"I guess if you were an oyster, we'd have plenty of pearls to wear in our rings and pins, wouldn't we?" she asked.

May looked at her aunt in surprise.

"What do you mean?" she questioned, climbing into the sewing-chair and cuddling close to her aunt. "Are you going to tell me a story? And is it about oysters?"

"Yes, it is about oysters," answered Aunt Lila, "and the oyster is like a little girl I know; he doesn't like anything to scratch his tender skin, and that is why we have pearls."

May's eyes were growing wider all the while.

"It's this way," Aunt Lila went on. "Inside the oyster's outer shell he has a very tender skin that doesn't like to be scratched or irritated any more than your skin likes it. But sometimes a tiny grain of sand works its way inside the oyster, and this tiny grain scratches and makes the oyster feel as uncomfortable as your woolen makes you feel. But the oyster doesn't scowl or fret. He goes to work forming a liquid which surrounds the grain of sand so it can't scratch any more. By and by this liquid hardens, and after a few years, sometimes many years, a perfect pearl is formed. And so we have pearls because the oyster doesn't like to have his tender skin scratched or irritated."

"But, Aunt Lila," interrupted May, "I can't make pearls just because my woolens scratch. What can I do?"

"That's just it," answered Aunt Lila. "Of course you can't make pearls, but you can smile, can't you? Just smile at the scratchy woolens, smile so hard that you forget they scratch. Smiles, you know, are precious, as precious as pearls."

May clapped her hands for joy, and the scowl was all gone. "Anyhow, I'm going to try," she answered. "If the oyster can forget his scratches by making pearls, then I'll forget mine by making smiles."—Child's Gem.

HAPPYING UP OTHERS.—Agnes is a little girl with such a bright, happy face that it is a pleasure to look at her. One day in answer to her mother's call, she came running home from a neighbor's two or three doors away. Her eyes were bright, her lips so smiling that her mother smiled too. "Do you want me, mother?" asked Agnes. "No, dear," said her mother, "not for anything important. I missed you that is all! Where were you, daughter?" "At the Browns'. And, oh, mother, Walter was cross, but I happied him up so that he got all over it; and then the baby cried, and I had to happy her up; then some one stepped on the kitten's tail, and I was just going to happy her up when you called me." "Why, what a happying time you have had," laughed her mother. "It must make you happy yourself to happy up little boys and babies and kittens, for you look as happy as possible."

And this is true. The more we try to make others happy the happier we shall be ourselves. Then put away frowns and pouting lips. Try to "happy up" those who are troubled, cross, or sick, and soon you will find yourself so happy that your face will shine with smiles.—Dr. E. L. House.

FRIENDS' AMERICAN INDIAN MISSIONS.

[Our friend Jonathan M. Steere has put into our hands a statement from which the following extracts have been made. It is hoped they will serve to remind Friends of their points of contact with the Indians.—Eds.]

Ever since the well-known treaty of William Penn with the Indians, 1682, made beneath the elm tree near the banks of the Delaware River, the Society of Friends has held a unique relationship with the American Indian. This relationship has been maintained by mutual confidence and good-will. It is notable that when President Grant decided in 1869 to try pacific methods rather than military to control the Indians on the frontier, he called upon the Society of Friends to inaugurate this policy because of their historical relations with the Indian extending from the seventeenth to the nineteenth century. And even in tribes to-day where Friends are not known many instances could be given of indifference changed to interest, and hostility to friendliness by that magic name "Penn." For truly it has unlocked many tightly closed doors presenting instead the open door of opportunity.

A recent survey of Indian Missions in the United States, resulted in assignment by the Home Missions Council of exclusive rights in its particular field, to each of the twenty-one Protestant denominations supporting missions among American Indians, thereby insuring against duplicated missionary effort. This very exclusiveness places upon each one a greater responsibility for the respective fields, and we, the Society of Friends, must choose between two alternatives. Either we must match this increased responsibility and opportunity with a more progressive, effective program of work for our Indian Mission or we must stand aside and let others do that which it is our privilege to do.

There are settlements of Indians in two-thirds of the States of the Union, and Indians are increasing in numbers. It is estimated that there are more Indians to-day than when Columbus discovered America! It has been found also that but four out of every ten of them are Christians and only two out of every ten are Protestants. More than half are untouched by Christianity.

Although Indians are scattered all over the country, there are more in Oklahoma than in any other State. In fact, nearly half of the Indians in the United States live in that State. The Indian mission field belonging to Friends of the Five Years' Meeting is located entirely in Oklahoma where we have seven missions, Wyandotte, Otoe, Iowa, Kickapoo, Big Jim, Osage and Shawnee. Some of these minister to more than one tribe.

Conditions have changed rapidly in Oklahoma in the last twenty years. The increase in population there has been greater than in any other State in the Union. The discovery of oil has brought in whites and Negroes by thousands and the Indians find themselves surrounded on all sides by a civilization both good and evil. The evil perhaps is most noticeable in its influence, especially among those Indians to whom the oil has brought sudden and unearned wealth. In mind they are still children, surrounded by brand new temptations, they are weakening their bodies and undermining their characters with riotous and immoral living. Apparently they are becoming civilized, but their civilization is still largely a veneer which covers pitiable ignorance and heathen superstition.

In the spring of 1920, a careful survey of all Indian Missions in Oklahoma was made in which Lawrence E. Lindley, newly appointed Friends' missionary at Shawnee, co-operated. His report regarding conditions at the seven mission stations still maintained by Friends, also a supplementary report are published in reports of the Associated Executive Committee of Friends on Indian Affairs.

With the sub-caption—"Waiting for Friends," the following appears:—

Quapaw Indians in Wyandotte County, about 331.

Sac and Fox Indians in central Oklahoma near the Iowas, about 600. Osages at Greyhorse and Fairfax, near Hominy. White Turkey Band of Shawnees in Pottawatomie County.

No Protestant work is being done among these groups. They are located in Friends' field in Oklahoma and would welcome Friends' missionaries, but we have no funds with which to send workers to these tribes.

The Home Missions Council is the medium through which the various denominations co-operate to prevent over-lapping in one field and to insure religious oversight for all tribes.

The Y. W. C. A., with Edith M. Dabb as National Indian Secretary, and the Y. M. C. A., through G. Elmer Lindquist, are eager to co-operate in every possible way with denominations working among Indians. Susie Meek, a Sac and Fox Indian graduate of Earlham College and a Friend, now working with the Y. W. C. A., gives of her time as there is request for it to assist in organizing social and religious work among the Indians on reservations and in missionary communities.

THE PLAIN LANGUAGE.

I was glad to see Mary L. Balderston's letter in THE FRIEND for Eighth Month 25th and also the editorial introduction to that letter. We cannot controvert the fact that the Plain Language seems to be a "lost cause;" but on the other hand, we are not at all bound to believe that it is so in reality, and that the death-knell is sounded to all efforts to rectify customary speech, by purer forms more consistent with Truth, and with the brotherhood of mankind.

The case of the Plain Language is indeed hopeless, if its use is founded simply on a fastidious purism, or on such efforts to control grammar or to polish speech as are represented by the French Academy.

The very least that can be said for the Plain Language, is that it carries more moral weight than the language used by the world at large. This is so, but there is much more to be said, for its claims to notice rest on the rock of spiritual fact.

Neither early nor later Friends justified their speech only on the ground of moral weight, for it became one of the jealously guarded fruits of their religion,—a something without which they could not fulfil the Apostolic command of "Hold fast the form of sound words," for to abstain from countenancing, or using an unsound form, was to them, a part of the service they owed to Him who had called them, and had bestowed on them the gracious seal of being His peculiar people. This was their central argument, but its force is so little felt in our day that the rising generation even in some Conservative meetings are asking themselves the question: "Is it worth while to address other people in a different style than they use among themselves?" while in meetings not Conservative, the question has been asked fifty or sixty years ago, and answered in the negative.

To the writer it appears that we have no more right to be satisfied with such negative results than we have to allow young men to join the fighting ranks of the army without rebuke.

In forming a judgment, we most of us go back to the early days of the Society, and we are told that "thee" and "thou" were used to obliterate the social distinctions caused by addressing superiors with "you" and inferiors with "thou." Likewise in the matter of dress we are told that Friends' dress was the dress of the period, shorn of superfluities. I feel convinced that these historical statements and the conclusions most naturally drawn from them need modifying.

We have evidence that even in quite early days, Quakers were known by their dress, and that Friends soon found in the world at large a greatly lessened use of "thou" to inferiors.

After the days of the Commonwealth, I believe that "thee" and "thou" began rapidly to disappear, except among people who used dialect, as, for instance, in the West of England and Yorkshire. William Penn was conscious of this change, but with him that was no argument why Quakers should drop the distinction between singular and plural in address. He says, if "thou" becomes obsolete and is replaced by "you," let us have another word for the plural,—so that whatever might happen, he would still stand for a testimony against the world's speech. (See Select Works, Vol. 1, p. 442.)

It is true that Isaac Penington spoke of "thou" as Scripture language and proper language, and that "you" arose from pride and ministered to it," but in general this latter fact was only a subsidiary argument; the main impulse arose from a sense of the Lord's requiring which remained constant for many generations, and in some cases remains to the present day. At the same time, there is no satisfactory evidence that our Divine Head ever relaxed His call to the Church to come up in faithfulness in this particular.

That call may not be felt to-day. London Yearly Meeting is wholly insensible to it, but the testimony is a living one, although buried out of sight, at present, and it must be born again, before the Church comes out of the wilderness, leaning on the arm of her Beloved.

In 1712, the London Epistle advised that—"none turn aside from the plainness, simplicity, and life of the Truth into the words, ways, customs and fashions of the world. Nothing is small that God makes matter of conscience to do, or to leave undone, and whatsoever has been condemned by the Lord's righteous judgments is never to be built up again, by any who are lovers of the truth, as it is in Jesus."

Let us not, however, imagine that plainness of speech is covered by the use of a single word and its inflection. Not at all.

There are many unsound forms of speech current in the world which are hindrances to people walking in the Spirit, and are like notes or obstructions to the clear shining of the sun of righteousness, and such are "Mr.," "Mrs.," "Miss," "Sir," "Hon." as a compliment,—signs of ecclesiasticism such as "Reverend," "D. D.," "B. D.," "Good-night," "Good-morning," "Good-day,"—heathen names to the months. The months September to December as names are free from the objections that apply to the others, but it may be considered best to use vernacular English, with correct numbering, as Ninth Month, etc.

Are we going to be satisfied with a blurred light, a false light, or a weak and flickering light, instead of a steady, clear, shining bright light, which belongs to the single eye and leaves no part dark. The world needs it, and the Church needs it, if the work of God on the earth is to go forward.

ALBERT H. VOTAW.

[The following appeared as an interview in the Evening Ledger of Ninth Month 29th, and is offered to us for publication.—Eds.]

In this time of unemployment things go harder than ever with the convict just out of jail. Albert H. Votaw, Secretary of the Pennsylvania Prison Society, the oldest and one of the largest of such societies in the world, speaks on some aspects of the problem.

"Generally speaking, I should say that there is a good deal of sentimentality wasted on discharged prisoners. Nine out of ten leave prison with definite places to go to and definite notions of what they intend to do. They rejoin the gangs with which they were associated before their conviction or, on the other hand, go to relatives or to old friends who have been arranging the processes that will get them back into respectable society. In the first case there is little that organized humanitarianism can do, and in the other little that it need to do.

"However, the exception—the one in ten who has neither home nor job—aggregates to a pretty large number. Each year about 1000 men come to us for aid. If, on the part of such men, there is any sincere intention of keeping clear of further crime, the problem is immediately resolved into one of finding them employment, and secondarily, of building and encouraging their moral and physical strength, both before and after jobs have been found for them. Despair is perhaps the most dangerous of the faults that the average ex-convict needs to be kept from, and regular and hard labor, earning regular wages, is the only genuine restorative of self-respect and self-confidence. It is the greatest sanative for a mind gone wrong.

"Since at present it is hard enough for a man without a prison record to find himself a job, the work of helping ex-convicts has become peculiarly difficult in its most important phase. We must sustain and support and encourage a larger number of men and for longer periods until they sustain themselves. We must use this attention and oversight at the time when our subjects are helpless and on the edge of the despair that would convince them that anything, even prison, is better than an unrecognized attempt to live honestly. Some of such persons, sometimes, have held jobs and lost them on the instant their prison record became known to their employers. Such an incident repeated twice or three times in the life of an ex-convict is a tremendous incentive to despair.

"In the average case I think it is better for an employer of an ex-convict to know that his man has been in prison, and for the man to know that his employer knows it. It may make for a greater watchfulness on the employer's part, or in rare cases to prejudice; but it removes any foreboding of the man that he will be 'caught' in the crime he has long since expiated and makes the problem merely one of his willingness to work and keep free of further mischief.

"I have been speaking of the average man with criminal history—the man who, through circumstance or sudden willfulness, 'went wrong.' I think four-fifths of such men, if they are given a fair chance, will 'go right' afterward. There are, I might say, two other types with which we have to do, although there is very little we can do with them or for them. I refer first to feeble-minded, alcoholics and defectives of one group or another, who have not the stamina for a moral regeneration, and inevitably follow the line of least resistance, which leads usually back to the prison.

"Such persons belong in the institutions that have been built to take care of them, and in the end most of them find their way into such places. The other type to which I refer is amazingly rare in our own experience—the born criminal, the man with a good set of wits but no sense at all of meum et tuum. No amount of supervision or of moral persuasion will induce such a man to live honestly, though his own slowness may keep him from going back to jail.

"The average promoter of bubble companies is of this type, and I venture to say there are a hundred times more of him in thoroughly respectable locations than inside of prison walls.

"With the predestined criminal of Lombroso, and his followers, I have not yet been made acquainted."

REPORT OF THE T. WISTAR BROWN TEACHERS' FUND TRUSTEES.

FROM FIFTH MONTH 14, 1920, TO FIFTH MONTH 12, 1921.

During the year the Trustees made 123 grants from the T. Wistar Brown Teachers' Fund, 88 to women and 35 to men, for the following purposes:—

Study in summer schools	52
Visits to schools	10
Attendance at educational meetings	38
Winter courses, whole or part time	21
Other grants	2

All but six of the recipients of grants had had some experience in teaching. Eighty-six were members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. The largest number of grants made in any previous year was 81 in 1919-20. The Trustees found themselves for the first time with a greater number of applications than the income of the Fund would meet and were therefore obliged to limit the grants made. In order to do this in the wisest way, all the former recipients of grants living within easy reach of Philadelphia, were invited to a conference at Friends' Select School on Fourth Month 22nd. Opinions were freely expressed through papers, letters, and longer and shorter addresses. The consensus of opinion seemed to be that attendance at educational conventions was of minor importance and that the expense should be borne by schools or individuals. Visits to schools were useful, particularly to teachers of some experience. Both winter and summer courses of study were felt to be of value. The grants made during the year amounted to $18,348.71, made up of $14,552.21 income for the year and $3,796.50 unexpended balances carried over from previous years.

His presence is still in the midst of the world of men, and the only thing we dare not be is indifferent to that presence. One of our great duties and joys is to make clear to men what we have discovered about Him. Both our theories and theirs may be imperfect, but we have to lead ourselves and them to clearer vision. Our loyalty to Jesus and to truth demands this of us. What He requires of us in the first place is an honest judgment. We have seen Him, what do we think? His sympathy is so great that we need not fear, if we are only honest.

"Thou art the way.

Hadst Thou been nothing but the goal,

I cannot say

If Thou hadst ever met my soul."

This is why we sometimes find more honest appreciation of Jesus outside the ranks of His professed followers than within them. As of old He appeals to the multitude. To-day as then they may say to those who arrogate to themselves the right to judge because of official position or of learning, "Well, this is astonishing! You do not know where he comes from, and yet he has opened my eyes! . . . If this man were not from God he could do nothing." That must ever be the real test. When He has opened our eyes, we know. Our testimony should then be directed to letting the whole world know His power.

SOME misunderstanding seems to have arisen in regard to the support of the work carried on by Daniel Oliver in Syria. In order to clarify the situation, I would like to make the following statements:—

All contributors to the work of the American Friends' Service Committee have the privilege of designating the countries for which their money is to be used.

All non-Friends are assured that their money will not be used for overhead expenses. So far all overhead expenses have been paid out of unallocated funds from Friends themselves.

Last year upon assurances from Daniel Oliver that there was enough money in sight to carry on his work and that he would direct that it be turned through the American Friends' Service Committee, the American Friends' Service Committee appropriated $20,000 for his work in Syria.

The actual contributions received from Friends ear-marked for Daniel Oliver's work was $6,016.65. This was all sent on in cash to him without deductions for any overhead or office expenses.

The appropriation, therefore, from Service Committee funds for Daniel Oliver's work last year was $13,983.35. With the already existing obligations of the American Friends' Service Committee to provide for the overhead expenses for relief work in Austria, Serbia, Germany, Poland and Russia, the Executive Board and the Finance Committee could not see its way to taking on responsibility for work in a new country.

The American Friends' Service Committee wishes to support the work of Daniel Oliver in Syria and solicits funds for that purpose. All monies contributed for this work and ear-marked for work in Syria was forwarded to him in cash. The Committee is glad to sponsor his work, to interest Friends in it, and will gladly forward any money that Friends anywhere may wish to contribute toward the work. W. K. T.

SERVICE COMMITTEE PLANS INTENSIVE CAMPAIGN FOR FUNDS FOR RUSSIAN RELIEF.

The story which Anna J. Haines told of the fifteen million starving Russians, and the story of the crash of the economic life of Austria within the last week as told by Hilda Clark and Edith Pye, stirred the members of the Service Committee, at its meeting in Philadelphia, to the determination that a vast program of relief must be launched at once. The meeting, attended by over one hundred members and returned workers, met at the Fifteenth and Race Streets Meeting-house on Eleventh Month 17th, and after the business session of the afternoon, a supper for the Friends present was held in the Young Friends' Auditorium, followed in the evening by a meeting in behalf of the Quaker Embassy work.

A financial statement, presented by Henry Tatnall Brown, brought forward the urgent need of more funds for the General Fund. The Committee felt that this was essentially the concern of Friends, and decided to make a strong appeal to the Friends' Meetings asking that contributions be made immediately to this fund, that the plans of the Committee to undertake a wide program of relief would not be decreased.

Reports were made of the formation of Relief Committees, distributing through the Friends, in New York, Chicago, Boston, Minneapolis, and Pittsburgh. But as these funds will be entirely for food and relief, immediate funds are needed to provide for the distribution of this relief. The future of the Friends' work demands the careful thought and support of Friends everywhere. A Committee consisting of Henry Tatnall Brown, Clement M. Biddle and Joseph H. Haines was appointed to bring this need to the attention of the Meetings.

The Committee approved the appointment of Murray Kenworthy as Acting Chief of the Russian Unit until a Chief is sent. He is now in Moscow.

A CALL TO FRIENDS EVERYWHERE.

Never certainly in any former period of its history has the Society of Friends stood before the world in such favorable light as is now the case. Its name is known in every country of Europe and almost all the people of these countries, down to the most humble laborers, have deep respect, sometimes even reverence, for what the word Quaker stands.

It is, too, something much more than appreciation of us as purveyors of food to the hungry. The food has no doubt been the key that has unlocked their hearts. But their interest goes deeper. They have come to look upon us as representatives of a way of life and interpreters of a type of religion which awaken a deep response in their hearts. They know little enough about us and about our views and methods, but in any case they believe in us and turn appealingly toward us. It is a situation that puts up to us a most unusual opportunity and an unparalleled responsibility.

But it is not only Europe that has shown faith in us. The people of America have turned to us as faithful and trustworthy executors of their desires to relieve human suffering. Large and generous gifts, amounting to millions of dollars, have come into the treasury of the Friends' Service Committee to be used for relief in the European countries where our Quaker Missions are at work. In many cases almost all the money used to buy food, clothes and medicine has come in from the generosity of others than Friends. We have promised that all such gifts should go solely for materials of relief and none of it for general expenses, as Friends themselves would provide and equip the personnel and financially maintain the Missions. As the work has grown and expanded, and widened out into many fields, remote from each other, it has entailed heavy general expenses which must be provided if we are to transmit and administer the relief which other people are providing and if we are to fulfil the hopes and expectations which these pathetic sufferers abroad repose in us.

We have reached a point when we must earnestly appeal to Friends everywhere in this country to rise up and meet an urgent situation. We cannot go forward to do our full part in relieving the unspeakable tragedy of the Russian famine without a large increase of money available for general purposes, that is for the maintenance of the work itself. We believe that the public will make a generous response to our appeal for funds to buy food, but none of that money can be used to cover the general expenses of the Mission which manages and distributes the food. This is a Quaker obligation.

Friends have been amazingly generous in supporting this work abroad, and for that reason it has become the work, not of a few, but of the entire body of Friends. I feel sure that this emergency call for immediate contributions for the maintenance of the great work through another winter of suffering will bring quick response.

RUFUS M. JONES,

Chairman of American Friends' Service Committee.

NEW YORK DINNER FOR RUSSIAN RELIEF.

On Eleventh Month 27th, on the roof garden of the Hotel Waldorf Astoria, the Russian Famine Fund Committee held a $10 a plate dinner in aid of Russian Relief. The dinner consisted only of a small bowl of soup, a piece of brown bread and a cup of coffee. There were no table cloths and all the guests had to line up and have their soup dishes out to them as it is done in the feeding kitchens in Europe.

Paul D. Cravath presided, and among the guests present were former Secretary of Commerce William C. Redfield, Henry W. Taft and Vernon Kellogg. The principal speakers were Vernon Kellogg, special investigator for the American Relief Administration, and Anna J. Haines, our own Friends' worker. Something over $1500 was realized for the Russian Relief.

The Russian Famine Fund is a committee organized by Allen D. Wardwell, former head of the American Red Cross in Russia, to appeal for funds for distribution through the American Friends' Service Committee in Russia. The headquarters of the committee are at 15 Park Row, New York City, and a number of committees throughout the United States are now co-operating with them.

SHIPMENTS received during week ending Eleventh Month 19, 1921—137 boxes and packages received; 2 for German Relief; 1 from Mennonites; 3 anonymous.

Cash for the same period, $10,716.94.

"Some crash must come, tragic and shocking, to our social structure. I see no escape from that, and only the hope that in that crisis the very shock of it will restore the mental balance of the nation and that all classes will combine under leaders of unselfish purpose and fine vision, eager for evolution and not revolution, for peace and not for blood, for Christian charity and not for hatred, for civilization and not for anarchy, to re-shape the conditions of our social life and give us a new working order—combining the virtue of patriotism with a generous spirit to other peoples across the old frontiers of hate. That is the hope but not the certainty.

"Now it can be told."

THE BIG ISSUE—SEVEN QUESTIONS.

1. Am I so absorbed in my home or business that the greatest issue of my generation is receiving only my casual attention?

2. Have I given my best thought to the solution of the world problems involved in the Washington Conference?

3. Am I fully convinced of the need for a new world order in which co-operation should replace selfish competition? How far does my way of living express my conviction that good-will should be the basis of national and international life?

4. Have I redeemed the promises I made to myself when my country went into the world war, that after it was over I would do some constructive work so that such a calamity should never happen again?

5. Have I done everything in my power to see that the children in the schools, public and private, are taught to understand why the next war must never come?

6. Am I awake to the power and responsibility I have as an American citizen for creating public opinion? What have I done to put the best that has been said on the subject before the churches, clubs, schools, libraries, newspapers, etc., of the place where I live?

7. Have I written or telegraphed to Secretary Hughes to support his stand for naval armament reduction and to express my conviction on the still greater issues involved in the Conference?

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

III.

The third week of the Conference has been marked by the tragic loss of a great opportunity by the spokesman of France. America's definite and far-reaching proposition for reducing and limiting naval armaments in the first week, and Britain's generous acceptance of that proposition in the second week, would be followed in the third week, it was hoped, by an equally far-reaching proposition from France for reducing and limiting land armaments, or at least by an equally generous acceptance of America's naval proposal. But on this greatest of international forums and in the hearing of all the world, the premier of France failed to rise to the world's emergency and to the splendid opportunity afforded his own government and his own people.

Premier Briand learned during the weeks immediately preceding the Conference the impossibility of securing a military and naval alliance with the United States and Great Britain for the protection of France against Germany. He realized that if this protection is to be based upon military and naval force, France must supply that force. In his heart of hearts he must realize also the impossibility of France supplying through the indefinite future an adequate force for that purpose. Yet, instead of declaring for the moral and material disarmament of France and the adoption of effective peaceful means of assuring the safety of France, he exhibited the Bourbon's temper of "never learning and never forgetting anything," and delivered an impassioned address, the keynote of which was suspicion, fear and militaristic determination. From alpha to omega, he dwelt upon the alleged militarism of Germany and Russia and the consequent necessity of France maintaining large armies to repel attack. While demanding an "atmosphere of peace" and a "moral disarmament" of France's European neighbors, it never seemed to occur to him that it might be wise for victorious France herself to set the example in this respect. If he had frankly admitted the inadequacy, as well as the wickedness of France attempting "a lone hand" in the game of rivalry with the future Germany and Russia for the military domination of Europe, and had frankly declared that France would turn her back forever upon the method of military coercion and would rely henceforth exclusively upon the methods of conciliation, forbearance, and mutual co-operation, he would have made so profound an appeal to the liberal, progressive, peace-loving sentiment of all the world, Germany and Russia included, that France would have been exalted in the eyes of mankind, her safety would have been assured, and God's blessing would have rested upon the atmosphere of peace and the moral disarmament which would have begun to prevail from that hour throughout Continental Europe.

Senator Schanzer of Italy, replying to Premier Briand, emphasized the fact that Italy has adopted "moral disarmament" and a drastic reduction in her army to less than 200,000 men. In an interview this afternoon, the Italian spokesman further explained that in spite of a "possible menace" to Italy from France, Jugo-Slavia, Russia, or Germany and Austria, Italy has reduced her army to smaller proportions than that of any other European country, large or small, and that as soon as the world war was ended, she gave aid to the Austrian people, whose government had been for centuries Italy's chief foe, made peace with Jugo-Slavia, and advocated a sympathetic treatment of Germany and Russia. She had done this, he declared, not because of economic necessity, but because "Italy is in perfect accord with the United States in desiring the re-establishment of peace from the idealistic point of view, and because, to attain moral disarmament, we must first have material disarmament."

In response to Premier Briand's demand that France should receive at least the "moral support" of the other nations in her struggle with Germany, Secretary Hughes significantly replied that "there is no moral isolation for the defenders of liberty and justice," leaving it to be understood between the lines that moral isolation would be the fate of France or any other nation that substituted for liberty and justice a programme of military domination and imperialistic aggression. The chief British delegate, Arthur Balfour, replied to Premier Briand's demand for moral support by a very involved sentence, including three if's and ending with a question mark. Since the open session adjourned, the British foreign secretary, Lord Curzon, has made a speech in London, warning France in exceptionally sharp and caustic words that her safety lay not in her own strength, but in the conscience of the world, and that it was the determination of Great Britain to co-operate with other powers in repudiating a policy of retaliation and revenge toward Germany and in assisting her to become a peaceful and prosperous member of the family of nations.

The old saying that "fears have no ears," is further exemplified in Premier Briand's speech in New York, just before he sailed for home, in which he declared that if France should reduce its army, it would end the peace of the world and enable the old imperialistic Germany to overthrow the new democratic Germany. To most sensible men outside of France, it is evident that the large standing army of France is the chief incitement to future war in Europe and the chief obstacle to the complete triumph of German democracy over German imperialism. The demand of the French, too, that they shall be permitted to have a navy equal to that of Japan and shall be unrestricted in the size and use of their submarines, has made an unfavorable impression upon the Conference, especially upon the British delegation, who see in the demand a challenge to British sea-power in the North Sea and the Mediterranean.

Although the question of reducing and limiting land armaments is still before the Conference—according to a statement of Secretary Hughes in an interview this afternoon—there is much anxiety lest the attitude of France may cause the Conference to fail in its efforts along that line. But there is this much encouragement, even in regard to the size of European armies; first, that although France still has an abnormally large army, she has reduced it to two-thirds of its pre-war size, and promises to reduce it to one-half that size; and second, that the economic necessities and the liberal sentiments of the French people may soon compel their bellicose and imperialistic politicians to abolish universal compulsory military forces, at the same time putting a veto on the proposed increase of their navy. Should this be the fortunate event, there is the further hope that Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Russia and the Balkan States will follow the French precept and example and decimate their preposterously large and peace-menacing armies.

Secretary Hughes, it would appear from our interview with him, is still determined or hopeful in regard to armaments' reduction and limitation on land, as well as on sea, for he insisted that the subject was still very much before the Conference, and that the questions of poisonous gases, aircraft, the laws of war were being examined by sub-committees. Meanwhile it may be recalled that the Hague Conferences agreed upon the prohibition of asphyxiating gases and of warfare in and from the air. These prohibitions may be renewed, for it seems quite probable that the third Hague Conference will be summoned after the Washington Conference has accomplished its work. And when the Hague's substitutes for war are developed and made effective by disarmament, the "laws of War" will be superseded by the outlawry of war and the dawn of a warless world.

The fourth week of the Conference promises to be featured by the development of China's "Ten Commandments," or "Magna Charta," on which some very interesting and encouraging light has already been thrown in interviews with Lord Riddell, Secretary Hughes, Judge Wang, Prince Tokugawa and Foreign Minister Hanihara. But these must be left to Letter No. IV.

In concluding this letter, which has dealt chiefly with the disappointment caused by the failure of France to rise nobly to her magnificent opportunity, a note of encouragement must be struck by recalling the speech of Secretary Hughes at the first meeting of the Conference—a speech that has been "heard around the world," and has found an abiding response in the hearts of the peoples. The diplomats at Washington are still hearkening unto it and to the response which it called forth. It appears indeed to have been the "golden Word" of which the English poet wrote:

The knights rode up with gifts for the king,
And one was a golden sword;
One was a suit of golden mail,
And one was a golden Word.

He buckled the shining armor on,
He girt the sword at his side;
But he flung in the dust the golden Word,
And trampled it in his pride

The armor is pierced by many a spear,
The sword is broken in twain;
But the Word has risen midst storm and fire
To conquer and to reign!

WM. I. HULL.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Eleventh Month 26, 1921.

P. S.—My attention has been called to the fact that whereas in my first letter I spoke of the capital ship ratio of the United States, Great Britain and Japan, proposed by Secretary Hughes, as being, 5, 6, 3, in my second letter, I spoke of Great Britain's acceptance of capital ship equality with the United States; the ratio in the first letter should have been stated, of course, as 5, 5, 3.

WM. I. HULL.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

The following telegram was sent to Secretary Hughes:

The Religious Society of Friends, through its Representative Meeting, wishes to express to Secretary Hughes, hearty approval for bold and constructive plan proposed for limitation of naval armaments. We plead that conflicting interests be not allowed to cause American Delegates to swerve from duty in upholding advances already gained at Conference.

GEORGE M. WARNER, Clerk.

WM. B. HARVEY, Secretary.

Philadelphia, Eleventh Month 16, 1921.

The Conference on the "Religious Education of Our Children," announced for Eleventh Month 22nd, brought a good audience (something more than two hundred) to the Twelfth Street Meeting-house. The occasion was one of distinct profit. Perhaps the outstanding feature was the fact that speakers kept their eyes steadily on the past with the determination not to squander our well-earned heritage, in the desire for adaptation and progress. A liberal assignment of space in our next number has been allotted to the papers and the reported discussions. Frances Tatum Rhoads, who was largely instrumental in arranging the Conference, has kindly consented to edit this material.

The Pacific Friend notes that William C. Allen lectured at the college in Whittier on War and observes that he is "quite prepared to speak on that subject to any audience."

We have received a copy of the Wichita (Kansas) Eagle of the 31st ult. It contains an interesting article recording the progress in that State in having colleges and universities give credit to Bible study. Dr. William L. Pearson, well known to some of our readers, has been active in this good work. Public school education of any grade with the Bible left out has felt how serious is the loss of "Christian ideals."

NOTICES.

LECTURES AT FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL.—A general invitation is extended to all interested to hear Anna J. Haines, Moorestown, N. J., recently returned from several years in Russia, where she was for many months the only American relief worker allowed by the Soviet Government, as representative of the American Friends' Service Committee. She will tell her thrilling story of "Russia Now" on Sixth-day evening, Twelfth Month 9th, at 7.45.

On the morning of Seventh-day, Twelfth Month 10th, at 10.30 o'clock, Dallas Lore Sharp, Professor of English at Boston University, will address a conference of English teachers on "Themeless Composition," and in the afternoon at two will deliver his lecture before the Friends' Educational Association on "The Lost Poet and Prophet."

BORN.—In Philadelphia, Eleventh Month 20, 1921, to Herbert V. and Madeline W. Nicholson, a daughter, who was named VIRGINIA.

DIED.—At the home of his daughter, Marian P. Gooden, Dexter, Iowa, on Ninth Month 7, 1921, DANIEL J. PECKHAM, of Paulina, Iowa, son of the late David and Mary Ann Peckham, in his seventy-third year; a member of Paulina Monthly Meeting.

—, at Coloma, Md., on the twenty-first of Eleventh Month, ELWOOD BALDWIN, aged sixty-three; a member of New Garden Monthly Meeting, Pa.

THE NEGRO AND TUBERCULOSIS

Because of the relation of tuberculosis to squalid, ill-ventilated houses and the peculiar susceptibility of the colored race to this disease, the Whittier Centre Housing Company has enlisted the able assistance of Dr. Charles J. Hatfield, and Dr. H. R. M. Landis of the Henry Phipps Institute. Dr. Landis, in an address in Washington, D. C., put the facts of the case squarely before the Convention on Tuberculosis when he said:—

"In dealing with the tuberculosis problem among the Negroes greater difficulties are encountered than among those of the white race. It matters not, however, whether we are actuated by sentiment to aid a race struggling under difficulties or whether we view the problem as a public health measure. The essential things to bear in mind are:—that in many of our Northern cities the colored population is large; that tuberculosis is wide-spread among this race and that the white population cannot ignore the menace this wide-spread infection carries."

You can help in this work by investing your money in the Common Stock of the Whittier Centre Housing Company which is established to alleviate this condition. This company offers 500 shares of its stock at $50 per share. The sale of 200 shares is imperative before cold weather, for the renovation of properties on Moss Street, north of Parrish Street. Checks may be sent to Mr. Samuel H. Carpenter, Treasurer, 517 Chestnut Street.

"If we were asked which was the greatest miracle recorded of Jesus of Nazareth, well might we answer, that He made Simon the zealot and Matthew the publican sit down together at the same table as brothers and as friends. What did Simon say when first he learned that a publican was to be one of their little company? What did Simon suffer when they gathered in the evening after the day's work and Matthew would talk his publican 'shop'? How Simon's fingers itched to draw his dagger and do for Matthew then and there! But Jesus reconciled and made brothers of these two, and there was none other on earth who even attempted to do it. . . . And we may notice that this change is accomplished through causing individuals so to live in another world of thought as that they come to look at all men in a different light. The zealot does not agree with the publican, but he loves him as a brother: the Jew does not become a Gentile, but he desires nothing so much as to possess his brother's soul in love. In other words, the desire to dominate and to compel has given place to the great longing for fellowship. Fellowship was that which Jesus sought. . . . Men do not want to have good done to them, but to be loved and to be delivered from themselves through someone who loves them and believes in them. That faith in and insight into human nature was a part of what it meant to respond to Jesus and to begin to live in His world."—Nathaniel Micklem.

"THEY ALSO SERVE."

The moving cry—"Doth God exact day-labour, light denied?"—of one who sat in gathering (if not settled) darkness, voiced a fervent longing to occupy his talent and "present his true account." The question thus "fondly asked" was perhaps almost as much an argument as an appeal, being so quickly followed by that great dictum in the counsel of Patience, "Who best bear His mild yoke, they serve Him best,"—even though this yoke-bearing require them at times to "stand and wait" when they would fain go into the harvest-field, or join the thousands who "post o'er land and ocean" to do His bidding.

But the longing of the blind poet under his handicap may have its parallel in many hearts to-day, when the call of need comes urgently from so many quarters; when attractive opportunities for "service" of so many kinds are, one might say, thrust upon our notice; and when at the same time the resources or abilities at our command seem but meager, if anything at all. Here then may be a call to serve by bearing our restraints and limitations, and we may be comforted in the assurance that our duty is gauged by the ability which we have, rather than by that which we have not. Who indeed dare attempt to measure the value and extent of the service of a resigned will,—of resignation itself? How great an evangel, too, has been the life of many a quiet, inconspicuous Christian, whose voice was perhaps never heard in "public testimony," whose kindly ministrations were quite unconnected with anything official or conventional! The very spirit and presence of such as these is a benediction, their out-reaching sympathy an inspiration. "They also serve."

These may seem trite things; but the assurance that lies back of the poet's question or follows close upon it, should be hardly more a comfort to the would-be laborer than an admonition to some who, already active in field or vineyard, are inclined to look critically upon those whom they suppose to be idle or indifferent. The avenues to service are not always open highways, and some in these obscure paths are doubtless treading a way in which their steps "are ordered of the Lord." Moreover, when we think of the mult tudinous interests and needs of humanity, with all that belongs to the development of Christian civilization, we must be dull of vision if we do not see that there is room for dedicated labor of the plainest order, as well as of that which is most highly skilled and specialized. Are the suffering peoples of the earth to be supplied with food and clothing? Then it is the proper business of some to produce these things, and of others to carry them "o'er land and ocean." Are any called to bring "good tidings of good" to distant regions? Then all the work and knowledge and material necessary to make possible the answering of such a call are tributary to that service. Happy will it be when even the labor by which the duty of providing for one's own household is accomplished, shall be entered into more often with some reference to its value in the general economy, and carried on, not for pride and power, but in the spirit of one that serveth. The honest workman who thus dedicates his talents and his industry in any line of human welfare, and who humbly seeks for "light and leading," will be among "the Lord's day-laborers," and in frequent receipt of some measure of His recompense,—“Well done, good and faithful servant!”

FAITH.

If on this night of still, white cold,
I can remember May,
New green of tree and underbrush,
A hillside orchard's mounting flush,
The scent of earth and noon's blue hush,
A robin's jaunty way;

If on this night of bitter frost,
I know such things can be,
That lovely May is true—ah, well,
I shall believe the tales men tell,
Wonders of bliss and asphodel,
And immortality.

EDUCATION.

[Under this general caption we are able to present somewhat full reports of the recent Conference on Religious Education. The subject we are sure is one of the very widest appeal.—Eds.]

A CONFERENCE ON RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

On the afternoon of Eleventh Month 22nd, near 5 P. M., a group of about one hundred and fifty people, largely parents and teachers, gathered in the Twelfth Street Meeting House, Philadelphia, and the Conference was opened by Alfred C. Garrett who read some passages from the book of Deuteronomy. He spoke of this book as perhaps the one best loved by our Saviour, and His having given no definite teaching to children during His earthly ministry may have been because the teaching of this book, in which He must Himself have been taught as a child, was approved by Him.

After a brief period of silence, Frances T. Rhoads brought the concern of the Committee as to the holding of the Conference before us as follows:—

I have been asked to put before you the "Concern" which has brought about this Conference. To do this we must go back to our last Yearly Meeting and its appointment of a Committee on "the Extension of Christian fundamentals," or, more briefly, "the extension Committee."

This appointment was made in response to a very deep and earnest feeling that we should reach out to our fellow-men with "the Quaker Message," but this was not definitely stated nor were we given any ideas as to ways and means, but left to work it out, "as way opened," in the good old-time fashion.

As soon as the Committee got together it was evident that much preliminary work would have to be done, for you cannot give forth a message until you are clear what that message should be. During the spring series of Quarterly Meetings, some of us went to each one trying to express our desire to be of service, and to find out the special needs of the varying localities.

The Sub-committee which we represent (that on Religious Education of Our Children) made an effort to get in touch with parents and teachers, and see if, in any way, we could help them, but we met with rather indifferent success.

And so we sent out those troublesome questions to which you have given such a generous response. I never saw a more worth-while or interesting set of letters—eighty-four of them! I have read and re-read them, and wished I could answer every one. As that was impossible, we have asked you here to this Conference, and again we have a fine response, and a wonderful proof of the interest we all feel in the children of our Yearly Meeting. We have a dream of some day getting the children themselves together. The Yearly Meeting of the future!

Now that you are here, please, just be as frank and as interesting as you have been in your letters, and we shall have a wonderful Conference.

You not only handled the subjects we proposed, but you gave us so many other good ones, that we should like to see a whole series of Quarterly Meeting Conferences started to discuss them. You know the Extension Committee has a Sub-committee on Conferences, of which William B. Harvey is Chairman, and any request made to that Committee will meet with a generous response as to help in the arrangements, furnishing speakers, etc.

Now to return to our letters. On first reading they presented a bewildering variety of opinions. But of course that was natural when we remember how the children in one family vary in temperament and requirements (example in own family). The same book, for example, will not do for the whole family. One child would delight in Violet Hodgkin's "Quaker Saints." To another the stories told by Maude Robinson, in a charming yet very practical way, will mean much more. With all this variety the letters, taken as a whole, are distinctly encouraging, and make us feel that the time is at hand when we shall be able to have our children appreciate their "Quaker heritage" more fully than ever before.

The problem of the child and the meeting seemed to elicit the most general interest, and so we are to make that the chief subject and devote our evening session to it. And we shall hear the details of that very interesting experiment which is just beginning in Germantown, where they are really doing what the rest of us have been talking about.

Your letters have also discussed the First-day School and its connection with the Meeting for Worship, expressing the hope that this may be still closer and more vital, and the proper training, and the personality of its teachers as being of great importance.

Also the responsibility and opportunity of our day-schools in spreading the fundamentals of Quakerism. In connection with this how timely seem Gertrude Sherer's words in her report to the Yearly Meeting:—

"Last year I felt that we were in some schools a little in danger of forgetting that we are, after all, Friends' schools, and that our work is a religious concern with meetings and committees, as it seemed to me, in some cases, we were neglecting our opportunity to teach the Bible to the children in our schools, in a way that could possibly make it of real value to them at any time. I am, therefore, about to redouble former efforts, and make a special plea to the principals and teachers to give ample time and conscientious effort to realize this important work. And I must in this connection express the profound hope that the mid-week meetings which our children attend may so meet their spiritual needs that no one can truthfully say of these eager-minded, whole-hearted little ones, 'The hungry sheep look up and are not fed.'"

Again, the letters are encouraging in their evident thought given to the gathering of the family for worship. I have heard some question among older Friends of late years as to whether, in the over-busy modern life, this lovely and helpful Friendly custom was not dying out. I certainly think not since hearing what you say about it!

We not only had a variety of helpful ideas as to giving children an active share in family worship, but have the promise of hearing later, how a new plan not thoroughly tested yet, works out, in one family.

A Friend who has taken a deep interest in this subject, though not able to answer the questions, or to be with us to-night, asked me to express his feeling that we need more vocal prayer in our family worship. He has two sons, and during the childhood of the elder, they were so situated that it was not possible to have family worship alone. The younger son did not have this disadvantage and the father feels that the difference has been shown in the lives of the two boys. I think that is a story for us to remember, and to strive earnestly for this pause in our busy days to come with our children into communion with our Heavenly Father.

Again, as regards books, of which nowadays there is such a bewildering number, and so many that are not worth while,—although your letters give such widely differing opinions regarding them it is evident that fathers and mothers are reading with their children, and seeking the best for them. The West-town Mothers' Council has just had a meeting on this subject.

And since the Sub-committee on literature is very active, and its Chairman, Richard C. Brown, is going presently to conduct a group conference on that subject, I need not say more about books.

A "satisfactory First-day program for adults and children" is a most suggestive topic, furnished us by one of your letters. The good old Friendly custom of making it a home-day, especially for the father to be with his children, is one we cannot afford to do without. That will be the subject of the group conference led by Elizabeth S. Pennell.

And the subject of Religious Education in the Home comprehends so much that we shall feel a deep interest in that conference, which Alfred C. Garrett will lead, in this room.

I hope you have all read an article in the last Atlantic Monthly, by Geo. Herbert Palmer, on "The Puritan Home." In many ways it reminds us of the old-time Quaker home. He dwells on its beneficent and happy features, which he thinks have been rather overlooked, but admits that the days of Puritanism are over, and that he would not wish it to be otherwise. However, he concludes: "We must re-think its problems in our own terms, and even re-mould its beautiful home-training." Is not this just what we want to do in our Quaker homes?

One of our letters, the last to be received, expresses the hope that our Conference "will be such a live and stirring one that it will wake us all up to a keener sense of our responsibilities to the coming generation." "Certainly," the writer goes on, "the present lack of religious and spiritual education is largely the cause of many of our world-evils, and I believe a great many people are coming to realize this." We could hardly have a better thought with which to open our Conference.

The company now divided into three group-conferences. One of these is described as follows:—

The subject given Alfred C. Garrett's group was "Religious Training in the Home." In introducing it he said that probably the two greatest forces were the atmosphere of the home and the example of the parents. He told us that he had discovered that other people turned to Friends with the feeling that they were the ones to conserve home life. The atmosphere will tend to religious training if the spiritual life of the parents glows with the warmth of those who commune with God. He said that the letters which had been received spoke of children as naturally religious, and that if we believe that Quakerism is a religion of life, the children will realize it. We must really believe it ourselves, for children detect insincerity more quickly than anything else. We must ourselves be God-conscious not self-conscious. Another letter spoke of the need of the simplification of our physical lives and the deepening of our spiritual lives. Alfred Garrett then suggested that we divide our discussion into three parts, considering—Morning Devotions, First-day Afternoons and Evening Prayers. We felt that the home must have a dwelling-house religion and not let the children have only a meeting-house religion. The life of the children would not rise much higher than its source, and the home must be rich in spiritual life.

Then followed a discussion of Bible reading, with the confession of several that as children they never listened to Bible reading. Still there was an atmosphere attached to its reading which was not lost. The contributing of texts, taking turns reading, reciting Psalms together, were suggestions made to help give the children definite parts in the family devotions. Calling for verses beginning with the different letters of the alphabet was a practical suggestion; also having different members to read from different versions. The sense of responsibility for children's reading in the family reading when the parents were absent was interesting. The Bible itself and not substitutes was emphasized as being the children's own choice.

There was a divergence of opinion on the best time of day for family worship. The general opinion seemed to be that morning was certainly the ideal time,—but in some families this was so hurried, and right after supper proved better.

We then turned to the question of First-day afternoon. It was felt that this should be a home day—the feeling of being and doing things together was strongly brought out. The older fashion of reading Quaker literature on First-day afternoons was very interestingly talked over. There was a need felt that more Quaker principles be taught in the home and this seemed the time for it. Children should be interested in people and stories told of the early Quakers. It was felt that we could hardly begin too soon in letting children feel that this was part of First-day afternoon, for if they got in the habit of running wild they would resent the idea later and this must be definitely guarded against. The telling of stories is always preferable to reading them.

The prayer life of little children was discussed with much interest. Some felt that a formally learned prayer gradually added to and finally replaced by the child's own prayer was best. Several such prayers to choose from were suggested, while some felt that the children should from the first realize that God was their Father to be talked to perfectly naturally and not through a set form. There was real objection expressed to the prayer: "Now I lay me down to sleep." Praying simple prayers in the child's language and gradually getting them to pray them instead had been used in one family. The real concern was that we should teach the children to feel that they might come near to God as Father. Bed-time was suggested as an especially good time to tell Bible and Quaker stories to children. Two books were suggested: "Training the Devotional Life," Weigle and Tweedy; and "The Dawn of Religion in the Mind of the Child," Edith E. R. Mumford.

The Conference on a right use of First-day covered some of the same ground, yet included more of the question of a right occupation of leisure time, and more consideration of the Meeting, the First-day School, and the family unity.

Mary R. G. Williams opened the matter in a brief paper, some extracts from which are given below.

The observance of the Sabbath is a question on which Christians differ greatly.

We cannot expect to come to the same conclusions in detail concerning the best uses of First-day, the problem assuming many forms in our various homes and localities. We probably share one difficulty—that of finding occupations that are fitted to the needs of the various ages and interests represented in a family. The unifying of the family group seems to me one of the most important points in considering the right use of First-day. All through the week the family is scattered, in work and play, from breakfast to supper and often again after supper. We are thankful to see our young people training themselves for a life of usefulness and entering at an early age the work to which God calls them; but the present insistence on the development of the individual tends to weaken family ties unless there is a double portion of love and effort to bind the group together. An hour on First-day evening in which a family draws around an open fire toasting marshmallows, with wholesome talk and a sense of deep family love and unity seems to me a well-spent hour.

I very much prefer one meeting with First-day School, both in the morning; to be attended by the family as a whole, so far as possible. It will not always be an acceptable occupation to a child to sit still for an hour, either in silence or with a sermon far above his head. But the habit of sitting still anywhere for an hour is worth something nowadays, and the habit of attending meeting should be fixed at an early age. I should take it as a matter of course, just as we expect to sit down at the breakfast table whether we are hungry or not. The familiar illness that strikes a small Friend about nine o'clock on First-day mornings becomes less frequent if the alternative to meeting is a morning in bed without companionship either of human beings or books. But we should try to see that our meetings have some story or message to the younger members. Surely a group of people with average intelligence and ability to express themselves, who are wholesome and whole-hearted Christians, are not likely to sit in total silence for the whole hour on many consecutive First-day mornings.

And now how about the rest of the long First-day? If ever there is a time when parents should use "may" and not "must" it is on First-day afternoon and evening. We cannot expect boys and girls to enjoy an afternoon nap in any form. Something wholesome and suited to a growing body and mind must be found. The children have as busy and as fully planned a week as we have, with the long school hours, the extra lessons and all their other pursuits; they look forward to First-day as a day free from engagements, when they can decide what to do as they prefer at the moment. The point is to provide possibilities of several helpful occupations from which they can make a choice. There should be a feeling that what is provided for First-day is better in quality than that of the other days in the week. I should rather aim at this method, with failure now and then, than feel I must say "don't." "Don'ts" do not make a happy day.

How can we refer to the question of amusements and occupations so that our children may have a common-sense point of view, without feeling they are better than others who see differently on the matter? How can we treat the question from the positive rather than the negative side?

First, we may emphasize service for others on this day: providing opportunities beforehand, of sufficient number to give the children and young people possibilities of a choice. Secondly, we must show by our own words and manner that a day on which we omit some attractions may still be a joyful one. To make it a festival day is not an easy matter. I should not hesitate to resort to means that seem far from spiritual: if chicken and apple pie are preferred to mutton and junket, let us have the chicken and apple pie on First-day, provided it does not make an undue amount of work for employees. Why do not we parents try to save up something interesting for that day—a new book, a new picture—anything that is wholesome and uplifting that will appeal to the tastes and interests of the young people? Why don't we speak as though we ourselves looked forward to that day with pleasure, not merely as a rest from the cares and business of the week?

We can only avoid the dreary negative Sabbath of stern morals, and the selfish Sabbath of personal pleasure by living a life of joyous, radiant, vital Christianity.

ARMISTICE DAY IN DOWNTOWN FRIENDS' SCHOOL.

In all the Yearly Meeting Schools we are making use of the general interest in the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments to give us a fresh motive for renewed efforts in our peace work. In all this work we are wonderfully helped by the Peace Committee, which generously keeps us supplied with material of immediate appeal and lasting value. Using these materials and such others as teachers and pupils can find, most schools, by some simple appropriate exercises, observed Armistice Day as a landmark on the long road toward peace on earth among men of good-will. The first report of the day's program comes from the Downtown Friends' School,—a school of twenty pupils in first, second and third year work.

For several weeks the children had been keenly interested in plans for the Washington Conference, learning what nations were to be represented, finding them on the map, learning the names of some of their leaders. They know the names of all of our delegates, and like to identify them in pictures, in magazines and papers. Just before the Conference opened they sent this letter to President Harding, and a similar one to each of our delegates:

OUR DEAR PRESIDENT HARDING:—

We are delighted with the wonderful meeting you have called. We hate war! We long for peace and good-will toward all men. We are working our hardest for you. We hope the meeting will succeed. Your loyal young Americans.

[Signed by all.]

To two of these letters came prompt replies, which added much zest to their further plans and made the Conference seem very real.

It took them some time to plan their program for Armistice Day, as day by day they added to it and modified it. Their teacher awaited with great interest their final decision, which proved to be a schedule for the whole morning. School opened with a period of devotion, followed by a little peace play written by Anna Cope Evans. With only one rehearsal the children made good speeches entering well into the spirit of Uncle Sam's dilemma when confronted by the children of his nation who need his help, he realizes that he has promised his money to war, a savage figure who comes to claim his millions. As this little dialogue-pagant took all the pupils, there was none left for audience, a fact at first a little disturbing to some; but a boy spoke up with assurance, "We don't need any audience; God sees all we are doing,—and I think Teacher Gertrude knows about it, too!"

After this there was a silent reading lesson of "Fierce Feathers" for the older group, while in another room the younger children listened to the same story read by Mildred Lee, the assistant teacher. Then came play-time with a tree climbing contest, the children feeling that their study of primitive life in which they are vitally interested, should have some place in the celebration. Did they divine a subtle connection between primitive life and a civilization that makes necessary a conference to consider how to begin to disarm? They climbed trees like squirrels, hanging from the branches by hands or knees, or lightly swinging from branch to branch.

As Friends we can well understand that there can be no adequate celebration without a special lunch,—not the usual frugal biscuit and water, but jelly sandwiches made before school by a committee of little folks, who are learning to cut thin slices and spread them neatly; and for dessert marshmallows toasted over the open fire,—one for each; for there must be no riotous living on a day of serious though joyful purpose.

A conference was then called, as nearly like the one at Washington as childish imagination could conceive. Tables were arranged like those they had seen in pictures of the coming Conference. Anna Gifford, asked to act as President Harding, gave the address of welcome as graciously as possible, and called in turn on the leader from each country. Some good speeches were made, as each had chosen some fact from the poster cards sent out by the Peace Committee. (The children found these so helpful that they used some of their school money to send a set of them to a school in Oklahoma.) The session ended with the positive, almost dramatic assertion, "Our country will never succeed if we have war. War must go! War shall go!"

From the beginning the children had had firmly in mind a service of prayer in the meeting-house; and after the conference came a twenty-minute meeting, "as alive with religious feeling and devotion as any I ever attended," says Anna Gifford. With the single exception of one very nervous little fellow, every child sat in reverent waiting. They repeated some texts they have learned and love. Little Elizabeth, who was caring for the smallest child, afterwards told her teacher that though he could not give a text, she had him "stand for God" just a minute. Prayers, appropriate, simple, sincere and reverent, were offered in childish voices. At twelve o'clock all knelt in prayer,—this, too, at the children's suggestion. What a scene for parents who, coming for their children at noon, dropped into the meeting-house in the middle of the meeting! Do we need to go back to the seventeenth or eighteenth century to find meetings of children held in the power and joy of the spirit?

"We were all very happy," says Anna Gifford, "and felt we were living in a wonderful age, and by our lives we could help make war impossible."

The spirit of the school showed again on the following First-day when at the close of meeting a communication from the Peace Committee was read, calling forth a general expression in favor of active interest in the work of disarmament. After meeting little E— ran to her teacher and whispered, "I know you were talking about the conference. I will help you."

"We are working our hardest for you," "We felt—by our lives we could help make war impossible." "I will help you." These are the simple, natural expressions of the keynote of the school—the note of mutual aid and ready helpfulness, which binds all the activities of this eager group into a rich, sweet harmony. This attitude of mind is established. Can we through the next ten or fifteen years so wisely guide them that they may carry with them into the larger field of national and international affairs this same spirit of co-operation in service?

TEACH FOR PEACE.

ANGELO PATRI.

Author of "A Schoolmaster in the Great City," Principal Public School 45, The Bronx.

We all want to live in peace. War is a frightful nightmare. We turn from it with a shudder and a prayer—"God save us from that ever again." We bury the thought of it and go as far from what suggested it as possible. We want no more war. Our children must not suffer as we have.

But then. Praying won't prevent war. Shuddering at it won't prevent it. Talking and writing about the glory of war won't prevent it.

There is one way to abolish war. It is a long, slow process, but it is the only sure one. Teach the children of the world the truth about war.

Teach them that there never was a war that could not have been prevented if the people had only known about it and made up their minds that it had to be prevented.

War never settled anything really. After each side had killed a lot of people on either side, destroyed a lot of property and the product of much hard labor, the leaders gathered about a table and talked it all over. They settled the matter. And it was the country that sent the best minds to the table that won the war.

But why, then, didn't they sit around the table in the first place? Why wait until their dead were counted in thousands, their cripples in tens of thousands, and their ruined in millions?

Because they had never been taught that ideas are mightier than any other force in the world. They still cling to their belief in the police and the army and navy making the world safe for democracy. And all the while democracy was not safe because of the idea that force ruled the world, had to rule the world.

Democracy is not built upon force. It is built upon an idea of general conduct. Force is not democratic. Force is autocratic. The moment you go to war you recognize the greatest of all autocrats—force, war—who owns you body and soul.

War is the logical outcome of our ideas of living. We think the folk who live on the other side of the mountain are different from us, and therefore dangerous. Their ways are not our ways, therefore their ways are dangerous and to be stamped out. If they will not learn to do what we think is best, we will force them to.

We teach the children the glory of war. We give them toy soldiers. We teach them war songs. We pin medals on the breast of the warrior and overlook the civil citizen who has served his brothers well at home in peace. We teach for war.

Let us now teach for peace. Let us teach that differences are not dangers; neither are they threats. Let us teach the nearness of the peoples of the earth and their common dependence. Let us tell the full truth about the wars we wage when we write about them in the school histories. Tell the children the whole unlovely truth.

Teach for ideas. Teach toward ideals for brotherly love, for knowledge, for skilled service, for construction, for democracy. Then shall we have peace and our wise men may gather about the council table and settle the differences before the battle instead of afterwards.

This generation may not hope to do so. Let us make the start for the next. Let's go.

ECONOMICS AND DIPLOMACY.

"Charles Hughes, America's Secretary of State, whose speech we have read this morning, is one of the men who is killing the old diplomacy. He and America are not shackled by the old tradition," said Hamilton Fyfe, the well-known journalist and war correspondent, whose war experiences have turned him from an imperialist into a pacifist, speaking at the Lunch Hour addresses on "Education Towards Peace" at Devonshire House, Bishopsgate, last month.

"The danger of the moment is that the diplomatists are only the speaking tubes of Foreign Offices, which work by out-of-date machinery and think in terms of politics, instead of economics. Economics is a hard word which always makes you yawn (I saw someone do it directly I mentioned it, interjected the speaker amid laughter). I do so myself. But call it 'bread and butter' and then it will become the most interesting question of all. This obsession of politics, a tradition from the days of autocratic kingship, is the reason why people are starving in Europe to-day, and this is what keeps up the fiction that nations are natural enemies instead of natural friends.

"But the new diplomacy based upon mutual interest must follow a revolution, the only one worth while, not one of barricades, but of public opinion."

PROBLEMS OF THE ORIENT FROM THE MISSIONARY POINT OF VIEW.

LLOYD BALDERSTON.

The exclusion edict was issued in 1637 and remained in force until 1853. We may say with confidence that the closing of Japan to foreign trade and influence for 216 years was due in large measure to the misguided zeal of Jesuit missionaries, eager to extend the power of the Pope and of the King of Spain. Along with this eagerness the missionaries must have had real devotion to religion as they understood it, for they were steadfast under persecution, even to martyrdom, and so were their converts. The vitality of the native church was wonderful, and Christian worship persisted in the neighborhood of Nagasaki during the whole period of isolation, so that when Roman Catholic priests came in 1858 they found a number of communities of these "old Christians."

Protestants of various denominations soon followed, with no political motives. The anti-Christian edicts were still in force, and among the most valued of missionary souvenirs are a few of the old sign-boards which used to be quite numerous in some parts of the country, denouncing severe penalties upon any who should accept the prescribed faith.

The attitude of these earlier missionaries was much the same as in India and other Oriental countries. They had little knowledge of the religious ideas of the people among whom they came nor of their philosophy of life. They were therefore obliged to make a frontal attack, and in doing so were terribly handicapped by the tradition of treachery and rebellion with which the events of two hundred and forty years before had branded the religion of the West.

All Japan was, however, deeply impressed by the power of these strange Western peoples, and the leaders, in their anxiety to learn the secret of that power, were disposed not only to experiment with Western science and other externals, but even to investigate their religion. Among the missionaries who first came to Tokio were several who were able to render valuable service to the authorities. The prestige which thus came to them aided their work, and progress was for some years relatively rapid.

Japanese national spirit developed, and after the war with China in 1894, and still more after the Russian war in 1904, a good deal of feeling was manifest to the effect that Japan is and ought to be self-sufficient. To adopt Christianity simply because it is the faith of the powerful West no longer seemed fitting. Cordiality toward missionaries on the part of those in power waned perceptibly, and strenuous efforts were made by the Government to entrench Shinto and Buddhism more strongly in the popular mind.

The mission forces were thus thrown rather completely back upon their own resources, having to fight not only the inertia of a long-established system with its numerous state-supported temples and priests, but also the more or less vocal opposition of a group of men trained in Western learning. Some of these men had formerly been Christians, and all are profoundly distrustful of the probable effects of a spread of Christianity upon the national spirit and policy of Japan.

Over against this opposition we must place some rather important allies among the writers of the present. The two most popular writers of fiction in Japan today are Tokutomi and Arishima. The latter is an A. M. of Haverford College, and a Christian. His writings give uneasiness to some of his more conservative Christian friends, but there is no doubt that on the whole their tone is such as to help on the Christian propaganda. Tokutomi is not a Christian, but the two of his stories which I have read, in translation, might be supposed to have been published as propaganda.

I think the question: "Why should we try to persuade Japan to adopt a new philosophy?" is in its proper form, for we are not simply asking Japan to join us in worshipping a God utterly different from any being their systems present; we are inviting her to accept discipleship under a Master whose precepts if they are followed will revolutionize her ideas of what life is for, and give her a new point of view in regard to all human relationships.

When Shailer Matthews was in Japan six years ago he asked a young reporter who had been sent to interview him: "What is the attitude of the people in your town toward Christianity?" The young man's answer was to this effect: "We used to be afraid that because of the teachings of the New Testament, Christians would be unwilling to fight, and that so the national defence would be endangered, but now we see that we were mistaken, since the European nations all fight bravely."

I quote this because it is one of a class of rather important ideas about Christianity current in Japan, all contributing to a fear that however well it may do for the West, it is not adapted to Japanese life and thought. These fearful ones, whatever feature of Christianity may be the cause of their fear, belong to an old, respectable and very numerous fraternity whose watchword is "Let well enough alone."

But changes are coming in Japan, whether she accepts Christianity or not. The literature of the West is widely read, and ideas are working which are certain to bring about sweeping political changes. To direct these changes so that they may tend to the real benefit of the people, Japan needs Christianity.

I shall offer two statements which at least partly answer the question why we should try to persuade Japan to accept a new philosophy. The first has often been given. I repeat it because I am thoroughly convinced of its truth. Japan has a fine ethical system, but it does not work. Confucianism, which has a stronger hold on the thinking men of Japan than any other system, has nothing behind it. It is not a religion, only an ethical code, and those who accept it feel no obligation to follow it except as suits their convenience. As for Buddhism and Shintoism, the observance of their ceremonial forms is all that most people concern themselves about. They have no effect on one's mode of life. We shall have to admit that the Oriental may fairly make the same criticism of us, basing his conclusion on the behavior of the average citizen of a Christian country. It is nevertheless true that real disciples of Christ accept him as Master, try to be followers as well as disciples, and find in him a saviour from sin. This first answer is therefore that we offer to Japan a system which works, which transforms men. The practical results of this transformation form the best propaganda at work in Japan. Christians are outstanding men and women, living epistles.

A second answer, measurably independent of the first, is that Christianity arouses in every man who really accepts it something which the old systems do not, a sense of responsibility toward God and one's fellow-men. As a parenthesis, permit me to say that this sense of responsibility is at the bottom of the whole missionary urge.

(To be concluded.)

THE CANADIAN-AMERICAN BOUNDARY LINE AND THE ANGLO-AMERICAN AGREEMENT OF 1909.

[The following extract from a speech by Sir Robert Borden, former Prime Minister of Canada and a British delegate to the Washington Conference, was distributed by him among the correspondents in Washington, after I had requested him to address them regarding the two subjects above mentioned, and after he had discoursed very earnestly, though extemporaneously, upon them.—WILLIAM I. HULL.]

There are no two nations with thousands of miles of boundary so unguarded; no nations bordering on great inland seas whose waters are so untroubled by armed navies. It is almost commonplace to speak of the disarmament agreement of 1817, but it is always timely to recall the fulfilment of the promise that it bore. It was expressed in the simplest language, not even couched in the terms of a solemn treaty, merely the exchange of notes, scraps of paper if you like; yet the record of that agreement is unstained by the blot of any violation. Its terms covered only disarmament on the Great Lakes, but its spirit has extended to the entire boundary.

A century had almost elapsed when another impressive advance was made. It was inevitable that disputes and even controversies should arise in respect of a border line of nearly 4,000 miles, much of it extending through great inland waterways, and everywhere intersected by streams rising in one country or the other, and flowing across the invisible boundary. The treaty that established the International Joint Commission ten years ago was almost as notable in its character and far reaching in its effects as the agreement of 1817. It expressed the cardinal and controlling principle of determining international questions by arbitration of a permanent tribunal. It signified the crowning of each nation's resolve that by methods of peace and justice, not by resort to brute force, should the reciprocal rights and duties of each community in such matters be adjusted and determined.

At the Conference in Washington, we can point to no prouder events than these in our common history. They carry a moral and a lesson that the statesmen there assembled may well bear in mind and take to heart. Upon the boundary from Atlantic to Pacific, the two nations laid down their arms more than a hundred years ago. The weapons then discarded have never been resumed. Can you doubt the infinite advantage? Observe the pride of the two peoples in their preparation for peace and their unpreparedness for war upon each other. Consider the hundreds, yes, thousands of millions that might have been squandered on bristling fortifications, on navies, on armaments, along that vast boundary. Bear in mind the suspicions that might have been engendered, the hostile spirit that might have arisen from the mere existence of such warlike preparations.

Is not the later lesson equally manifest? The American and Canadian nations have created a standing tribunal to which they have entrusted the determination of most important and often very difficult questions in connection with the boundary. This experiment has been a remarkable success and I believe it has developed into a permanent system. With the assent of the two Governments and the approval of your Senate the jurisdiction of the Commission may be extended to any question in dispute between our countries. The very fact that such a tribunal exists in a permanent form increases the probability that such disputed questions will be referred thereto. That which has proved of marked and unmistakable advantage to these sister nations must assuredly be for the benefit of all civilized communities. May we not in this retrospect find good omen of what may be accomplished at the great Conference that your President has summoned, and high hope that glad tidings of disarmament and of peace may be borne to a weary, waiting world?

THE problem of personality is to realize that the way of self-sacrifice is the way of true self-expression.—ERNEST E. UNWIN.

MAUDE ROBINSON.

Reprinted from The Examiner.

A red winter sun was just rising, lighting up the frozen valley of the little river Sow—every pool coated with ice, every tree and grass-blade covered deeply with rime, until they resembled white coral. On the bridge were lounging a number of men, not ill-fed, but ragged and sinister-looking, who stopped their eager conversation as a sturdy figure in rough but tidy homespun frieze clothes, and with a ruddy, open countenance, came towards them from the path by the river side. He carried a fowling-piece, and was heavily laden with three fine mallard, their metallic green heads gleaming in the sunlight, a couple of teal, and quite a bunch of snipe, tied together by their necks, with their long, pliant bills sticking out in all directions.

"Good morning to you, boys," he said, cheerily.

"Ah, Master Joe, it is yourself that always has the luck with the shootin'," said one of the men.

"It is just the morning for wild fowl. I was down at the far marsh before it was light, and have got more than we can eat at home."

He laid down his gun on the low wall and proceeded to untie his game. "Here, Dan Nolan, would not thy mistress like one of these ducks to stew up for the taste of meat for all your hungry gossoons? And thy poor brother Mike, Morgan Byrne, would he fancy a couple of snipe? They are delicate little birds for the sick, though hardly a mouthful for a hungry man."

Both offers were gladly accepted. Joe Williams tied up the remaining birds, and, turning to pick up his gun, found one of the men was handling it admiringly.

"Sure, that's a fine gun," he said.

"Ay, 'tis a good one. I saved my sixpences for many a long day before I could afford to buy it; but it has helped to clear off the plague of rabbits on our farm, and provides many a tasty meal for us."

Larry O'Neil gave it back reluctantly.

"Sure, Master Joe, 'tis too good to be wasted on rabbits entirely. 'Tis for more serious work we will be wantin' guns before many weeks if things go on as they do now. We may be comin' after it one of these days to defend our rights."

Joe Williams' honest face flushed, and he said firmly, "No gun of mine shall ever be turned against my brother men, call them what you will. Ah, Larry, there are better ways than violence to get wrongs righted, if you have patience."

"You Quakers are half Orangemen," said Larry, suspiciously.

"Nay, my friend, we take no sides in matters that lead to violence. Peace and good-will to all is our motto, as all our neighbors know well."

Joe walked on, but overheard a murmur about "a good gun," which filled him with consternation. Some months before advice had come to the Quakers of Co. Wexford, from Leinster Quarterly Meeting, to get rid of all weapons from their houses. Most had complied. Joe's father had at once thrown his ancient fowling-piece into the deepest pool of the river, but Joe, a vigorous young man of thirty, had clung to his new one. He was a remarkably good shot, and found keen delight in such expeditions as the present after wild fowl. He was popular with all parties among their few neighbors, and could not bring himself to believe in the danger of an uprising; but Larry O'Neil's words had brought conviction that Friends' fears were well founded.

It was not far to the yard of the picturesque building still known as "The Quakers' Meal" among Co. Wexford folk, but in that short space his resolve was taken. He knew he was still watched by the idle group on the bridge. Two large stones, some two feet apart, lay near the mill door. He laid the cherished fowling-piece across them, and, suddenly lifting a third heavy stone in his strong hands, he dashed it upon the gun. A crash, and the long barrel lay bent and splintered, the well-polished stock falling by the side of the stones. He picked it up sadly, and as his sister Jane appeared at the house door he said ruefully:

"Here is a bit of firewood for thee to use when these ducks are roasted, sister. We must make the most of them, for they are the last wild duck we are likely to taste."

"Oh! Joe—thy beautiful gun! What made thee change thy mind?"

"I have been hearing ugly rumors of an uprising for some time past, and out Wexford way the military have been burning houses and haggards of those whom they suspect to belong to the United Irishmen. There was a desperate look on those men at the bridge, such as I never saw among our neighbors before. Had my gun been stolen to take human life, I should never have forgiven myself."

"I am sure thou acted under Best Wisdom; but, oh! Joe, how can our poor countrymen be shown the wickedness of bloodshed to those who profess to be followers of the Prince of Peace?"

"There is strong provocation on both sides, and the Protestant clergy believe in the force of arms as much as Father Murphy, who, it is reported, is the leader among the United Irishmen in these parts. We Friends must just go on, striving to be living examples of good-will to all, and of patience under provocation."

"Well, brother, here is thy bowl of hot stir-about, for which I am sure thou art ready. As thou says, we will make the most of the wild fowl. What fine, heavy ducks they are!" said Jane, admiringly, as she carried them off to the larder.

THE UNITS AT WORK.

GERMANY.—The unbelievable has happened. Of course, it does not seem true, but facts have a habit of being very stubborn things. The other day the sum of 300 marks was handed to the Friends' Unit in Germany, a contribution in small amounts of soldiers of the French army of occupation stationed at Düsseldorf, to aid the feeding of the German children. The spirit of good-will is truly abroad in the world.

Following the summer vacation period when child-feeding reached its lowest ebb, arrangements were completed in all the German districts for the renewal and the extension of the feeding from now until next spring. With the continual rise of prices, with the depreciation of the German mark and with the continued scarcity of food products and clothing, the prospect is not an alluring one. Even with a good crop of potatoes, the prices are practically beyond the reach of the average family. The Friends' workers, however, throughout Germany are going forward with their plans in the full confidence that the American people will supply the necessities demanded.

Because of the scarcity of railroad cars, transportation has become a rather serious problem. Railroad officials, however, are assisting as far as possible, and Friends get more cars than any other agency at Hamburg. The readiness with which Friends are given preference over others is shown by the action of the harborman at Hamburg, who watches carefully for the arrival of "empties." When these arrive, after a talk with some high official, he climbs to the locomotive, where he remains until the cars are placed alongside the sheds of the Friends' warehouse.

*It is understood that there will soon be from the press a new volume of Quaker Stories by our Friend Maude Robinson.

An important statement has been given out by the President of the Shop Committee of Krupps at Essen to the effect that their 42,000 workers are engaged only in the production of peace material. He says that arms and ammunition are no longer made. Twelve officers of the Allied Military Commission are in constant supervision of the works. By their order all special machinery used in the manufacture of arms or munitions has been destroyed. Thirty thousand of the employees are organized in socialist trade unions, and not only are not inclined to make war material, but would use all means to hinder such production. This statement negatives a somewhat general impression that seems to prevail in this country.

POLAND.—About the first of last month, Florence M. Barrow, Head of the Friends' Mission, together with Oscar L. Moon, were summoned by phone to the office of the American Minister in Warsaw. They were informed that a Polish official had complained about the advertisement in American papers of a certain fund, which was regarded by Poland as political propaganda. It was a pleasure to find that the Minister had already given assurances that the Society of Friends was the least likely of all relief organizations to have anything to do with political propaganda. Our workers explained to him that the Friends had nothing to do with the advertisement in question, and the Minister replied that he would be able to reassure the Polish Foreign Office on the matter. The Friends are greatly indebted to him for handling a difficult matter so tactfully.

The Unit reports that the need for clothing in Poland continues very great, and expresses the hope that further contributions may be quickly forthcoming. Cases of yarn are acceptable and will work in well with the industrial program. Second-hand clothing can be used, but Friends should bear in mind that it should be put in good condition before sending. Strong shoes are also in demand.

FROM THE Boston Transcript REPORT OF ANNA HAINES'S ADDRESS IN OLD SOUTH CHURCH.

"When Miss Haines finished there was no applause. Applause would have been out of place after her recital of facts. Dr. Charles W. Eliot, after a moment, said: 'This picture is one of the most horrible. Was there ever a more horrible one in any age of the world? We have heard a witness of the most potent sort, a witness who can speak the language. Can any appeal be stronger to us prosperous Americans? We have gathered to hear of a very noble, a very Christian work which is being undertaken by Quakers, who operate in a manner peculiarly their own.'

"Dr. Richard Cabot then said: 'I wonder if you feel as overwhelmed as I do! Have I a right to eat my dinner to-night? It is not a question of what you ought to give; it is a question of whether you have the right to do anything else. I understand that we do not help the Bolsheviks by giving. Personally, I would give whether it helped the Bolsheviks or anyone else or not.'

"In answer to a question, Miss Haines said that one of the best means of helping the famine-stricken peasants would be by having the United States Government undertake this work. 'There are 5,000,000,000 bushels of surplus grain in the Middle West,' she continued; 'there are ships lying idle at their docks.'

RAGS IN POLAND.

Stephen Leacock has written a story in which he describes the luke-warm pleasure of a child when he discovers that all his Christmas presents are warm clothing, a tooth-brush, a nail-brush and shoes. Certainly an ordinary child prefers a toy to a warm coat as a present, unless he happens to live in a cold country and possesses only a shirt made of an old sack. Perhaps such a child would welcome the coat.

Unhappily in Poland there are many children whose fingers will be too cold and whose minds will be too dull to play with a toy when Christmas comes. There is a terrible shortage of clothes in the devastated areas. Many children are in rags, with no chance of getting warmer clothes unless help is given.

Very few of the children, also, have shoes. Some have one shoe, some have bits of leather, some have simply a shoe-lace. For the rest, they either go barefoot or wear bits of cloth tied around their feet, but often there is not even enough cloth to spare for such purpose, as every available inch is wanted for shirts and coats. Then the child runs barefoot.

Christmas is not going to be a very pleasant time for these barefoot, thinly clad, underfed children. A very little sum of money would give warmth to one shivering creature and make Christmas a happier time for one small child.

Christmas is the festival of the children, the festival of toys, of laughter, of warmth; but in Poland they do not want toys, and they have very few reasons for laughter—but at least give them a little warmth. It is a small thing to give. It is a small thing to give the used clothes, yet it is desperately important.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

DISARMAMENT TO DATE.

The following is a statement of the work of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in the interest of disarmament for the past seven months.

1. Period of Work.—Fourth Month 1, 1921, to Eleventh Month 1, 1921.

2. Organization.—Disarmament Sub-Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting Peace Committee, Fourth Month 19, 1921. Ten names added to above after general conference of eighty Friends, Fourth Month 19, 1921. Five Friends chosen Ninth Month 19, 1921, for Friends' Disarmament Council.

3. Secretaries.—Richard R. Wood, Sixth Month 19, 1921, to Ninth Month 19, 1921; Anne Walton Pennell, Tenth Month 19, 1921, to Eleventh Month 19, 1921; Esther M. Smith, Eleventh Month 19, 1921, to —.

4. Publicity.—(1) Posters.—Large posters, 28x42 inches, placed in the forty-four Philadelphia subway stations—five posters used over period of seven months—two issued since. Small posters—six smaller posters circulated in schools, etc. Card posters—More than 150 sets of the beautiful picture posters containing 20 cards each purchased from Disarmament Education Committee and circulated.

(2) Fairs.—Booths or floor space at Byberry and West Chester, Pa., Trenton and Mt. Holly, N. J., and Wilmington, Del. Literature also distributed at Negro Business Men's Show, Commercial Museum, Philadelphia.

(3) Newspaper publicity, bulletins, etc..—Member of Peace Committee on his own initiative prepared a leaflet and circularized 450 daily and weekly newspapers on the Pacific Coast. Disarmament Notes.—Brief news service issued periodically and sent to 300 Friends. Recently requested to be sent to all the ministers of the 23rd ward, Philadelphia.

(4) Movies.—Movie reel prepared and used.

5. Literature.—(1) Books.—Clipping service of newspapers and magazines with library of all recent books and pamphlets on Disarmament at No. 304 Arch Street. "The Next War," by Will Irwin—700 copies of book distributed to Friends' schools, public libraries, clergy, individuals.

(2) Leaflets.—100,000 fliers issued and circulated; 100,000 leaflets and reprints circulated to Y. M.

- C. A., Y. W. C. A., W. C. T. U., fairs, individuals, etc.
- (3) Weekly articles to THE FRIEND, Philadelphia.
- (4) Ads. in New Republic brought in scores of literature requests.
6. Educational work—(1) Essay prizes in contest of 100 children in Friends' schools.
- (2) Five thousand copies of reprint from Dr. Kilpatrick "Our School and War" address at Friends' Select School, Philadelphia—4,000 of these sent to public schools of New Jersey, Maryland, Delaware and Pennsylvania.
7. Meetings—(1) Crowded meeting held this summer at Newport, R. I., at which Will Irwin spoke to many Navy men and others.
- (2) Esther Morton Smith is arranging to be present and speak at each of our thirty Monthly Meetings.
- (3) Mass meetings have been and are being held in nearly all towns and cities where our Friends reside, largely through the concern of members of both branches of Friends and interested citizens of other churches.
8. Conference—Within the next two weeks a conference of all active local workers will be held in Philadelphia at which reports of work done will be presented and an intensive campaign planned.

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

IV.

The fourth week of the Conference has been made rather sensational by newspaper reports that President Harding was planning to propose to the Conference the creation of an "Association of Nations." These reports have been variously interpreted to mean that the American Government was planning to join the League of Nations, either by the front door or by a back door or side door, or that it was proposing to create a rival to the League of Nations which would cause that organization to go out of existence. These reports naturally excited strong emotion among both the bitter enemies and the ardent partisans of the League of Nations.

I was present at both of the interviews in which the President referred to the continuation of the work of the present conference, and gained not the slightest impression that he would propose anything different from what he referred to during the Presidential campaign and in his inaugural address. It can be stated, "on the highest authority,"—as the newspaper correspondents say,—that the present administration has not suggested, and will not suggest, that the United States should enter the existing League of Nations by any door whatever. On the other hand, it appears highly probable that the United States will continue to participate in future international conferences and in various forms of international co-operation. It appears probable, also, that future conferences will include Germany and Russia, and indeed all of the world's sovereign states, thus reviving the precedent set at The Hague in 1899 and 1907. It is greatly to be hoped, also, that among the forms of international co-operation in which the United States will participate, will be the new International Court which is to be inaugurated at The Hague in Second Month, 1922.

This court was planned by an international committee which met at The Hague in the summer of 1920, and was adopted by the Assembly of the League of Nations. Among its judges is one American; and it is possible, according to Elihu Root, who participated largely in planning the court, for the United States to adopt it without becoming a member of the League of Nations. When America does adopt it, it is greatly to be hoped that an effort will be made to restore to it a feature of fundamental importance which the Council of the League of Nations cut out of the plan as proposed by the Hague Committee; this feature is the proviso that either party to a dispute shall have the right of bringing the case before the court, instead of being obliged to wait until the assent of the other party can be secured. The decisions of the court are not to be enforced by economic or military coercion, but they are to rest, like those of the existing Hague Court of Arbitration, upon the honor, the enlightened self-interest and the sense of justice of the nations, and upon the organized public opinion of the world.

There is an intimate connection between the International Court and the reduction and limitation of armaments; for, unless a curb is placed on the size and use of national armaments, no international court or other peaceful means of settling disputes can possibly meet with complete success. For this reason, and for others, it is unfortunate that a tendency has developed in certain circles during the past week to magnify the importance of developing an Association of Nations or of entering the League of Nations, and to minimize the importance of the reduction and limitation of armaments. The fundamental importance of the American proposition to reduce and limit naval armaments grows steadily in the popular mind, and will continue to do so in the perspective of history. If the Washington Conference can succeed in adopting it and putting it into practice, it will rank in that illustrious but tragically small company which includes the Quaker Disarmament in Colonial Pennsylvania, the Disarmament of 1818 between the United States and Canada, and the Argentine-Chile naval holiday and land demobilization of 1902, which is commemorated by "The Christ of the Andes."

The large reduction in the number of capital ships and the restriction on their size, which is part of the American proposal, is a very great step in itself; but beyond this, is the proposal for a naval holiday of ten years; and beyond this, is the effort to make impossible the waging of offensive naval war. Whatever may be true of aviation and submarines in the future, the chief reliance in naval warfare at present is the capital ship. It is the chief reliance not only in battle, but also to convoy transports of troops and supplies, to enforce blockades, to serve as base for hydroplanes, and to carry to the minds of other peoples a sense of the might and power of the country whose flag it bears. To strike at it, then, is to strike at the chief naval weapon, and at one of the chief material and psychological incitements to modern war.

Secretary Hughes evidently divides armaments into three classes—namely, those used for offensive war, those used for coercion (as proposed in the Covenant of the League of Nations), and those used in defense; and he hopes through his proposal to curb offensive war. Friends, of course, find it impossible to detect any logical line of division between the three classes, and they will continue to work for the abolition of all three. But meanwhile they can heartily rejoice in the taking of what Secretary Hughes himself calls "the first great step."

This step has not yet been fully decided upon, for the Japanese have not yet agreed to the ratio of 5:5:3, but the American and British delegations are still quite confident that the ratio will be adopted. Italy desires a navy as large as that of France, but would be pleased to have both of them put on a small scale. Italy also greatly desires the reduction and limitation of land armies, but will not take the initiative in proposing it, preferring to leave the initiative to the United States, whose lead—her spokesman said this afternoon,—Italy will gladly follow. The British spokesman in an interview yesterday, pointed out the difficulty of an attempt by the Washington Conference to settle the land armament question, in view of the absence from it of Russia, Poland and the other European states, with large armies. Premier Briand's refusal, on behalf of France, to consider reducing its army placed another, perhaps insuperable, obstacle in the path of the Conference along this line. Although the American Delegation still asserts that the question is not yet ruled out of the Conference, it is with great regret that I must express the fear that this part of the disarmament programme will be deferred until the meeting of that much-to-be-desired future conference.

The questions of naval bases in the Pacific, of submarines, poisonous gases, warfare in and from the air, and those associated with China, are still under consideration in committees. None of China's problems, according to statements this afternoon by Minister Hanihara of Japan, and Wellington Koo of China, are yet settled. The fate of Shantung, Manchuria and the Mongolias; the four-power consortium; Japan's "twenty-one demands"; the Anglo-Japanese Alliance; foreign troops, foreign "spheres of influence," and foreign extraterritoriality in China; China's control of her tariff duties and of her post-offices; these are the problems of the Far East which have emerged into animated discussion, but not yet into definite agreement.

There is a conviction in Conference circles that the naval ratio of 5: 3 will be agreed upon first, before the questions of the Pacific and the Far East are definitely answered; and in regard to agreement upon the ratio, Arthur J. Balfour, Secretary Hughes and President Harding all expressed entire confidence to-day. When asked about the Japanese naval experts' demand for a ratio of 10: 10: 7, Arthur Balfour sententiously remarked that while experts have important duties to perform, it is no part of their duty to dictate to statesmen. As against Admiral Rogers' fear that the naval holiday of ten years would cause much unemployment in American ship-yards, President Harding expressed the opinion that such unemployment would not be serious. In congratulating the newspaper correspondents on their work for the Conference, the President said: "You have contributed to the creation of a sentiment in favor of the Conference on the part of the American people, the revelation of which is unparalleled in the history of the Republic."

WILLIAM I. HULL.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Twelfth Month 3, 1921.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

THE American Friend notes that the funeral of Mary Ann Coffin and her grandson, Samuel T. Coffin, took place at Whittier, Cal., on Eleventh Month 10th. Mary Ann Coffin lately completed a century of life as noted at the time in THE FRIEND. Samuel T. Coffin was in his seventeenth year. He was a member of the student body at Westtown School last year and returned home on account of an attack of tonsillitis. Serious complications ensued and eventually caused his death.

WITH the title "To-day's Opportunity," the sixteen-page report of Northern [English] Friends' Peace Board records "with thankfulness the achievement of another year's service." Conferences, lectures, posters and literature have kept the subject of disarmament before responsive audiences in many centres. Alexander C. Wilson of Manchester is the Chairman.

BURLINGTON AND BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING.—The Quarterly Meeting was held at the appointed time, a fairly good muster of Friends assembling, in spite of the somewhat inclement weather. The meeting soon settled down in a deeply reverential silence, broken finally by the voice of supplication, that those engaged to wait upon the Most High might feel afresh the touch of His finger upon their hearts and lives. We were then addressed by William Littleboy, of Birmingham, England. He pleaded for an individual exercise in our meetings, as companies are made up of individuals, and the state of each unit affects the whole; that we should expect to meet with God whenever we assemble; that we should not be surprised if something Divine happened in the meeting; that we should have "faith"—that is, be ready and open for God; that all comers to God were welcomed, no matter from what point of the compass they approach Him through the ever-open gates of the New Jerusalem.

Further communications followed from James M. Moon, William Bishop and Max I. Reich. The solemnized meeting closed with a brief expression of adoration, and very precious covering of the wing of the spiritual Presence in which we had come together.

The calm of the sanctuary overflowed into the business meeting following. Friends were favored to transact the business of the church in the love and peaceable spirit of Jesus, in which spirit the Quarterly Meeting finally broke up to meet again in Second Month next.

R.

THE following was sent by our Friends of Fairhope, Ala., to President Harding and to our four representatives in the Washington Conference:—
ESTEEMED FRIEND:—

We desire to encourage all right efforts in favor of universal disarmament. We rejoice in the belief that it has pleased God to visit the nations of the earth in this twentieth century with a good degree of the enlightening influence of His Spirit, to lead them to a right understanding of truth and righteousness in this our day, and we believe if this great nation for which we have so much love and regard continues to move under a right influence that the day may soon dawn when "Nations will learn war no more" as taught by Christ, the Prince of Peace. So that "On earth Peace and Goodwill to men" may more and more be realized in this our beloved country and elsewhere.

In love we remain thy friends. By direction of "Fairhope Monthly Meeting" of the Religious Society of Friends, held Eleventh Month 16, 1921.

THE Friend (London) reports another centenary Friend. He is John Harlock of Banbury. His one hundredth birthday was celebrated Eleventh Month 1st in the meeting-house. This comment is made:—

"It was indeed a memorable occasion, a picture that will not easily be forgotten.—John Harlock sitting in his chair just below the gallery, his silvery hair and fine profile illumined by the row of candles above; the faces of Friends, familiar, yet somehow changed and softened by the flickering lights and shadows, and pervading all, the sense of other presences, those who have come and gone in our dear old Friend's long life, and in the life of our meeting, and the country town."

NOTICES.

Two meetings of Friends' Educational Association will be held at Friends' Select School, Seventh-day, Twelfth Month 10th. The morning meeting at 10.30 will take the form of a Special Conference on English, to which English teachers of all the Philadelphia schools are invited.

Dallas Lore Sharp, Professor of English at Boston University, will speak on the subject of Thoughtless Composition. James Hugh Moffatt, Head of the English Department, Philadelphia Central High, will present a summary of the conclusions reached from their recent investigation into the teaching of English Grammar in the High School.

The general meeting will be held at 2.15 P. M. Professor Dallas Lore Sharp will give the address, with the subject "The Lost Pot and Prophet."

Lunch will be provided at fifty cents per person to all who notify Walter W. Haviland, 140 N. Sixteenth Street, on or before the 9th.

BARCLAY JONES.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL LECTURES.—The alumni and friends of the School are invited to hear William Lyon Phelps, Professor of English Literature in Yale University, in a lecture before the School on "What There Really is in the Bible for Boys and Girls," Sixth-day, Twelfth Month 16th, at 1 P. M.

For the evening of the same day a general invitation is extended to all interested to hear President William Wistar Comfort of Haverford College deliver his lecture on "Dante," in commemoration of the six hundredth anniversary of the great Italian poet's birth.

DIED.—At Cambridge, Mass., on Eleventh Month 7, 1921, LAURA V. BAILEY, daughter of the late George and Anna Valentine Bailey, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

—, on the sixteenth of Eighth Month, 1921, JAMES A. MCGHEE, in his seventy-seventh year; a member of Springfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, Iowa.

CARE IN INSURANCE

The Provident was founded in 1865 by a group of Friends for the purpose of protecting the estates and insuring the lives of members of the Society of Friends.

Later the services of this Company were offered to other people who were known to be of careful habits. A careful company insures only those people who are good moral as well as health risks. This results in a low death-rate, which is one of the elements of low cost of insurance. Care is important—in insurance as well as in other things.

"There is in our hearts a strange assurance that the future is greater than all the past. That the time is almost fulfilled,—the time of sorrow and the night of war. We stand on the brink of the dawn, and God is with us—God is with us and He asks for our lives. No more, no less. He could use them in the dawning day."—Edith Stratton Platt.

THE GIFT.

It seems to us singularly appropriate that Christmas should fall on First-day. We wish that it might always be celebrated on that day. Once it was the custom for everyone to spend a part of the day in worship so that it became an extra Sabbath. But now the children are so thrilled over their stockings full of knobby parcels and the grown-ups so busy over the clutter of papers and ribbon and trying to make Mary eat a little breakfast or she'll be sick with excitement, that the fact that we are celebrating the birthday of the Christ child is lost sight of.

We give gifts once a year—Christ gave His life and never looked for thanks. We set aside one day for the purpose of making our friends happy—Christ lived every day for enemies as well as friends. We grumble at the cost and wonder where we can retrench—Christ faced the bill with His Father one evening in a garden and never faltered in His determination to give to the uttermost.

We ought to approach our Christmas-Sabbath with a new impulse to give. We have no better offering than the gift of ourselves to Christ.

INTERNATIONALISM.

Young Friends often fail to appreciate missionaries. We are too often frightened off by our own mental picture of a Calvinistic Puritan who always carries a Bible under one arm and never mentions God without glancing his eyes upward. A lean, leathery man in a long shabby coat who has lived to return because the cannibals found him too tough to eat. One who went out with a crusading ideal of raising the "benighted heathen," who, he felt, was otherwise condemned to eternal roasting, to the elevated bliss of our materialistic civilization. One who would talk to neither heathen nor Christian on any unreligious subject, and who would be truly happy only when discussing the Nature of God and the deserts of the wicked who knew Him not. A very zealot who would go a thousand miles to bring a soul to God, but who could not see the heathen in his own backyard because his was a Christian country.

Perhaps such a type of missionary did once exist, when the Puritans hunted witches, but to-day this kind is fast dying out.

To-day, missionaries are very much like other people, and all of them may be roughly divided into two groups: the broad and the narrow. It does not matter whether a member of the narrow group is located in Tokio, Philadelphia, Omsk or Calcutta. Wherever he is, he cannot see beyond the local horizon. Such people, when they happen to be missionaries, and as such come home on furlough, give us a tale of horror about the need in their district. They say, and believe, that it is greater than anywhere else, because they cannot see the needs of any place else. This naturally stirs up a feeling of opposition in the other local-visioned people who are located at home, and this opposition becomes an antipathy for missions. Thus the local-visioned missionary often does the larger aspect of his cause a great injury by his unregulated zeal for his locality.

The other type, which stands out in strong contrast to both of the foregoing, is also found both at home and abroad. This kind of person is not limited in his vision to his immediate surroundings. His horizon does not coincide with his back fence. Instead, he has a vision of the world as a whole, and realizes that he is working for or against the welfare of that whole wherever he is. His attitude is that of the Service Committee. At a recent meeting, representatives of the various fields were presenting the needs of their territories, and one person in reporting said, "we do not want to compare our need with that of the other fields." They realize that the work is a whole as the need is a whole. Although one field may have a more urgent need for immediate relief, the problem is a whole. This is an attitude of Internationalism.

A missionary possessed of this spirit cannot urge his hearers to patronize the work of his district alone, nor can he urge young people to be missionaries to any one locality. Instead, he sees that all he can ask for is that more lives be given up to service. If he can get men to dedicate themselves to working for the welfare of the world he is satisfied.

Men with this ideal are missionaries wherever they are. They may even be foreign missionaries at home. Their interest in affairs on a world scale will cause them to keep informed about them, and their sense of being a part of a great whole will cause them to come in contact with the foreigners in their locality. Perhaps it is the lack of this attitude in the past that has made possible the complaints, that have recently been well circulated, of certain Chinese students who had been seven years at our great universities and had returned home without ever being invited into a Christian home in that time.

This Spirit of Internationalism is absolutely fundamental to Peace. During the past two centuries, missionaries were sent out nationally and became the vanguard, behind which the nations advanced to the conquest of the backward nations. A missionary with the International Spirit, as so many are to-day, would prove a poor accomplice in this game. But for Peace, it is even more important that the International Spirit pervade the home countries. We have often heard that there was a lie at the bottom of every war. The genial Charles Lamb was walking one day with a friend, when he pointed to a man across the street, and said, "I hate that man!" "Why, that's Lord Burleigh," said his friend, "Do you know him at all?" "No," Charles Lamb replied, "if I knew him it would be impossible for me to hate him." And so it is with nations. The more we know of a nation, of its problems and its excellencies, the more we appreciate its contribution to the world and know its people personally, the more impossible it is for us to hate them.

This spirit is deeply fundamental. It may go below our already formed conceptions even of Christianity, but is it not in direct accord with the great search for Truth which inspired early Friends?

ACCEPTED IN PRINCIPLE.

Great Britain's delegation to the Washington Peace Conference has done at least one good thing. They have given us a new and convenient slogan for an everyday activity. The slogan, "Accepted in principle," applies altogether too easily to our daily lives. How simple it will be now, if we have to decide on a delicate point, to accept it in principle. Is not this what we have virtually done in such cases as the condemnation of Idealists? We say their theories are "all very fine, but they won't work," "they aren't practical." This is a very transparent example, but do we not use this subterfuge constantly? Do we not use it even unconsciously? Has it not become a subtle method of avoiding any duty which it might prove inconvenient to perform. For instance, we accept the principle of democracy of worship, yet how often do we sit back and watch the galleries?

If, then, we accept the principle of a thing and feel satisfied that if the execution of it seems likely to prove inconvenient, do we really believe in that principle? In other words, What do we really believe?

Maeterlinck says, in one of his essays, that no one really believes a principle or a truth until he has so absorbed it and made it a part of himself that he can never thereafter avoid being influenced by it. If this is so we will of necessity act on our beliefs and we may then say that we believe that on which we act. This seems in full accord with the words of Jesus, "By their fruits, ye shall know them," and those of Paul, "Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel." By this, if a man accepted the principle that love of men and not love of possessions should guide the actions of men, and then slept with a revolver under his pillow after bolting the doors and windows, would he not be trying to bow himself gracefully out of an embarrassing situation without changing his belief?

MISERY AT HOME.

So often and so forcibly are the acute needs of Europe crowded upon our attention that we inevitably grow blind to the pressing sufferings on our own door-step. Somehow it seems infinitely easier to visualize and relieve the suffering in Vienna than to picture and aid the misery that exists in America at the very moment I write and you read these lines.

The visit of Dr. Lorenz was like a dash of cold water.

Dr. Lorenz is a famous Austrian orthopedic surgeon who has come to the United States for the first time since the war. As an Austrian he should be particularly well posted on the diseases of the joints. We read, with surprise, his casual comment voiced at the end of his first "gratitude" clinic held at New York, that "never in all his career had he been affected as he was by the sight of so many hundreds of maimed, distorted humans clamoring for his aid, and never had he seen a land so sorely in need of relief from spinal and other troubles super-induced by infantile paralysis."

Such observations are hard for us to understand if it were not for the tragic incidents which transpired in the New York Hospital for Joint Diseases. The account says, "After working feverishly for more than five hours Dr. Lorenz had seen one hundred and twenty-five cripples—scarcely one-tenth of the supplicants for aid who crowded the hospital and the streets outside, coming on crutches, in wheel chairs, and some of the more fortunate in automobiles."

It takes such things as this to drill actual conditions into our case-hardened sympathies. In fact it is almost impossible for us to realize the truth,—namely, that there are ten to fifteen times as many such sufferers in the United States as in any other country in the world.

Dr. Lorenz is seriously considering quitting the Viennese children in order to devote the remainder of his days alleviating America's cripples. A bit of news which might completely reverse the signals of giving if it were not for the sad fact that needs far out-strip relief in all lands.

H. W. E.

FREEDOM OF CONTRACT.

One of the fundamental conceptions of American law is "freedom of contract." With the exception of such prohibitions as that against contracts in restraint of trade, which are intended to protect third persons not parties to the contract, one may practically make any contract which one pleases to make and must fulfill it or pay damages resulting from its breach.

Fundamentally this principle must have been based upon the idea that the two parties to the contract were upon an equal footing as regards the bargain. For there cannot be freedom except between equals. Only two things are regarded by our courts as destroying this equality: actual fraud by one party, and actual physical violence or the threat of violence by one party to the contract. And if the party defrauded after the fraud, or the party threatened by violence when the actual physical danger has been removed, endeavors to carry out the contract or does anything confirming it, he is thereby debarred from later pleading the fraud or violence as an excuse for not performing.

Any attempt to have recognized that economic pressure prevents freedom of contract, just as physical violence does, is met with a storm of protest in the name of this same "freedom of contract." Apparently the fact that there may only be freedom between equals is lost sight of entirely.

It is therefore somewhat of a shock to one familiar with the American attitude on this subject to find a country which recognizes in its law the unequalizing effect of economic pressure and comparative inexperience, without giving any indication of that absolute breakdown of industrial and commercial life which upholders of our sacred "freedom of contract" prophesy as the result of such recognition. There is in the law of Germany just this recognition. It is a remnant of the ancient Germanic law, which has been preserved till now, and which our Teutonic ancestors no doubt lost upon coming in contact with the Latinized inhabitants of Great Britain.

Section 138 of the German Civil Code (Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch) provides:—

"A contract which offends good morals is void. In particular a contract is void through which one, by taking advantage of the necessity, carelessness or inexperience of another, obtains for himself or for a third person, pecuniary advantages, or the promise thereof, which so exceed the value of the consideration, that under the circumstances the advantages are greatly out of proportion to the consideration."*

Here we have the recognition that economic pressure or comparative inexperience as well as fraud and physical violence may give to one party to a contract an unfair advantage.

This rule, however, is not allowed to be a loop-hole through which every one who makes a bad bargain may escape. One of the three things which give one party an unfair advantage must be present when the contract is made. Good faith on the part of the party claiming the benefit of the rule must be shown. Where economic necessity is the compelling factor the contract must be such as might reasonably be possible of execution. The contracting party must do everything within his power to complete the contract according to its terms. If he does all he can and nevertheless fails, he is not liable for breach of contract and may recover a fair compensation for what he has done. He may not substitute something inferior to that contracted for.

Thus we have in this modern commercial world of laissez faire and the devil-take-the-hindmost, a survival of the long-forgotten days when the chief and law-giver of the tribe was the protector of the weak from the strong, and when persons were on a par, at least, with property.

This remnant of the ancient social-ethical Germanic law is of interest, however, not merely from the legal standpoint, but as giving some clue to the psychology of the Germans which has to us seemed at times unexplainable. It has seemed to us that they have agreed to terms and conditions under threat of force, and when the immediate danger has been removed have hedged, claiming the terms unfulfillable. We have had but two explanations for these actions. Either the Germans were sincere when they agreed to the terms, thus admitting that they could be carried out, in which case subsequent assertions to the contrary must be insincere attempts to avoid hard conditions; or the Germans were not sincere in agreeing, but accepted the terms because they were too cowardly to stand by their conviction that they were impossible of fulfillment for fear of the consequences, or were hoping by repeatedly agreeing and refusing to wear out the Allies. In either case our reply has quite naturally been another threat of force. Neither attitude would meet with any sympathy from us, though even the most military of us were loath so to condemn a whole nation.

The knowledge of this rule of law, however, puts quite a different light on the matter. One whose whole theory of contract was permeated by the idea that one who enters into a contract under economic pressure or threat of physical violence has done all that may lawfully and rightfully be asked of him, if he does his best to fulfil the terms, could quite sincerely agree under extreme pressure to terms the possibility of performing which was very slight, and equally sincerely claim to be relieved because of the impossibility of performance, particularly when the difficulty of performance had been increased by not inevitable conditions. Such has been the position of the rank and file in Germany during the past three years. Under threat of starvation by blockade or armed invasion they have agreed to terms about the possibility of fulfilling which economic experts have disagreed. For their part they have done and endured more or less cheerfully the burdens imposed upon them thereby. They have in good faith believed the assurances of their government that it was doing its best to fulfil the terms. They have endured the privations of a long general strike rather than allow the overthrow of the government by a militaristic group, which would in all probability have repudiated the peace treaty.

It has seemed to them that they have done all that could be lawfully and morally asked of them. That the only response to their efforts has been further demands, further invasion, further taking away of territory they have been unable to understand. That the French should so behave might be explainable to them. Fear and hate drive the most reasonable men mad. But that the English and Americans should acquiesce is too much for them. They cannot understand our attitude any more than we do theirs. As a result they are more and more losing faith in the good-will of other nations, and the militaristic nationalistic group, though yet small, is slowly gaining ground, daily acquiring new illustrations to support its thesis that the only way to deal with another nation is with the mailed fist.

A single section of law is of course not enough to explain the whole psychological background of a nation. When, however, it touches so closely the daily business relations, contains such far-reaching ethical principles, it cannot help but have a great effect upon the nation's thinking and its viewpoint, and it gives us the hint that it is in such matters of mental environment rather than in differences in moral attitude that one finds the basis for differences in thought and action of nations.

ERNEST N. VOTAW.

QUAKER EMBASSIES.

The Quaker Embassy idea came into being when the work of the Friends' Reconstruction Unit in France drew to a close in 1919, and it was realized that in a few months the hundreds of workers with all their busy activity would have withdrawn, and there would remain in France little trace of Friends' work except the material results of the labor of their hands. This is a broad statement of course. Only the most negative personality can withdraw from any community leaving no trace except the material work of his hands, and the Unit in France had numbered a thousand or more eager, inspired young Friends, burning with an enthusiasm for constructive good-will, as warm and intense as the enthusiasm which inspired the soldiers. Yet living as they did in groups and mostly meeting the French people only in a business way, their contacts had been comparatively slight, and the conditions of censorship and martial law had strictly prevented their communicating to others outside the group the ideals which caused them to be in France. Was this testimony of potent, constructive international good-will to close without making itself intelligible to the French people? Was the Société des Amis to withdraw from among those for whom it had done so much in a physical way, leaving no impression upon the spiritual life of the country, no adequate conception of its real spiritual message?

In the feeling that this must not happen, the idea of Quaker outposts had its inception. It owes much of its subsequent development to Carl Heath. A Friend by conviction, he was particularly anxious that the Society should carry its message into the Christian countries of the continent of Europe.

The great relief work which has since been carried on in Germany and Austria, Syria and Serbia, Poland and Russia, was then almost unthought of. It has greatly extended the possibilities of the Quaker outpost.

What is the Quaker outpost? A missionary station or a relief agency? Strictly speaking, it is neither. Intended to help people who may or may not be members of some Christian church, to understand, to accept if they will, the broad fundamentals of the Society of Friends, it may be said more closely to resemble a mission station. It is primarily concerned, however, with the teaching of Friendliness, and the creation of international friendship; it does not bend its activities toward securing members for the Society of Friends, or building up a Quaker church. In the course of events, there will doubtless grow up Friends' meetings around each embassy. But the main object of the embassy is to touch and influence the intellectual and spiritual life of the country in which it is at work.

Already embassy work is being carried on actively in France and Vienna, and to a certain extent by the Message Committee of English Friends in Germany. English Friends have taken the leadership in all this activity, and they have principally supplied the workers and funds.

In France, one of the largest rooms at the Hotel Britannique, where the French Mission formerly had its headquarters, has been transformed into a reading-room and library. Mark Hayler is permanent secretary. French people and other foreigners in Paris are invited to make use of the reading-room and the books in the library. Every First-day there is a meeting for worship, and on one evening each week a general meeting for discussion of topics of interest in public affairs or religious life. One important conference has been held between those whom the embassy has touched and visiting Friends.

In Germany, several pamphlets have been issued for distribution, and there is a loaning library of Quaker books. Friends' meetings have sprung up in several sections of the Reich, and two or three very valuable conferences of visiting Friends and Germans interested in the ideals of Quakerism have been held. The work in Vienna has been similar in scope. In each country, the work of the Quaker outpost is varied to meet the peculiar conditions of that country. In Poland a start has been made in Quaker outpost work, by the distribution of one or two pamphlets in Polish and inviting Poles to attend First-day meeting. The return of one of the former Mission members to work in Warsaw will give a nucleus for an outpost.

The Quaker outpost movement seemingly has not aroused widespread interest or great enthusiasm among Friends. It savors of missionary effort, without the added attraction of most mission posts of working among non-Christian peoples. Its activities and its achievements are in the intangible and only partially explored realm of human ideals and human relations, but in less than two years it has made its mark in three countries. Its future success depends upon two things: the personalities of those who feel called to go out in the work, and the interest taken in their work by those who stay at home. Perhaps these may be reduced to one integral element necessary to the success of the Quaker outpost movement, that is, a conviction among Friends that Quakerism has something to contribute to the development of religion in Christian as well as non-Christian nations, something which will do away with hatred and fear, substituting in their stead love and good-will, a conviction that shall stimulate them to share this something with the whole world.

JAMES A. NORTON.

EXTRACTS FROM A LETTER RECEIVED BY ALBERT J. CROSFIELD FROM HENRY T. HODGKIN.

PEKING, Sixth Month 23, 1921.

The main thing that I wanted to write you about to-day was the opening for the work of Friends in this city. I should like to put together some of the impressions that I have gained, and I wish I could help Friends to realize what it might mean for the future of China to have a really strong embassy out here for the next few years. Perhaps I can make the matter most clear by classifying my thoughts under a few heads, although they run into one another at many points.

The New Thought Movement in China is the outstanding fact in the situation here. Some of the leaders are definitely interested in the Quaker point of view. Broadly speaking, they are not at all attracted by official Christianity, as they have seen it, especially in America, where most of them have been educated. The whole trend of the movement is towards the challenge to authority and the freedom of thought that finds a congenial soil in Quakerism but not in more formal and credal expressions of the Christian faith. I feel sure that, if there were a Friends' meeting here, a considerable number of the students affected by this movement (and nearly all are so affected) would find their way to it, and that several of the leaders would also find it the one form of religious exercise that they could enter into. In fact, I think that a strong Friends' Meeting with one or two outstanding men and women in it might be the means, under the blessing of God, for the winning of this whole movement to a positive Christian faith. I do not think that there is any force here in Peking that can begin to compare, for this end, with the power that such a meeting would be.

All the more earnest-minded men in China to-day are deeply concerned with the militaristic trend in the life of China, and they find it very difficult to see a way out. Many who are not Christians are well able to see that this development is not the true expression of China's best life, but they see no way by which they can stem the tide. Even in regard to the problem of relations with Japan which is where the shoe pinches, I find that men are ready to consider the Quaker point of view. But who is there to put it? They scarcely know that such a thing exists, and our visit is like a drop in the ocean. There is any amount of work that Friends are the very people to do along this line, and there would be no difficulty about getting an entry into all kinds of circles, and reaching the men who are shaping the policy of China in public affairs as well as in the world of thought. To talk to these men is to feel overwhelmed with shame that the Church of Christ that is comparatively so strongly represented out here should be so futile when it comes to this question, and so unfitted to give the distinctive Christian word in regard to it.

Among the Christian community the problem of Church unity is a really pressing one, and we have had various enquiries as to the Quaker view of the subject. Only to-day Joy has been writing to a lady who is preparing a paper on the subject and has been sending her Edward Grubb's article on Friends and a creed and one or two other things that bear on the subject. The matter is far more urgent here than it is at home, partly because the Church is still plastic, and can be helped to take on the form that is most true to the ideals of China (and these are certainly not only pacifist internationally, but also harmonizing in matters of religion), and partly because we are facing a situation here in which the Church confronts a non-Christian system that has been judged and found wanting by the most thoughtful people. They have not yet found anything to put in the place of the old, and they are not impressed by the fact that Christianity speaks with so many voices, and that to join one section seems to put one off, to some extent, from another—at least, they are impressed, but unfavorably, by this fact. Quakerism might come here as a real unifying factor. I do not see it as a separate denomination, but rather on the lines of a letter I wrote to W. F. N. a little while ago. Of course there might, and probably would, grow up a nucleus to whom Quakerism meant everything, and this would be the power-house, as it were. But there would be in my thought a wide fringe which would be composed of sympathizers, and where the actuality of union among the various sects would be experienced in a Quaker fellowship, and in some forms of common activity. As an example, I may say that one of the finest men in Peking has asked me if there is not some way by which he can become a partner in the Quaker heritage without sacrificing his membership in his own Church. Such membership means the holding of a large section in some kind of sympathy, the support from the home and the chance of bringing ever so many more along with one. I think whatever Friends at home may do, an embassy here would have to work out some form of link with the Society that did not break existing links, and I believe that it is in this direction that we can best serve the interests of unity. Again I see no other quarter from which this influence could come.

Some at any rate of the more earnest Chinese Christians are very doubtful about much that has come along with the simple message of Christ from the West. Not only the attempt to pin the new Church down to an ancient creed that sprang out of quite a different intellectual atmosphere, but also the forms of the Church which have become more or less stereotyped in the West are felt by such men to be a bondage from which they hardly know how to escape. I have had earnest talks with men here on these questions. They are so dependent on the missionaries and the home Churches and look up to them with such reverence that it is not to be wondered at if they do not like to make experiments that may involve a breach with their spiritual parents. The thing they want is the experience and the moral support that would come from the Society of Friends who could help them over this most difficult period. Of course, I do not mean to say that they would become entirely Quaker in their practice on such questions as the ministry and rites. I do not think they would. But I feel quite sure that an unfettered Chinese Church would lean very much more towards the Quaker view than does the present one, and they would gain immeasurably from the help which we, and no one else, can give them at the present time. They are turning to me quite pathetically for all the help that I can give them. I feel sad to think of leaving here, and there being no one left to carry on the work that I have been able to begin. Literature I must leave with them, or send to them, but this is not the same as personal contact, for what they need is help in solving a problem that is right on them now, and reading literature cannot give all they want.

There is another direction in which the new movement in China is especially expressing itself, and that is the amazing awakening of womanhood. Nothing gives one more surprise or more food for thought. The liberty of the women is something no one could have foreseen. The whole of this women's student conference is being devoted to the question of freedom, and there is need of it, for there is a great danger that it become license. There are plenty of people who are proclaiming free love. The problem for the girls in China is a very, very difficult one, as the reverence to parents seems to fight against the just claims for the right kind of married life. I believe the experience of Friends is just the thing that is needed, and that there is immense scope for one or two young women. Friends out here, who could enter into the life of the young women of China, and help them over this most critical period. I also think that a religious organization that gives the fullest place to women has great possibilities in China just now, and there is no one else to supply this point.

I could go on adding other points about the social need, the need of a higher standard of truth and so forth, but each of the above is in itself a call to Friends which I do not think there is anyone else at all to answer. I am bewildered by the thought of all that there is for Friends to do here, and the fact that we have no one in the centre of Chinese life and thought. I wonder if there is anything in all the world that is more wonderful and bigger with possibilities of good and ill than the present situation in China. No one who knows me will accuse me of lack of sympathy with what is happening in Europe to-day, and with the struggles of people all the world over for self-expression and freedom. But this Chinese problem seems to overtop all others. The great numbers concerned, the immense change that is taking place, the newness of this element in the life of humanity, their readiness to receive impressions, the simplicity and strength of this great people,—there is nothing quite like it in the world and nothing like it can ever happen again. What we have to gain from a China that awakens to her true life cannot be estimated. How I should like to be able to carry some of these thoughts into the inner consciousness of the Young Friends' Movement, and into the life of some of the finest spirits in the Society. The work of Friends in China, is only at its beginning if we have any vision and faith and self-sacrificing love. The task is not easy, but it is here for us to do, and I do not see how it is to be done if we fail.

I have very little doubt that work could be found in Peking for a number of Friends. There is work of all kinds, and perhaps especially teaching. If we had a Quaker ambassador here, he could easily find openings for those who were led to come and join him, of that I have no doubt. But what is needed is certainly some of our best.

[The following letter from two of the workers who have recently sailed to return to the work abroad, speaks for itself.—Eds.]

PHILADELPHIA, Eleventh Month, 1921.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

Before leaving this country where we have found such a wonderful welcome, we wish to leave a message of thankfulness for the interest that has been expressed in the work of Friends in Austria. When we left Vienna we hoped to be able to report a gradually decreasing need, as the recovery in that country during the past two years has been remarkable, thanks to her determination to work and help herself and to co-operate in every way with those helping her.

However, her economic position was very precarious, owing to the fact that the credits given were only for food actually needed, five-sixths of which has to be purchased abroad, and not sufficient to purchase raw material on which her industries depend. In the beginning of October the kronen, whose normal exchange value is five to the dollar and which had already sunk to the rate of 1000, fell suddenly to 3000 and at the end of the month to 6000 to the dollar.

This means that those who, even when in full work and wages, in the summer could not buy the food their families needed and could buy practically no clothing at all, can now buy only one-sixth of what they could then obtain.

The week's wages of a skilled man in August had the value of three dollars and this is now the value of fifty cents.

It is impossible for wages to rise to meet this unless Austria can obtain credits.

A cablegram from Vienna dated November 4th says: "Sixty welfare doctors meeting yesterday Singerstrasse anticipate fearful winter probably worse than 1919. Clothing need middle and working classes appalling. Increased relief imperative. Urge Friends plead economic help Washington."

Another of ten days later is as follows:—

"Dollar over 6000 kronen. All government subsidies being removed. Result prices rising enormously and continuously. Black bread 34 kronen to 300. Canned milk already 600. Essential foodstuffs for children almost prohibitive. Severe snowfall. Desperate need clothing, bedding, fuel."

We who saw the conditions in 1919, following the appalling death-rate of the previous winter, when the children were deprived of these essential foodstuffs, and remember the pinched, pallid faces and deformed and twisted limbs of the survivors, think with dread of returning to Vienna to see that sight again.

Already weakened in constitution, many of these children will not survive another period of starvation, and unless help comes, famine will sweep them off as it is now doing in Russia.

We realize how heavy are the calls on Friends, but this burden, shouldered two years ago, of the young children under four in Austria, cannot be laid down, even to take up another where the call may seem perhaps more urgent. A little life that is lost for want of food, whether it be in one country or in another, is no greater and no less a loss because it is one of millions instead of only thousands.

For another winter this burden must be carried. All who know the country are convinced that, given the credits she needs, Austria will find her feet again, and then those children, saved from disease and death will live to carry on that high degree of civilization which makes Vienna of real value to the world. We are very sorry that we have not been able to meet with all Friends in America, but we have seen enough to realize with great thankfulness the sense of unity which has made possible the splendid work of the American Friends' Service Committee. We have been privileged to enter many Friendly homes, and to all those new friends we leave behind, we wish to send a special message of thanks and of affection. We have formed bonds which will unite us more closely than ever with American Friends, who are working with us in our common service, and we are glad indeed that this service is drawing together more and more closely, the Friends of both our countries.

Your friends sincerely,

PARTIAL BIBLIOGRAPHY ON PROBLEMS OF THE CONFERENCE.

ON THE GENERAL PROBLEM OF LAW VS. WAR IN THE SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES.

"Social Progress and the Darwinian Theory," "A Study of Force as a Factor in Human Relations," by George Nasmith, 279 pages. 1916. G. P. Putnam's Sons. Readable, scientific, convincing. Of first importance to speakers against war.

"The Fruits of Victory." A sequel to "The Great Illusion," by Norman Angell. 338 pages. 1921. The Century Company. $3.00. A study of the will to power and the economic utility of military power. Of first importance to an understanding of the European situation and the economic aspects of conditions in the Far East.

"The Great Illusion," "A Study of the Relation of Military Power in Nations to their Economic and Social Advantage," by Norman Angell. 407 pages. 1911. G. P. Putnam's Sons. This earlier book by Norman Angell is still timely. In an appendix to "The Fruits of Victory," he answers his critics.

"The Economic Consequences of Peace," by J. M. Keynes. 298 pages. 1920. Harcourt, Brace & Howe. Much talked of on its appearance and of undiminished value.

"The Stakes of Diplomacy," by Walter Lippmann. 229 pages. 1915. Henry Holt. A study of the economic causes of war and a plea for its prevention by conferences like the present one with continuance as suggested in the proposed Association of Nations.

"The Biology of War," by Georg F. Nicolai. 553 pages. 1918. Century Company. A thorough study of war in relation to human instincts and to patriotism, and in Part II, a study from the standpoint of natural science of how war may be abolished. Prof. Nicolai wrote this book in a German prison. It was written primarily for the German people.

"Nationalism, War and Society," by Edward Krehbiel. 264 pages. 1916. Macmillan Company. Professor of Modern History in Leland Stanford University. Written in the form of a brief or abstract against irresponsible nationalism with its concomitant, war, and a study of the various methods of achieving peace. A very full and varied bibliography. A valuable book for students and debaters.

"The War of Steel and Gold," "A Study of the Armed Peace," by H. M. Brailsford. 317 pages. 1914. G. Bell & Sons, London. Although written just before the war, still instructive as a study of the part played by armies in giving prestige to diplomacy.

"What Really Happened at Paris, the Story of the Peace Conference by American Delegates," edited by Edward M. House and Charles Seymour. 507 pages. 1921. Charles Scribner's Sons. An important work. A series of eighteen lectures on various aspects of the Versailles Conference by authoritative speakers, delivered in Philadelphia in the winter of 1920-'21. The celebrated lecture by General Tasker H. Bliss on "The Problems of Disarmament" is one of them.

"Economic Imperialism," by L. S. Woolf. 111 pages. 1920. $1.00. Harcourt, Brace & Howe. One of the handbooks in the "International Relations Series," edited by G. Lowes Dickinson. A brief, illuminating study.

"Causes of International War," by G. Lowes Dickinson. $1.00. Harcourt, Brace & Howe. Important, readable study. "The Choice Before Us," by G. Lowes Dickinson. 268 pages. 1917. $2.00. Dodd, Mead & Company. Discusses arguments for and against militarism and considerations that should govern the organization of any association of nations, with useful concrete examples in support of important points. Valuable to the student of to-day's greatest issue.

"Patriotism and the Super-State," by J. L. Stocks. 150 pages. 1920. Concise, lucid discussion of the relation of patriotism and nationalism to a federation of peoples. This is also one of the handbooks of the "International Relations Series."

"New Wars for Old," by John Haynes Holmes. 350 pages. 1916. Dodd, Mead & Company. A discussion, always timely, of the ethics of the Sermon on the Mount with regard to Force.

"It Might Have Happened to You," by Coningsby Dawson. 163 pages. 1921. John Lane Company. Graphic sketches of Hungary, Austria, Germany and Poland as left by the war.

"What the War Has Taught Us," by Charles E. Jefferson. 258 pages. 1919. Fleming H. Revell Company. Twenty sermons preached in the early months of 1919, but of enduring worth.

"Disarmament," "Debaters' Handbook Series," by H. W. Wilson Company, 958 University Avenue, New York City. $2.25. This book is just appearing. We have not yet received a copy.

"The Maintenance of Peace," by Col. S. C. Vestal. 564 pages. 1920. G. P. Putnam's Sons. An argument on the other side, advocating preparedness and the balance of power as the only assurance of peace, basing the argument upon the author's interpretation of history.

"Armaments and Arbitration," or "The Place of Force in International Relations," by Capt. A. T. Mahan. 250 pages. 1912. Harper & Brothers. Also an argument on the other side, contending that force brings a lasting adjustment which arbitration cannot effect. Written before the war, the author contends that the great armaments which had maintained peace in Europe for forty years were a safer reliance than courts.

"The Folly of Nations," by (Col.) Frederick Palmer. 408 pages. 1921. Dodd, Mead & Company. A chatty, intimate presentation of the case against war by one who has seen much of war.

Issued by the National Council for Limitation of Armaments.

[The following is an extract from a letter of our good friend, William Littleboy. We take this opportunity to express our warm appreciation of his work for young Friends.—Eds.]

It is to my younger Friends that my heart goes out. They have many difficult problems to solve, and the spirit and the ideas which animate life to-day are so new and sometimes so revolutionary, that my heart is full of the desire to offer them at least my sympathy, and my support (for what it is worth) in their effort to make a forward move. I don't profess to have any special message or mission, but I think I can enter in some measure of friendship with them under the puzzling conditions of the time.

My special concern then, so far as I can state it in writing, is that we should try to get down to fundamentals, avoiding short cuts and superficial methods which look easy and attractive, recognizing that the essential qualification for all of us is a deep down spiritual relationship, and that without it we can never hope to meet the tremendous demands which the world is making on our Society to-day. We simply must brace ourselves up and prepare ourselves to enter this wide open door; to fail would be too awfully tragic. We have to get down to reality, and to know and in some measure understand God.

My life is lived, most of it; but I greatly desire to spend its remaining days in backing up and cheering on those younger than myself.

WILLIAM LITTLEBOY.

EDUCATION.

A CONFERENCE ON RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

The question of First-day guests, when there seems no other suitable time for their entertainment, was discussed. One housekeeper solved the matter by letting the guests themselves help with the extra work.

The problem of making the attendance of the children at meeting obligatory, and so forming the habit of meeting-going a settled one; or leaving it a choice with them, only expressing regret that the family would not be complete,—proved an interesting one, and there were divergent opinions. One mother felt that there had been a distinct advantage in leaving the choice with the children. But the responsibility of the parents for their habits of attendance, and their own attitude toward the meeting for worship, was emphasized.

Children can be taught how their spirit may help the Meeting, and that the good of the Meeting depends on this. A deep impression may be made upon the child-mind by the spirit of an exercised minister even when the words of the sermon are not afterward remembered. Such a testimony was given as to the ministry of the late Phebe W. Roberts.

The physical habit of quiet in meeting may grow into something deeper as years go on. The good effect upon children of having a service in our business meetings was spoken of, and in one meeting we were told, small boys distributed the Extracts from Yearly Meeting Minutes, and enjoyed doing it. That we should watch for other opportunities for making our children feel that they have a part of their own in business meetings is undoubtedly true. The Monthly Meeting at Westtown has a great opportunity for this.

One parent told us of the so-called "quiet time" in his family every First-day afternoon, when parents and children come together in such a way that each one in turn has an opportunity to express what is in his heart. He also said that he "felt jealous" of this family unity, that it should mark the day, and if a walk was taken in the course of the afternoon, that other children in the neighborhood should not be invited as they would be on another day.

That a spirit of rest, of worship, and of family unity should mark our First-days seemed to be the conclusion of the Conference.

Allusion was also made to our duty as citizens in supporting laws dealing with right observance of the day, but it was felt that here (as always) "example is better than precept."

In the third group-conference on religious literature the Bible claimed first consideration, and the family Bible reading was felt to be most important. The members of the family reading in turn has proved helpful in some families. "The Stories is promised, to be had next spring, and parents whose books, with comment on passages of Scripture, have been used. To give children their own Bibles—perhaps a Testament at first—is a good plan. These should last through school days, when another kind of Bible, with notes, etc., may be more appreciated.

"The habit of a book is a good one," and the Chairman of this Conference had for distribution a carefully prepared book-list, a copy of which is given below. He had also copies of books for inspection. A new volume of Maude Robinson's stories is promised, to be had next spring, and parents whose children have enjoyed Rufus M. Jones's "Hebrew Heroes," will be glad to know of a similar collection of New Testament Stories, now appearing in The Friend (London) from time to time and no doubt to be in book form later.

FIRST-DAY READING FOR CHILDREN.

The Bible. A New Testament at 5, a good Bible at 10, Oxford, bold face type, with references, helps, maps, etc., well bound, price $4.00.

Selections from the Bible, using the text of the Authorized Version.—Bible Stories to Read and Tell, by Frances J. Olcott. 486 pp. $3.00. One hundred and fifty selections from the Old Testament. Attractively illustrated.

An Old, Old Story Book, by Eva March Tappan, 295 pp. $2.50. Longer continuous passages than Olcott's. Illustrated.

The Bible for Young People, published by The Century Co. 475 pp. $3.50. One hundred and fifty-five selections from the Old Testament, one hundred from the New Testament. Not as well printed as the above, but contains more matter.

Bible Stories More or Less Retold. (In addition to those listed in leaflet.)—

The Story of the Bible, by Charles Foster. $2.00. Familiar to most. Follows the Bible wording pretty closely.

First Steps for Little Feet in Gospel Paths, by Charles Foster. $1.25. Very simple language, for kindergarten ages.

Stories from the Old Testament for Children, by Harriet S. B. Beale. 409 pp. $2.50. From Abraham to the Captivity, pretty much in the Bible wording.

A Life of Christ for the Young, by Geo. L. Weed. 339 pp. $1.75. Simply told, illustrated, with appreciation of the child's point of view.

Boys' Life of Christ, by Wm. B. Forbush. An excellent book for boys and girls.

St. Paul, the Hero, by Rufus Jones. 172 pp. $1.35. An excellent story of Paul, for ages 10 up.

Ben Hur, by Lew Wallace. $1.75 or cheaper at $75.

Joel, a Boy of Galilee, by Annie Fellows Johnson. Excellent to make vivid the conditions in which Jesus grew up.

Book of Quaker Saints, by L. Violet Hodgkin. A notable collection of stories about Quaker worthies, well written and illustrated. A good many of the stories are rather heroic, but the book should be widely known.

The Time of Her Life, and Other Stories, by Maude Robinson. 261 pp. $2.00. Twelve interesting stories, all founded on facts, but worked up by the author. Excellent for bringing back the way Friends used to do.

The Quaker Bonnet, by K. K. K. (E. F. O'Brien). 265 pp. $1.30. A story of a little girl who on account of illness at home had to go stay with an aunt who was rather stern. It is a kind of Quaker Pollyanna. Especially suitable for girls.

The Children's Story Garden, by Anna P. Broomell. 247 pp. Stories illustrating ethical principles and religious truths that Friends wish to emphasize, sixty-five stories, a few from the Bible, a number from Quaker annals. It has a valuable Appendix classifying the stories according to the object which they may serve, also listing other stories along similar lines.

The Story of Quakerism, by Eliz. B. Emmott. 284 pp. $1.00. For older boys and girls.

The Story of George Fox, by Rufus M. Jones. $1.25. For boys and girls from about 14 up.

Quaker Biographies. Five volumes, by different writers. Written to make available for home use the stories of a good number of Friends both of the older time and more recent.

An Admiral's Son, by E. F. O'Brien. (William Penn.)

The Prisoners' Friends, by Constance Wakeford. (John Howard and Elizabeth Fry.)

The Man Who Chose Poverty (St. Francis). These are interesting small volumes excellently written to make their subjects attractive to young folks. $1.20 each.

PROBLEMS OF THE ORIENT FROM THE MISSIONARY POINT OF VIEW.

LLOYD BALDERSTON.

Sense of responsibility indeed exists in Japan, but it seems to be directed almost wholly toward parents and toward the Emperor and his subordinates; that is, all officers of state. This is a sort of impressed responsibility. The spontaneous feeling of responsibility for one's acts which I believe to be largely lacking in non-Christian Japan is perhaps nearly equivalent to conscience as defined by Dymond. It is partly replaced by the feeling of loyalty toward one's friends, which is very strong among the Japanese and is a very beautiful trait with many interesting side developments.

The lack of responsibility is revealed in various ways. One of those oftentimes spoken of by foreigners is the lack of any considerable body of public opinion. People do not much concern themselves with what ought to be done, rather waiting to be told by the proper authorities what to do.

Another manifestation is in the use of the phrase "Shikata ga nai," which may be translated "there is no help for it" or "what is the use?" This phrase is heard on every hand in all manner of connections.

Permit me to tell a story to illustrate the length to which this attitude is carried. A little more than a year ago, the group of foreigners in Sapporo learned that a girl who had not long before been a pupil in the Presbyterian girls' school had been sold by her parents into prostitution. I learned for the first time that such transactions as this are quite legal. The law provides that the girl's consent must be given, but in Japan a girl has no choice but to consent to what her father demands. In fact, it is the over-insistence on obedience to parents with no corresponding obligation of parents toward children which is the basis of this horror. It is the theme of many of the hero tales of old Japan, in which the devoted daughter sells herself to relieve the sufferings of her parents.

The legal instrument makes a term of years, so that it is not the girl herself who is sold but her services. By various devices the amount originally paid is increased, as, for instance, by adding the money expended for clothing. Thus the debt grows with time, and the girl is made to feel that she cannot be freed until it is paid. There is another law, enacted some eighteen years ago, which provides that if a girl desires to be released, she has only to go before the police officer who has charge of the licensed quarter and declare her desire, when she becomes free. Two causes contribute to make this law nearly valueless. Its existence is not generally known, and the girls are not at liberty to go to the police station to make a declaration. Besides, if a girl is freed from the quarter, she has no place to go to, as her parents are her worst enemies.

The revelation that any Japanese father can legally sell his daughter came to me as a violent shock. It was hard to believe that such a custom could exist without calling forth continued public indignant protest at least from every Christian Japanese man. So I went around to my Christian friends among the professors in the University. Yes, they knew all about it. One told me of a case where he had foiled a father's plan to sell his daughter to pay a debt of fifty dollars. But with all of them it was the same old story, "Shikata ga nai." "What can you do?"

I am convinced that the only thing which can bring about the removal of this deepest and foulest blot on the fair name of Japan is the widest publicity, which shall sting the men of Japan out of their complacent attitude with the conviction that something must be done.

A third example of deficient sense of responsibility is the lack of provision to protect the public from danger on the highways and the failure in most regions to provide good highways. If a bridge is broken, there is no red lantern at night. If there is an open sewer along the street, there is no fence or other means to prevent children from falling in. As to muddy streets with no sidewalks, the citizen meets that situation by carrying his own private sidewalk on his feet, for a pair of high "geta" are nothing less than a private sidewalk.

The hearing which this national trait of lack of mutual responsibility has on the religious life of the people is very obvious. It cuts away the foundation on which the Christian idea of character is built. Sin, transgression of Divine law, does not exist. There are no Divine laws, except so far as the Emperor is divine. In fact, Divinity, outside of the Imperial Ancestors, is not understood by non-Christian Japanese.

I trust it is clear that, however insufficient may be my answer to the main question, there is real need in Japan for the message of the fatherhood of a righteous God and the universal brotherhood of men which was brought to mankind in such convincing fashion by Jesus Christ.

BERNARD WALTON

AN APPEAL FOR A PERSON.

There are Friends who would much rather help with an individual case than contribute for the general relief fund. Here is one which deserves consideration of any such person.

A young man of a very prominent Russian family is now a refugee in Switzerland. He is one of five children and his family has lost everything. The mother is nearly blind and the father is now working at cobbling shoes and gardening. This young man, now eighteen years of age, has a B. A. degree and wants to study medicine. He needs one hundred dollars a year for two years to complete this work. He wants to finish his medical course so as to be able to return to Russia and there live among his people as a doctor.

Contributions for this particular case will be handled by the American Friends' Service Committee, and the name and address of the young man will be given to anyone who inquires for them.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

A cablegram received Twelfth Month 5th from the Austrian Mission stated that the Mission was unharmed by the riots which took place Twelfth Month 1st in Vienna. The outbreak was directed by the mobs mainly against the wealthy cafés and hotels. The cablegram further stated that, while the disturbance had quieted considerably, the problem which created it was by no means solved. Another outbreak is likely at any moment until the financial and economic conditions become more stable.

Gilbert L. MacMaster writes from Munich, Germany, as follows: "I had a very interesting experience this morning. A Catholic Sister called on us to ask that the feeding might be introduced in her school. In the course of the conversation she told me that she was an American, born and bred in Philadelphia, and that she was the daughter of Quaker parents. She had remained a Quaker until her seventeenth year, when she entered a Catholic convent. She said that she could truthfully tell the Catholics that the Quakers had no quarrel with them on account of differences in religion."

In view of the great demand for the English language in Austria, the question of establishing connections between the American and English workers and the Austrian families has been under consideration by the Unit in Vienna. This method seems to hold the possibility of an auspicious field of activity which would help to solve a very interesting problem.

The riots of Twelfth Month 1st in Vienna, when the mobs of starving people sacked the aristocratic cafés and hotels, is partially explained by a cablegram which was received at the Service Committee headquarters from our Unit. It read:

"Dollar now over 6,000 kronen. All Government subsidies of food being removed with the result of prices rising enormously and continuously. Black bread 300 kronen, canned milk now 600 kronen. All essential foodstuffs for children are at prohibitive prices. Severe snowstorm makes need for clothing desperate. Bedding and fuel also needed."

Arthur Watts writes that, "It is impossible to supply food to a limited area, as immediately after food began to be given through children's institutions in Buzuluk, parents came in from the country and abandoned their children, and the Homes became fearfully overcrowded. This has taken such effect that the authorities have asked us to discontinue our help to the town alone and to spread it out, even if very thinly, to the whole country. After very careful consideration we have decided that the only possible course for us is to undertake the whole district, starting in with 30,000 children, extending it to 100,000 by Christmas, and ultimately to 300,000. All visible supplies of funds will be exhausted by First Month at this rate, but we must go forward in faith, and the home committee must make superhuman efforts. The responsibility is tremendous. We simply must meet it."

A meeting of physicians was held at the headquarters of the Mission in Vienna and was attended by the leading physicians of Austria. They were entertained by the Mission. They gave serious consideration to the living conditions of the people, and as one after the other spoke the serious outlook for the winter was emphasized. It was shown that the clothing which was in existence before the war had been absolutely exhausted. More and more the people are coming each week to the point where it is impossible to secure any old clothes. Prices of the most necessary foodstuffs have risen to heights which are beyond the buying power of the people. They have reached a price which makes it impossible for the average head of a family to provide even a wife and one child with the essentials of living.

SHIPMENTS received during the week ending Twelfth Month 3, 1921—133 boxes and packages; 2 from Mennonites; 3 anonymous.

Cash contributions for the same period, $11,614.06.

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

V.

The week which saw an approximate solution of the centuries-old Irish Problem should have been an auspicious one for the Washington Conference also. At the present moment the Conference is on the very eve of important decisions, and before this letter is published these decisions will probably have been recorded in the daily press. President Harding, in an interview this afternoon, declined to talk about the pending decisions, but in an address to the American Red Cross on the 7th instant, he declared: "I hope with all my heart that much of the big work which has been yours in the past will never be asked of you again. It will be a wonderful thing for you and for me to have lived in a period in which we have brought the conscience of mankind into an understanding whereby we shall have done something tangible to prevent calling upon you for war service. I like to say this to you, because I know whereof I speak: we are going to succeed beyond our fondest hopes."

The questions which have received the most serious consideration during the past week are those relating to the return by the Japanese to the Chinese of the public property and railroads in Shantung. Wellington Koo said this afternoon that good progress has been made on the first of these and that the second, he hoped, would be decided to-morrow. There has been a great deal of discussion also, both within and outside of the Conference, of a "cooling-off" treaty or agreement, by which the four powers of Great Britain, France, Japan and the United States would agree to rely upon conciliation, arbitration or some other form of peaceful settlement for future disputes which may arise among them in the Far East and the Pacific. It is evidently believed that if a "ten years' holiday" in the building of capital ships is a wise measure, the same principle can be usefully applied to such causes of hostility as the increase of naval bases and fortifications in the Pacific; for during the delay, peaceful settlement would have a chance to succeed. Such an agreement also would carry with it the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty which the United States and China, as well as the people of the British Empire, so greatly desire.

Various proposals have been made for the disposition of the doomed dreadnaughts and cruisers, short of "scrapping" them. Among these are Henry Ford's offer (which was referred to in a previous letter), the conversion of them into ocean liners, and the presentation of them to the weaker powers, as, for example, Japan's mighty Mutsu to China. This last proposal was made by an eminent clergyman and is reminiscent of the Salvation Army lassie's remark that "when she found her jewels were dragging her down to perdition, she took them off and gave them to her younger sister." Apropos of this probably apocryphal story, it may be noted that the Salvation Army, eight millions strong, paused in their labors in every part of the world for two minutes at five o'clock on the afternoon of the fourth instant, and engaged in ardent prayer for the success of the Washington Conference.

One of the most interesting of the interviews given during the week by various delegates was that with the delegate from India, Srinivasa Sastri. This able and eloquent representative of the Orient spoke freely and fearlessly of many things connected with India, such as the result to India of the liberation of Ireland (which would hasten India's self-government, he said); the reduction of armaments (of which India greatly approves); the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty (which India greatly desires,—since it objects to the landing of Japanese troops on India's soil whether for defense against foreign foes or for the suppression of Hindu revolts); the desirability of prohibition; the movement against the old caste principle of "untouchability"; the Gandhi movement; the Servants of India Society, of which Sastri is the head; "Asia for the Asiatics"; and India's relations with Russia. Perhaps the most significant feature of his address was the emphasis which he laid on India's interest in the Washington Conference as a means by which the "colored" races of the East might interpret the spirit of the Orient to the "colorless" peoples of the West. As an exponent of the Oriental spirit this Hindu statesman and orator deserves to rank with his rival Gandhi, and with the poet, Rabindranath Tagore, whose ideals have stirred the minds and hearts of the Occident in a different and better way than the military triumph of Japan over Russia, or the marvellously rapid material development of the Far East.

The subjects of land armaments, aerial warfare, submarines and poisonous gases, have received little or no attention from the Conference during the past week. As to poisonous gases, a British spokesman said that he supposed the subject had not been broached because no one in the Conference had any interest in it! Even among pacifists there is a tendency to minimize the importance of prohibiting their use, on the ground that "the prohibition could not possibly be enforced." This subject is of such very great importance that I will defer its consideration until a later letter.

The fourth plenary session of the Conference, from which I have just hastened to finish and mail this letter, was of transcendent interest to a member of the Society of Friends and an admirer of the international vision of William Penn. After Secretary Hughes had opened the session by reading and inviting the adoption of some very significant agreements relating to the sovereignty, protection and prosperity of China,—which were unanimously adopted,—Senator Lodge made his memorable address, in the course of which I was repeatedly reminded of the high ideals and practical proposals for the preservation of world-peace which have been associated with the Founder of Pennsylvania and the Society of Friends for nearly two centuries and a half. That is a long time for the Society of Friends to have waited; but these great days are worth waiting for!

The "brief and simple" treaty which Senator Lodge read and advocated attempts, first, to remove the causes of war associated with the vast Pacific Ocean and its unnumbered islands; second, should such controversies arise in the future which cannot be settled by diplomacy, to bring the four strongest powers in the world to submit them to Conference and conciliation. This in substance was what Senator Lodge called "the great experiment"; and his phrase recalled the noble words of William Penn in 1693, when he pleaded with the nations to create a conference in which the potential causes of war might be removed by conciliation or arbitration. "There is no provision for the use of force," Senator Lodge declared, "to carry out any of the terms of the agreement, and no military or naval sanction lurks anywhere in the background or under cover of these plain and direct clauses. We make the experiment here in this treaty of trying to assure peace in that immense region by trusting the preservation of its tranquility to the good faith of the nations responsible for it." Thus, not military or economic coercion of nations, but their national honor, mutual good faith, the will to peace and justice are relied upon to cause the faithful observance of this historic agreement.

Senator Lodge's peroration was also noteworthy from our Friendly point of view. "If we enter," he said, "upon this agreement, which rests only upon the will and honor of those who sign it, we at least make the great experiment and appeal to the men and women of the nations to help us to sustain it in spirit and in truth." As I listened to this pregnant utterance, there came inevitably to mind those other great words of Holy Writ: "Not by might nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord."

The new agreement is to replace the Anglo-Japanese Treaty, which has caused so much anxiety to China and so much uneasiness in the United States. It was therefore a thrilling moment when, first Arthur J. Balfour of Great Britain and then Prince Tokugawa of Japan, renounced their mutual alliance and gave cordial adhesion to the new arrangement. A. J. Balfour, as he reminded the audience, was the head of the British Government when the Treaty was first negotiated twenty years ago, and also when the Entente Cordiale was created between Great Britain and France. He praised the utility of the treaty during the years of its existence, but both he and the Japanese spokesman welcomed with cordiality and apparent enthusiasm this new arrangement, which is far more consistent than alliances based on force with the spirit of what all the world hopes is the dawn of a new era in international relations.

One by one, the nine nations present through their spokesmen, expressed their hearty approval of the agreement and their belief that it would mark a most noteworthy step in the organization and perpetuation of world peace. The session was closed by Secretary Hughes in a very brief and simple manner with the statement that although the conference had been dealing with a very simple paper, one of the shortest and simplest in the history of diplomacy, it was nevertheless reminded once again that great things are the simple ones. And with the close of the historic session we realize what it was which had been in President Harding's mind when he declared three days ago: "We are going to succeed beyond our fondest hopes."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

A REPORT of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, the Temperance page, the continued article of Children's Corner and several other articles of special interest are deferred till next Number.

The following item is taken from the Pacific Friend. Some of our readers know the Friend referred to as well as other members of his family.—Eds.

"One of Pasadena's oldest citizens is William H. Coffin, of 620 Summit Avenue, who has celebrated his ninety-sixth birthday. He passed the day quietly, surrounded by members of his family, many friends calling during the day to congratulate him on arriving another step nearer the century mark.

"Despite the fact that the day was the hottest day of the year, William H. Coffin walked down town from his home, transacted some business at the bank and called on some friends."

The Annual Meeting of the Woolman School Association was held on Seventh and First-days Twelfth Month 3rd and 4th, at Swarthmore, there being more than fifty in attendance. At 4.30 the business meeting was held. Several letters from members who were unable to be present were read with much interest, and reminiscences given by members representing the different terms.

Dr. Elbert Russell gave an account of Woolman School Progress which was most interesting, as it made us realize more than ever how important it is that Woolman School should continue and progress.

Wm. Littleboy, a former director of Woodbrooke School, in England, addressed the meeting on "Woodbrooke and the Young Friends' Movement in England." Quite a number were entertained over night at the School and at the homes of Friends nearby.

After breakfast on First-day, Russell Hayes conducted a group through the snowstorm on a hike to the Woolman Tree. Quite a number attended meetings in Swarthmore and others in Media. In the afternoon, Wm. Littleboy addressed the group on "Extension Work: the Appeal of Christ to Our Youth."

The meeting closed with a period of silent worship and vocal prayer.

The Olney Current for Eleventh Month has been read with much interest. It is published as the organ of Friends' Boarding School, Barnesville, by the alumni. The report of the evening program of the Yearly Meeting week at Barnesville, and the Primary School Notes give interesting details. There are seven small schools reporting with an enrollment varying from eleven to thirty-eight. The names of the eighty-three students at the Boarding School (Olney) also appear. A poem entitled "Asleep," by Mabel C. Satterthwait, will be copied into THE FRIEND.

We have had the reading of a private letter from Mary Pumphrey, written from Blackwood, South Australia, on the seventeenth of Tenth Month and received in Philadelphia the twenty-ninth of Eleventh Month. She has found a warm welcome for the prosecution of her concern, and is able to see most of the members of the Society in those parts, although they are widely scattered. She was at the General Meeting. About the end of last month she was intending to proceed to Tasmania.

A BOOK Friends should watch for—it is now in the printer's hands and should be ready well before the "Industry for Service Conference" at Devonshire House at the end of this month—is Maurice Rowntree's "Social Freedom." This book, written at the request of the War and Social Order Committee, is a study of the Application of the Ethics of Jesus to Modern, Social and Industrial Problems. The same Committee is responsible for a new pamphlet—"Letters from a Rich Young Ruler," by B. V. Clough.

H. W. PEET.

THE Pacific Friend gives an interesting synopsis of the "Report of the Alaskan Conference of Eskimo Friends."

The Conference was held in Katzebue, Alaska, Eighth Month 12-15th, and was "largely attended."

"On the village life, they tell of visits to the sick, of taking collections to help feed the dogs of those who were in straitened circumstances, of dividing fish with those in need, of helping people get their homes cleaned and ventilated."

From the statement of the collection of what we call "meeting stock" this is quite unusual:

1 white fox.....	$35.00
21 weasels.....	40.00
fish.....	3.00
25 pounds flour.....	3.00
1 deerskin.....	3.00
7 ptarmigan given to sick
11 muskrats.....	22.00
15 rats not sold yet
13 male fawns.....

TOMMY NEWLIN,

Treasurer.

In the Pacific Friend this is all apparently abbreviated from the Arctic Friend, which is the organ of "Eskimo Friends."

A DECLARATION OF DEPENDENCE.

In England and in places on the Continent of Europe Americans, or that portion of them known as Yankees, are often characterized by the un-translatable term "bumptious." One may come across the word in its bare form in both French and German. It would probably be necessary to write or review our century and a half of history as a nation to define the term accurately. It is a particular kind of assurance and assertiveness, and it is believed in a subtle way by some to be related to the Declaration of Independence of 1776, and to the continual effort to make personal and national life tally with the declaration. Strangely enough a very wise foreign writer has just now been saying that the American characteristic is a certain willingness to bear abuses in politics and society without protest. Even this trait, insofar as it is real, may be related to what is actually meant by "bumptiousness." It implies no little swagger and "don't care."

Coming across the sea and viewing the national characteristic through home eyes, we must be aware how general the impression is, at least in educational circles, that Young America is over-independent. This is but another way of recording a lack of respect for authority or a low quality of reverence for truth, and especially for the things of the spirit. Nor will one escape entirely the conviction (it is recorded by thinkers of the highest order) that this characteristic also has some direct relationship to the psychological effect of a declaration of independence as a starting-point for national character. Long ago there were those to point out that the famous instrument of Jefferson began with a most glaring untruth. All men are not, cannot apparently, be equally free and independent. But now we have reached the stage where we are asked to assent to the charge that such an ideal actually produces a national quality of which we are ashamed. It is not our present purpose to defend the Declaration of Independence. It was (and is) a great document, and in God's Providence has had an incalculable service in making a great country and a great people. Doubtless it does focus attention and effort in a single direction that has some peculiar dangers. Is it out of order to ask whether as a corrective to it, we should not individually, if not nationally, work out for ourselves a Declaration of Dependence? Does not the human mind, does not human society, require some insurance (written insurance, if you please) against the over-development of the one side of truth expressed by independence?

We shall not have the assurance (be bumptious enough) to essay the Jeffersonian task of writing a Declaration of Dependence, but it may be legitimate to suggest two or three points which such a declaration should cover, to serve as a corrective to the over-emphasis of independence. First, we need to declare in our lives, if not in our speech, much more clearly and much more frequently than we do, our dependence upon God. The materialism of the age too largely leaves God out. That is to be expected. But must this materialism invade the habits of our daily lives? Must we be so bound by the machinery of business and trade that God is not to have the right of way with us? Are these exactions inexorable? Let us say, for purpose of argument, that they are. Our time (eight hours of it each day) belongs to the machine. We must give it, and had best do that heartily, as to the Lord. But the other sixteen hours are ours and our regular programs, if we will it so, may include a distinct effort to make them God's. As certainly as we do that the whole of our life—even the part absorbed by the materialistic machine, takes on a new character. This sense of dependence, as though our personal programs were a part of God's great program for the world, may find, surely will find, endless forms of expression. Like Bevan Braitwaite, we may assign the morning hour to an assiduous study of religious literature with a sure conviction that it will enhance our service in the world and in the church. Like Elizabeth Fry we may carry cheer and hope to prisoners and incidentally give ourselves to a study of penology. Like Brother Lawrence we may be able in the humblest household toil to bring heaven into the obscurity to which we seem to be in bonds. For dependence means service. We may be attracted to service by the glitter of some career. How much better to live in the constant compulsion of His love by consciously, day by day, recognizing our dependence. Like the character in Hawthorne's Great Stone Face we shall find this will make our career for us.

But secondly, do we not need to recognize our dependence upon organized human Society, upon laws and upon all the guaranteed securities of a well-ordered state? Is not our attitude toward this field too often and too largely one of protest? Certainly if we recognized more fully this dependence we would be found more frequently giving our time to distinct civic duties. Law is not self-acting or enacting. It requires a constant co-operation from those who believe in it and enjoy its protection.

And finally, are we not disposed very much to overlook our dependence upon one another in the home circle? Such bereavement comes upon us. The family circle is broken, and our dependence upon the one who has gone becomes acutely painful. But how little have we recognized this dependence in life? How much are we recognizing it day by day in its relation to those who remain? "We are members one of another." Does not a right sense of this and a right recognition of it, count more for our own happiness than any exaggerated sense of personality founded upon rights and upon our individual expression of independence?

Perhaps the foregoing may be seen to bear directly upon our membership in the Society of Friends and upon our success or failure as Friends. Quakerism is, first of all, a personal declaration of independence; ritual and priests are superseded in the personal Christian experience by the "One who can speak to our condition." On the side toward man that is independence. But just as plainly on the side toward God, it is dependence. This inspeaking word then should become an outspeaking life. Immediately it does become so, another element enters. We call this element by the name of fellowship. The visible body of Quakerism thus becomes—must indeed become, a fellowship. That is nothing else than the outward form taken by dependence. The word spoken to us becomes multiplied as we are made aware of the words spoken to others.

Has not the difficulty too often been that we have assumed that the inspoken word to us is to be rule for us and rule for our brother, too? Doubtless inspeaking, if it is real, has a golden thread of unity in it. But conditions, characters, circumstances are so varied that there cannot be one interpretation even of the same voice. Fellowship becomes real in proportion as we recognize this variety—recognize not merely that another is spoken to differently, but that that different speaking has a service of understanding and development for us. We are thus truly "members one of another."

Without question within the circle of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, there has been a growth in the recognition of this variety of inspeaking. Concerned Friends are not all led in what to outward appearance is the same path. An understanding of this and of its relationships to dependence will establish the unity in diversity which most surely manifests God's strength. Let us continue to seek that strength and to acknowledge thankfully that our divine Master set the perfect example of it. The Pharisees were offended in Him on account of nothing so much as the breadth of His fellowship. Their eyes were on the outward. His were, and are, on the heart.

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING.

A neat white frame house, nestling among trees by the roadside, invites the passers-by to worship, and here on the morning of Eleventh Month 18, 1921, we found one hundred Friends, or more, assembled. Among the visitors from a distance were Jesse and Rebecca Mekkel, with their daughter Mary, and Mary Anna Wood, from Ilecter, New York State; Carl Patterson and his wife from Ohio; Edgar and Flora Haines and Thomas Fisher from Pennsylvania; while Emily Haines and William Kirkbride represented New Jersey.

Weighty counsel was imparted at the opening half hour each day; sometimes joint sessions were held, when letters were read from Max I. Reich and others—then the shutters would be closed that men and women might discuss their separate business.

An excellent Memorial was read concerning Abby Hollowell.

Her large family of children only added to her zeal for the Master whom she served.

The Queries occupied one day—the ten Epistles from various Conservative Yearly Meetings were much enjoyed at another session, and finally answers to each were considered and sent.

The Representative Meeting was empowered to write a letter to Secretary Hughes, upholding his hands in work for Disarmament.

A very stormy First-day did not prevent a full attendance, and the Youths' Meeting was also large in the evening. Automobiles, belonging to our hosts, conveyed us from one house to another—not once did we enter a carriage. Even the clerks, Walter Brown and Mary I. Peele, were able to entertain Friends and to carry on the business efficiently.

The presence of many children added to the life of the meeting and their mothers had them well trained; in fact, little ones abounded in the homes we visited and were an unailing source of interest to their parents and to us—the emotional side more marked than in the North with demonstrations of affection.

Emily Haines and myself lodged at Jane Brown's, the widow of Benjamin, and here we saw this dear Friend surrounded by her four sons and four daughters. One of the latter, a West-town graduate, had also been to Columbia, and is now a teacher in the Public School at Woodland. Here I attended the early session one morning, giving a talk on the League of Good Citizenship of Philadelphia.

Another daughter of Benjamin Brown is an expert bread-maker, turning out seventy-five loaves of bread twice a week, which involves her sitting up all night to tend her wood fire (the only fuel used in that section of country). She finds a ready sale for "the staff of life" among the villagers, as she carries it in her little carriage with her father's favorite white horse.

Woodland has outlying farms—here the Friends reside in neat bungalows; their hospitality included us on Thanksgiving-day, as well as to dinner and supper during the week.

Those who had been last year to the London Peace Conference were enthusiastic over it. The hospital in Serbia, under American Friends' Service Committee, is cared for by Dr. Outland and his wife, so his parents at Woodland shared with us their letters after our happy dinner together.

Crops of cotton and peanuts were being harvested, so that the roads were filled with these en route to the freight stations. The well-fed mules, driven by merry negroes, gave evidence of industry and prosperity. A bushel-basket factory is an enterprise in which some Friends are concerned, six gum trees daily being sawed into thin strips and put together with pine bottoms and elm hoops, two-and-a-half minutes occupied by one man in this operation. A railroad car holds seven thousand of these baskets, conveying them to New Jersey and elsewhere.

At the close of the Yearly Meeting some of the visiting Friends went to Rich Square, six miles distant, others to Snow Hill, where Quarterly Meeting convened on First-day.

Then we reluctantly turned away from this pleasant week with many invitations to come again.

EDUCATION.

A CONFERENCE ON RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

PART II.

We were reminded by our chairman as the second session of the Conference opened, after supper and a pleasant social time, that we "were seeking knowledge and understanding." The general subject for the evening, "The Meeting for Worship in Relation to Our Children," was one in which much interest had been expressed, and a larger group than in the afternoon manifested this interest by a close attention to the speakers. The first speaker, Stanley R. Yarnall, said in opening his remarks that we all felt the inadequacy to discuss the subject while we also felt its importance both to the individual and to the Society of Friends.

He thought small space was given to the needs of children, either in our own Book of Discipline or the English book, but a new era in child study and an openness of views have given the topic a fresh interest.

The advantages of the Friendly method and practice of religion were enumerated by the speaker. As religion is a natural development of a normal life, so the religious life of the child should be allowed to develop naturally, without insistence on expression or over-stimulation of emotion, and, as Friends, we are in less danger of this because we have no denominational imposition of creed, form or expression, no self-deception through ritual, but rather a reality in religious expression. There is sound psychology behind birthright membership, and the expectation that the child will grow up in faith, hope and love. There is an analogy to the child's birth into the family life and into citizenship in the community.

Then the dangers of our system were touched upon. Our silences may become a mere form—even a dead form—there is a lack of appeal to the spirit of youth, sometimes a lack of action or of sufficient expression; the meeting fails to function in the life of the boy or girl.

The appeal of the saintly life to the child, and the child's grasp of the vitality of faith were illustrated by reading from Rufus M. Jones' "A Boy's Religion" (pp. 74-77), where he speaks of the dear uncle whose daily life was to him, as a boy, more than his ministry in the Meeting for Worship.

"From scheme and creed the light dies out,

The saintly fact survives,

The blessed Master none can doubt,

Revealed in holy lives."

Regular attendance at meeting Stanley Yarnall most warmly commended, and doubted the wisdom of allowing the child to decide this point. He spoke of the case of a father who had approached the overseers of a meeting asking what steps he should take to have his child become a member. On being asked whether he did not wish to attend meeting regularly himself, he replied that he felt it was too late for him. His own father had preferred that his children should be left to choose their own membership, and it had resulted in their not belonging anywhere. He wished to save his own child from this. "Families vitally interested in Quakerism," the speaker said, "usually pass on the torch," and "reality, sincerity and devotion to the Society on the part of the parents is a great element in forming the religious habits of their children."

The second part of the paper dealt with the application of some parts of the modern study of childhood to our problems. The socialized meeting for children, the recognition by the meeting of the needs and rights of the children, and the promotion of activities and real situations for service were touched upon, also the need that the Bible school and the day-school should be co-operating with the meeting. One school principal, all of whose pupils, even the youngest, attend meeting, wrote: "In the few moments immediately preceding meeting various teachers try in various ways to prepare the children. In the elementary grades, Scripture lessons are given in the period just before meeting. In the rooms of the older children the teachers sometimes read either from the Bible or some other thought-provoking book or article, but older boys or girls sometimes take turns in presenting something which they have on their minds. . . . After meeting the little children are often questioned upon what has been said in the meeting and the teachers make an effort to clarify any impressions that may be vague or mistaken. . . . As far as we have tried to carry these suggestions out we have found them helpful."

The mid-week meeting, breaking in upon and taking precedence of study and play, impresses upon the child the fact that the meeting infiltrates all the affairs of daily living.

Stanley Yarnall suggests that we may soon want to re-model our meeting-houses to provide rooms devoted to the interests of our boys and girls where they may feel at home and enjoy activities suited to their development under the care and inspiration of the meeting. Boys and girls may be interested in the meeting budget and each one may contribute.

The principles underlying the normal religious life of boys and girls must be sincerity and love without sentimentality. We must make special occasions of worship for boys and girls so that they may approach God and have direct fellowship with Him in accordance with their capacities and development. In closing the speaker emphasized the soundness of much of our basic practice toward childhood, and said that no sudden change is to be desired, though we must follow with keen interest the experiments of English Friends and others, such as the Children's Meetings in Germantown.

Following Stanley R. Yarnall's admirable presentation of the relation of the child to the meeting, Grace Warner Sharpless presented the place of the Germantown Children's Meetings, and the concern which had led up to the planning for them. Though she frankly confessed to their being but an experiment, the interest aroused by her paper, and the questions asked concerning it when the meeting was thrown open to discussion, showed that the plan appealed to the parents of young children who were present. The paper follows:

THE GERMTOWN CHILDREN'S MEETINGS.

[I almost hesitate to speak of these meetings, under such a title, as they are only in the first stage of experiment.]

Do you remember, vividly and distinctly, when you were a little child, going to meeting? Do you remember the cold, bare walls and the regularly interspersed windows, also the lights, doors, people and benches which you counted over and over? Can you visualize again the curious pictures and devices with which your imagination filled the silent spaces, and once more can you feel the terrible emotions which welled up in your heart during the sing-song lengthy sermons?

Can you feel yourself biting your fingers and mittens in agitation and oh, can you undergo again the dreadful twitches that took possession of your legs and arms so that it seemed as if you must scream out or run; and then the dislike for it all that developed in your heart? It is so vivid to me that I really can hardly bear to recall it. But then, as you grew to mature years and your life became full of many activities and responsibilities, how peaceful and blessed the silence became to you! How home-like the meeting-house and how wonderful that hearts could come together in such quietness to converse with God and feel His purposes working through their beings. Then have you taken your own children to share in this experience with you and tried to tell them what meeting means to you as grown people? Have you taken these children, eager for the new experience, with hope in your hearts that they might not go through all that you did as a little child, and have you seen their enthusiasm die away and slow dislike take its place as their little minds and hearts come away from the meeting-house untouched, unfed and unawakened?

Some of us have gone through this circle of experience, from our own childhood through to the childhood of our children, feeling with great earnestness, that there must be a remedy for the failure of our meeting with youth. If, instead of dislike, we can only give them an experience that will fill their hearts with love for their meeting, and also give them a sense of ownership and partnership in it! Would not the problem of the indifferent young people solve itself if attacked when the child is at the most impressionable and receptive age?

Last winter, I think in the Second Month, there was a memorable conference on Religious Education at Friends' Select School. One of the speakers gave us the note that awakened some of those from Germantown to action. He told us of the devotional exercises, before the service, which he gave the children of his church. These exercises were explanatory of the following church service and their purpose was devotional and inspirational. Several of us, who were present, went home with the feeling that some such form of devotional exercise could be developed, in relation to our meeting, for the preparation of the little children's minds.

At this time, in Germantown, there was a committee of young Friends, First-day School Committee and Overseers, which had for its purpose the development of work to interest and hold the young people of the meeting. Working through the members of this committee our concern was finally brought to possibility for action by the formation of a smaller committee of men and women deeply interested in the spiritual education of our children.

Our plan, as evolved, was this: to have the children of the meeting, below the age of twelve, meet together in the Committee-room, on the first First-day in every month, at the regular meeting hour. Here to have a meeting of their own, with an adult leader, especially fitted to interest and help little children, to guide their thoughts and hearts to the real purpose of our meeting together. After half an hour to go quietly into the meeting-house and join their parents.

This concern, deeply felt and earnestly prayed for, was brought before the Monthly Meeting, which in the most hearty manner gave permission and support for the trial of such an undertaking.

We had worked out a series of topics for the seven winter months which we felt would guide the child to the meaning of our meeting together and help teach the first steps in learning to draw near, speak to, love and work for our Father. The subject this winter is Knowing God—outlined in seven successive meetings, thus:

1. Knowing God.
2. How God Speaks to Us.
3. How We Know God Loves Us.
4. How We Show Our Love for God.
5. How Our Meeting Tries to Serve God.
6. Speaking to God.
7. How We Meet With God Together.

In the early fall letters of explanation were sent to the parents, accompanied by a card on which were printed the subjects for the winter of a list of books helpful to the parents. Then during the week before our first meeting, each child, members and attenders, received a personal invitation to this meeting which was to be their very own. The response was most inspiring, as I think about sixty children attended. Informally we sat in a large circle, the smaller children in the front, and the children gathered in silence. There was also a silent pause at the close. We tried to think of God as our best Friend and the different means by which friendship is built up and how we learn to know our friends. One of the older children recited most beautifully and impressively a poem on Him who is our closest and dearest Friend. All this was in terms for the very young child. Next month we hope that the older children of the group will be more appealed to by a leader who will give them some idea of a vital part of friendship with God—How He speaks to us. So we hope from month to month to develop our plan and some day, perhaps, reach a place where the older children can take charge and the children themselves vitally share in it and so grow up into a natural and responsible part of the mother meeting.

Prayerfully we look forward to a time when youth and age together may worship the Father in a beautiful and reverent silence, which shall be the blending of hope and purpose in knowing God and working for Him. But should we be afraid to educate our children and help them to the attainment of such a goal?

Janet Payne Whitney opened the general discussion by reminding us that "A child is a person," and must be so considered; yet the child naturally follows an example set by its elders, and "if we are obviously trying to follow Christ, the child will follow, too."

The danger of an attitude of rigidity in our meetings was pointed out, and the feeling of children that their part in them is always a silent part. The need of keeping near to our children, in an attitude of simplicity, was emphasized.

Unfortunately, the time for discussion was limited by the lateness of the hour, but some interesting questions were brought out.

One of these was how we can make communion with our Heavenly Father a daily reality to our children.

In retrospect the Committee feels well satisfied that the Conference was held, and grateful for all the helpful expression given. It is hoped to make the way for other smaller Conferences, in Quarterly or Monthly Meetings, to consider the suggested subjects which could not be considered for lack of time, and so continue the study of our responsibilities as parents and teachers. Sub-committee No. 2 of the Extension Committee will gladly be of service in this line of work.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION AMONGST FRIENDS IN ENGLAND.

It is interesting to observe how the same subject is very often under consideration at the same time by Friends on both sides of the Atlantic.—[Eds.]

At the afternoon sitting of Yorkshire Q. M., the subject of "Religious Education" was introduced by Mary F. Hartley, of Ackworth, and J. Edward Hodgkin, of Darlington. Mary Hartley defined the term in its deepest sense as meaning nourishing the growth of that Divine germ without which no human soul can thrive. To this end it was necessary to give definite religious instruction in the history of religion, especially in the growth of the conception of God as revealed in the Old Testament; and to study the life and teaching of Jesus Christ. The adult should be free to face and solve for himself the problems of the day in the light of Christ's life and teaching. Because we were conscious of failure, we were once more reviewing our ground to see if new times brought new light. Were our meetings for worship breathing forth that spirit of absolute trust in God and sympathy for mankind which we professed in our Book of Discipline to be our interpretation of the way of Christ? Were we creating an atmosphere in our homes and our schools for the Divine germ to be nurtured? It was abundantly worth while to have discussion parties and Study Circles. Many boys and girls were eager to ask endless questions, and in discussion circles and small groups it was sometimes possible to speak of things which perhaps as individuals they would find it impossible to talk about. The Adult Sections of the Central Education Committee was facing this problem and the Quarterly Meeting might be able to give some help.

The clouds which rise with thunder, shake
Our thirsty souls with rain;
The blow most dreaded falls to break
From off our limbs a chain;
And wrongs from man to man but make
The love of God more plain.
As through the shadowy lens of even
The eye looks farthest into heaven
On gleams of star and depths of blue
The glaring sunshine never knew.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

EVERY day I am more sure of the mistake made by good folks universally of trying to pull fallen people up instead of keeping safe ones from tumbling down, said John Ruskin. Perhaps there is no better way to keep "safe ones from tumbling" than by helping the fallen, but the enforcement of the prohibition law does both.

PROHIBITION is a growth, not a status fixed by law. It should be judged with reference to the stage of its development. "Rum-running" is a crime, not a business. Prohibition is not a complete success in some portions of the country, but as a whole, it is succeeding as rapidly as we have any right to expect.—WAYNE B. WHEELER.

LIBERTY to disobey the law is not considered sacred by any large percentage of the people.—WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN.

THE SUPPLEMENTAL PROHIBITION BILL passed the Senate on Eleventh Month 18th and became a law by the signature of President Harding. Again the anti-prohibitionists suffer overwhelming defeat (the vote stood 56 to 22), in spite of their contemptible method of preventing the vote being taken earlier. The main provisions of the bill are as follows:—

Prescribing of beer or malt liquors as medicine prohibited. In the case of vinous or spirituous liquors, not more than one quart, or in the aggregate, one-half pint of alcohol, may be prescribed in ten days.

Physicians are limited to one hundred prescriptions for liquor in ninety days, unless extraordinary reason is presented.

Importation of such liquors (permissible for non-beverage use only) now prohibited entirely until amount on hand shall be insufficient for such restricted use.

The Courts of Hawaii and Virgin Islands are given jurisdiction to enforce the Prohibition Law.

Private residences may not be searched without warrant. Officers entering without search warrants are penalized. This regulation does not apply to private vehicles or moving conveyances.

BEER AS MEDICINE was the great breach which the anti-prohibitionists had counted upon to facilitate their campaign for nullification. But extensive hearings before committees of both the House and the Senate failed to develop any valid reason for legalizing beer to be prescribed therapeutically. Big medical associations, composed of tens of thousands of physicians in high standing, says The American Issue, assert that there is no ailment for which beer is a good remedy, if indeed it is good for anything. A California medical society (regular school) has voted to expel from membership any physician who administers liquor without having first made a personal examination of the case.

MILWAUKEE BEER AGAIN FAMOUS for a day or two, but with the passage of the Supplementary Bill the recent ruling regarding beer as medicine automatically ceases. Two brewers in Chicago had taken steps to re-open, and many others would have followed. Some "drug stores," like the one in Milwaukee, would soon have had a long line of "patients" waiting to have prescriptions filled. But the scheme failed. However, the brewers have no intention of giving up the fight for their "medicine." Once more they propose to appeal to the Courts (for the most part no doubt as defendants in cases brought against them for violations of the law). In one thing they claim to have succeeded, viz.:—"The people have been apprized of the fact that the Eighteenth Amendment does not prohibit beer for medical purposes." What comfort!

PROHIBITION IN PENNSYLVANIA affords an interesting study in the craftiness of politicians who try to carry water on one shoulder and booze on the other. Senator Penrose showed his true position in voting against the Supplementary Bill. We had ventured the hope that with failing health and waning power he had become in measure reconciled to "enforcement." But his fine statements to that effect, when his friend McConnell was, through his influence, appointed Enforcement Commissioner in this State, were probably mere pretense. McConnell succeeded so well in nullifying enforcement that he was ousted by Federal Commissioner Haynes, as being incompetent or insincere. Philadelphia saloonkeepers, according to The Public Ledger, are paying license fees equivalent to $1,000,000 per year to sell at the present time "vinous, spirituous, malt and other liquors at retail." Such is the wondrous provision of the amended Brooks High License Law as it now stands. This is the law championed by Governor Sproul, who was elected on his pledge to secure enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment, and it was passed through his influence instead of a real enforcement measure proposed by the Anti-saloon League. Under this amended Brooks law the license system continues, the saloons with their screened apartments continue, and violation of the Federal law is made about as safe and easy as possible. It must be said, however, that notwithstanding the wording of the license, the "vinous, spirituous malt and other liquors" are not to contain more than one-half of one per cent. alcohol. How wonderful is the ingenuity of politicians! No wonder the law has been dubbed: "The Saloon Preserver."

GOVERNOR SPROUL PLEDGES ENFORCEMENT.—In a recent letter to the League, he says: "The Attorney-General and I have had many consultations regarding the co-operation of the State in the proper enforcement of the Federal and State prohibition laws. We have been lending the assistance of the State police to the city and county authorities, and instructions have issued to them to act on their own initiative in cases with which they are familiar. We have offered our co-operation to the Federal authorities." To the many who believe in the sincerity of the Governor, this is most encouraging. Others will say, "Watch the performance and you will see more of the wonders of Pennsylvania politics."

PROHIBITION IN ICELAND is the heading of a printed letter received through England from the Icelandic Grand Lodge of the I. O. G. T. to their fellow members elsewhere. It sets forth the unmistakable effort of a larger nation, Spain, to compel Iceland to revoke its prohibition law. The situation is serious. It is commented on in the International Record and in The American Issue. In 1912, Iceland was the first nation to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors (containing alcohol in excess of two-and-one-half per cent.). The State and Church and people declare the law to be very popular. It appears, however, that the leading industry in Iceland is catching, preserving and exporting fish. Spain is her principal foreign market, and now refuses to renew a certain trade treaty of great importance to the Icelanders, unless allowed to sell wines containing 21 per cent. alcohol in violation of the prohibition law. It is stated that the demand does not appear to be made with a view of obtaining any economic advantage over other nations. It seems to be made solely to initiate a campaign against the principle of prohibition. This attempted interference of a larger nation with the internal affairs of another nation is awakening the sympathy of liberty-loving people everywhere that the facts are known, but the situation is a difficult one to handle. It is conceded that the Spanish treaty makes Iceland a "favored nation," but the refusal to renew it is not on the ground of any dissatisfaction on the part of either country with the treaty itself. The Manchester Guardian (England), commenting on the incident says, "Why did not Spain pick this quarrel with the United States?"

WASHINGTON NOT TO BE AN OASIS.—For weeks wet newspapers have been telling their readers that the city of Washington during the disarmament conference would be one grand oasis in a desert land. They pointed to the fact that embassies are really foreign territory and as such are exempt from the workings of the Eighteenth Amendment. They have been painting rosy pictures of how delegates to the disarmament conference would turn their headquarters into booze emporiums. They said there is no law preventing them from inviting their friends to come in and partake of the joys of booze. It must be disquieting news therefore to the thirsty who had been counting on invitations, that all formal functions during the disarmament conference will be dry, that not only the state affairs given by the United States are to be arid, but that the receptions and luncheons and dinners given by foreign embassies for foreign delegates will be void of all liquors.

It is encouraging to note that the British embassy led off with the statement that the prohibition laws of the United States will be observed. Both Marshal Foch and General Diaz have already set the example of total abstinence while on American soil. The fact is, there are some citizens of our own country who make high pretense of patriotism who would do well to follow the example of these visitors from abroad.—American Issue.

NEW JERSEY.—The Camden County Retail Liquor Dealers' Association has formally disbanded and distributed the money in the treasury among the members, says the Philadelphia North American. It is the last of twenty-one saloonmen's associations in the State to pass out of existence, and was nearly one hundred years old. The recent election, with the "drys" triumphant, precipitated this action.

Dr. Henry A. Cotton, medical director of the State Hospital for the Insane in Trenton, New Jersey, reports that alcoholic cases in that institution have decreased from twenty-one to two per cent. He explicitly attributes this to prohibition.

There was great rejoicing among law-abiding citizens, regardless of party affiliations, when the results of the election were made public, and it became known that both Senate and House had been kept in the dry column, with a gain of two dry Senators. The wets, led by the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, had made their particular attack upon Essex County, where they felt there was a chance of success, but they failed.

MAUDE ROBINSON.

Reprinted from The Ezaminer.

Old John Williams, of Randall's Mill, was getting feeble and deaf, and most of the business had fallen into the capable hands of Joe. His wife was more active—a quiet woman, possessed of a sublime faith in the Unseen, a mother among the several meetings of Friends in Co. Wexford, and her son and daughter followed her lead with reverence and love.

Not long after the destruction of the gun, the family were surprised by a call from the local magistrate and a Protestant clergyman. In the best parlor, with carefully closed doors, they explained to the Williams family that they were organizing the loyalists to resist the threatened uprising, and all young men and weapons must be prepared.

"We hear that you have a good gun, Mr. Joseph," began the magistrate.

"I have no gun at all," said Joe, smiling. "When I heard that it might be claimed for a sterner use than shooting wild fowl I destroyed it."

The magistrate flushed angrily.

"You young fool!" he said. "Do you not know there are plots on every side to murder all the Protestants and take their goods?"

"So I have heard," said Joe, quietly; "but I do not see that it is laid upon me to do evil that good may come. We are Friends, and desire to be friendly with all!"

"This young man evidently thinks he has a special protection from the Almighty," said the parson, with a sneer.

"And so he has, James Doran," said the gentle mother, firmly. "The Lord is a stronghold in the day of trouble, and He knoweth them that trust in Him." These are fearful times. We know not what is before us; but nothing can convince us that we need the defence of carnal weapons. We are in the hands of One Who has never failed His trusting children, and He can protect us."

"Well, when you see your old parents and pretty sister abused and murdered before your eyes, you will wish that gun was in your hands, Joe Williams; but it is no use wasting our time on fanatics." And the visitors left, with contempt and anger in their worn and anxious faces.

As the spring wore on, more and more serious became the symptoms of mutual distrust and unrest. The men idled, and neglected to till their land.

"Sure we will have the best of everything when we get our rights!" they told Joe, when he asked them why the crops were not being set.

The Friends worked on steadily. Their farms were tilled as usual; the Williams' small mill ground wheat and barley for all the neighborhood, and still the rumors of a coming catastrophe came from all sides.

It was in early spring that an old woman, Mary Kavanagh, who had a tiny farm a quarter of a mile away, came one morning in deep distress.

"Ah, Miss Jane, would you be lendin' us a pair of scissors? Those murtherin' military have put a hot pitch cap on my poor boy Mike's head, and the beautiful curls of him are all plastered down, and it is in an agony he is, and no tool of ours will cut it off."

"Why, what has Micky been doing to offend the soldiers?" "Sorra a thing he did. He was only colloquing with his cousin, Dan Mulligan, at Ferns beyant, and down on them came the military, and poor Dan, my own sister's son (her bed has been in hiven these many years, thanks be to the saints!), he was taken and hanged on the big tree by his own door. It was a leader of sedition they said he was, and must be made an example of, and the other poor boys, nigh a dozen of them, they took to a cauldron of scaldin' hot pitch, and dipped linen in it, and bound a cap tight over the heads of them, and when it was hard they tould them to get away home before worse happened."

Joe took the shining scissors from Jane's hand. "I'll come and help thee, Mary Kavanagh—(some soft rag and oil we shall want, sister, please)—and we will try and undo this cruel torment."

Micky, a lively lad of eighteen, was lurking in the cottage in desperate discomfort from the horrible pitch cap, and many were his groans as Joe, with skilful fingers, clipped hair by hair, until he was released, and stood bald and shamed, with sad scalds on his forehead and neck where the thick curls had not protected the skin. These were gently bandaged with cool rags, and when Jane appeared with a nice bowl of white bread and milk, the boy ate eagerly, and was told to lie down and get a good rest after his long and painful walk home.

The mother continued to bewail "the beautiful curls of him—and I that have every day begged the blessed Saint Mogue to have a care of my boy! Our own saint seems to have clean forgotten us, or else he is angry that his holy bones lie beneath Ferns Cathaydril, that the Protestants stole from the thrue Church."

"Danny said that will be righted soon, and the Mass said in our own Cathaydril again," said Mike. "But there's one thing I must tell you, Master Joe:—when the dark day for the Protestants comes, the Quakers will be spared. At Ferns beyant the soldiers had no ropes for the hangings, or linen for these cursed pitch caps, so they goes to Mr. Houghton's shop where there was plenty of both. But he, good man—he up and refused to sell for such cruel work."

"I cannot prayvint you from takin' them," says he, 'but with my consint no goods of mine shall go to torment my fellow-countrymen,' says he, and although they held out the gould before his eyes, never a bit would he take."
